Für das gestrige Programm bedurfte man aber mehr als das durchschnittliche Musikverständnis der Konzertbesucher. Abgesehen davon, daß sämtliche drei Nummern in Detroit zum ersten Mal in diesen Konzerten gehört wurden, ist ihr ganzer Aufbau ein so kunstvoller, daß man sich selbst bei größeren Kenntnissen der Musik nur schwer hindurchwinden kann. Allerdings kommt es beim Durchschnitts = Konzertbesucher nicht auf den Bau des Werkes, sondern auf die Wirkung auf das Ohr an und daß diese eine reine, unzweideutige sei, dafür sorgte das Genie Dr. Karl Muck's. Von dem „sehnsüchtigen Schmerz des Jünglings" in der „Don Juan"= Tondichtung von Richard Strauß bis zu dem Allegro maestoso der Glazounoff'schen B=Dur Symphonie, No. 5, hörte man jene Musik, die der Komponist schrieb, und nicht die, die etwa das subjektive Empfinden eines Dirigenten uns zu Gehör bringen wollte. Das ist eben das Großartige an dem „Dirigenten" Dr. Karl Muck. Er giebt uns eine möglichst objektive Interpretation des Werkes, er läßt die Empfindung des Komponisten in uns erstehen, „komponiert" nicht selbst wie die Mehrzahl seiner Kollegen vom Taktstock.

Auf die Werke selbst hier einzugehen, finden wir für überflüssig. Wer dem Konzerte beigewohnt hat und den Vorträgen gefolgt ist, hat ihre Schönheit, ihren symphonischen Klang empfunden. Wer das Konzert versäumte, könnte auch durch die ausführlichste Darstellung in Worten die Wirkung der Töne nicht empfinden.

Der gestrige Abend brachte noch Saint Saens H=Moll = Konzert für Violine und Orchester, dessen Solopart der Konzertmeister des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, Herr T. Adamowski, spielte. Wir können nur sagen, daß unter den vielen Violinvirtuosen, die wir im Laufe der Jahre hier in Detroit begrüßt haben, Adamowski einer der besten ist. So war es denn auch nicht zu wundern, daß ein Künstler seines Ranges einen schier endlosen Applaus erntete.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 1907 State N Y

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. Is is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing Dr. Muck next season.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 - 1907 State N Y

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II.

[137]

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 1907 State N Y

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is, unfortunately, very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 2, 1907.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, after the return of the orchestra from its Western trip. Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who is well known here in Boston, will be the soloist, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano No. 1. The program in full is as follows:

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Paul Dukas
Concerto for piano No. 1.....Tschaikowsky
Three symphonic tone pictures on Corneille's tragedy, "Polieucte".....Edg. Tinel
(First time here.)

THE LONGY CLUB.

The third and last concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall on next Wednesday evening, Feb. 6, at 8.15 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr. J. Keller, 'cello. The program is as follows:

Trio (Op. 11) for clarinet, 'cello and piano
Beethoven
Messrs. G. Grisez, J. Keller and A. de Voto.
Waldhornconcert (Op. 11).....Strauss
Messrs. F. Hain and A. de Voto.
Serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two

Town Topics Feb. 2-07-

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES

THERE is no questioning those who attended the symphony concert on Tuesday evening as to whether they were entertained or not. Only one verdict could be given, and that, "it was one of the best orchestral concerts Clevelanders have ever had the opportunity of hearing. However, the pleasure of the audience did not end there. The conducting of Dr. Muck was probably one of the biggest treats the local public has enjoyed. One would hardly know that there was a conductor present, so easily was his work accomplished. His conducting did not detract from the enjoyment of the evening. It apparently was no effort for him to conduct the body of seventy men, for he apparently welded them into one being and made this ensemble answer his will as easily as a straw is blown by the wind. His conducting is a pleasure not only from the view point of the extraordinary ensemble he gets from his men, but mostly because it is done so easily that it does not tire those in the audience. Watching a man conduct and throwing every bit of his physical strength into it, until it seems that after a concert the conductor would be exhausted to the point where he would want to rest for several hours, is not a pleasure to the auditor. Muck's conducting must be infinitely more interesting from the orchestra side than from the audience's position, because at times when he rests in his conducting it must be nothing more nor less than the man's personal magnetism transmitted to his men by his keen eyes, which suggests the correct tempo, the various shadings and the wonderful attacks which characterizes everything the orchestra plays. To the writer it was the keenest pleasure to see this artist lead his men with apparently no effort, and above all, no physical exertion. Doubtless all the hard work is done in the rehearsals. Upon his entrance one saw a man of slender stature with dignified and aristocratic bearing, and possessing a personality which could not help but attract even the most blase concert goer. He has a fine face, one upon which the stamp of the scholarly musician is indelibly placed, and naturally nothing of the "tawdry" could be expected. If for no other reason Dr. Muck should be commended for his manner of withdrawing his personality the moment his baton is raised for the orchestra to begin playing and immediately becoming a part of the organization rather than the head. However, while talking of his mannerisms or rather lack of them, it should be remembered that he has no novices to lead, but seasoned and fully matured players, who for years have been identified with this orchestra, playing together almost daily. This organization has practically seventy-five soloists, so to speak, as each man is an artist on his particular instrument. The violinists produced a singing tone, the equal of which has never been heard here before except at former concerts of the same organization. The same virtuosity exists in the wood winds and basses, which characterized the string section. Very few, if any oboists have ever been heard here who could be compared with the principal in this section. The same could be said of the flutist. Timothée Adamowski, the soloist, is a great improvement over the soloist this organization presented last year. Mr. Adamowski possesses virility first of all in his playing; nothing effeminate, nothing of the sickly and mawkish could be found in his interpretation. The broad manner in which he played the Saint-Saens number allows no questioning his position as a soloist. His playing grew on the audience so that by the time he finished the concerto he had to acknowledge his applause four times. It is to be hoped that the symphony patrons may enjoy one if not more concerts of the organization next season.

Paper Times Union
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 '07 State N Y

C. A. Ellis, of Boston, is looking forward to a very busy season in 1907-1908. As manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet, and the Longy Club, which give, all told, a rough total of 175 concerts in a season, he has enough to keep most men busy. The orchestra will make another week's trip to the Middle West in January, 1908, and the quartet will probably go west in the autumn. He is also the manager of Madame Melba, Paderewski and Madame Samaroff. Madame Melba is now planning a long concert tour, which will embrace about forty cities and mean the whole of the season in America. This is being booked now. Paderewski comes to America in October to give in the neighborhood of 100 concerts. His tour will begin at the end of October and run into May. A goodly portion of these concerts are already booked. Madame Samaroff, who will have given about seventy concerts by the end of this season, will give about the same number next year. She plans some concerts in England and the Continent next spring and autumn, but will begin her third American tour in November.

Paper Times Citizen
City Brooklyn New York
Date State N Y

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening, February 22. She will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for the Piano, in B flat minor. The symphony will be Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," Emile Ferir playing the solo viola. The other number on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."

Paper News
City Dallas
Date FEB 9 - 1907 State Tex.

The Boston Symphony Orhcestra returned to Boston on Sunday evening, Feb. 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30, when the concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near to the record for an orchestral concert.

Indianapolis Morning Journal Feb-2-07- T

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin Wins Personal Tribute as "Cool and Calm" Conductor.

PROGRAM A MUSICAL TREAT

Concert a Brilliant One Socially and as Art Example.

The coolest and calmest, the safest and most sane conductor who has yet visited Indianapolis stood at ease before his desk on the stage at English's Opera House last night and led a mighty orchestra through a brief—albeit wide-reaching and comprehensive—program. The conductor was Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The combination proved to be all that might have been and was expected.

Dr. Muck is absent from the Royal Opera for one year by permission of the German Emperor. It is small wonder that Wilhelm wants his conductor back; not strange that he would only lend him. The only unusual element in the affair is that the Kaiser let him go at all. Every one who saw him at his work last night and "heard" the resultant musical fabric was of that opinion. And it was an audience whose opinion counts.

In the theater were men and women who stand for the best in the musical and artistic life of Indianapolis. They applauded and cried aloud in their enthusiasm, and their "bravos" may be taken to convey wholesome indorsement of the Boston Orchestra and that for which it stands.

The fame of this orchestra rests securely upon a foundation of years and effort which defies attack by the wildest critic. The organization is a marvelous musical mechanism—capable of expressing any emotion from the whisper of death to a riot of rage. Its membership represents the best—each in his particular field—procurable after years of search. Each man fits perfectly into his place; each section fits perfectly into the harmonious whole.

Oldest Symphonic Body.

As it is the oldest symphonic body existing in the United States it naturally, like its violins, has improved with the years and stands today upon a pedestal which other orchestras the world wide approach with respect and caution. It has no peers and it will be long before its equal is heard here or elsewhere.

There were friendly glances and smiles of understanding flashed from the great stageful of men to Dr. Muck as he appeared last night. There seems to be, aside from the strict lines of authority, a sort of camaraderie existing between Dr. Muck and his men. Even as he conducts, this leader and his men have their little tilts of appreciation. A nod or a smile edges its way through the volumes of sound, pushes aside the notes as they leap and play and finds lodgment in the heart to which it is dispatched. There's just genuine good fellowship—and it seems to count for something when the books are balanced.

To all appearances Dr. Muck, as he stepped to the stage and fingered his baton at his desk, might have been exchanging pleasantries with other guests at some afternoon reception. He stood at ease; slight of figure; face, lean and smooth-shaven; his hair worn short enough to cause doubt, almost, that it thatched a "temperament"; in height medium. He stood as a soldier at parade rest. That was his favorite attitude; with the left foot slightly in advance and his body turned toward the left. Seldom during the entire evening did he abandon this position. He seemed nonchalant, immovable. But when his baton moved, even so tiny a fraction of an inch, things happened. And the things that happened are those which have made the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, an orchestra outorchestraing itself.

There were times that the audience almost forgot that there was a conductor. He did not intrude. His personality and his command went directly to the men, and were not spent in waving arms and flying heels. More like an overseer he presided, indicating by a nod here and a wave there the mood or tempo of the moment. There is no lost motion, no wasted effort about Dr. Muck. He is not stern, yet he is exacting. He does not reach for and pull the music "out by the roots." He asks for it modestly and politely, but always firmly, and he gets it. He does not poke and dig at his men; he caresses and humors them. Instead of force he uses kindness. The orchestra is his pet; and it does his will because it can, it wants to and it is a pleasure to do so. It is like a father and his child.

Such relationships as these entered into the program, for of course the orchestra reflects the conductor and the orchestra is the medium of transmission. The program, short, began with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. Its four movements constituted the first half of the program and served to lead the audience from one pitch of enthusiasm to another. It ended—that first half—with many of the audience standing, cries of "bravo" and genuine emotion. Particularly effective were the second and fourth movements.—particularly the second This brought the first demonstration of the evening and by some it was thought to be the most pleasing portion of the program.

Richard Strauss, composer of the much-discussed and now put-away "Salome," was represented in the second half of the program by his tone poem, "Don Juan." It was a musical coat of many colors. It swept through the gamut of passion, given with deliberation and yet brilliancy. It was characteristic of the composer, who, in "Salome," is said to have exhibited his knowledge of all musical rules and ethics only by the careful way in which every rule is broken and shattered. "Don Juan" was more than pleasing; its warmth and riot of emotion throbbed and echoed; at times it was only a whisper, as of an April wind against the window pane at night; then it roared and raged like a February gale; it told of love and hate, joy and sadness and of life itself.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," in which the brasses of Wagner are characteristically introduced, closed the splendid program. During the prelude there was a time when Dr. Muck was so quiet and unostentatious about his conducting that he stopped altogether. He stood absolutely motionless. His hand, with the baton, was at his side; he surveyed the waving arms and music-lit eyes of his men. He seemed proud of them, and his confidence in them was eloquently spoken by his inaction.

SOCIETY MUCH IN EVIDENCE.

Audience at Concert Included Many Prominent Leaders in Social Affairs.

That Indianapolis society folk are music lovers is always evidenced when a musical event of prominence takes place, and the concert last evening was an added proof, as the opera house was crowded with a brilliant audience. There were several concert parties, and the music lovers came from all over the State.

Mr. and Mrs. William E. English entertained in their box Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor, and Mr. and Mrs. George Gaston. Mr. and Mrs. George A. Gay had as guests in their box Mr. and Mrs. Horace F. Wood and their guest, Mrs. Holden of Camden, N. J., and Mr. Louis Levey. In Mr. and Mrs. Hugh McGowan's box were Miss McGowan, Miss Frances McGowan, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph McGowan, Mrs. Samuel E. Morss and Mrs. E. B. Peck. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Reid were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Reid. In another box were Mrs. John Holtzman, Mrs. Alexander Lemcke and Miss Eleanor Lemcke. Other people in the audience of musical and social prominece were Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Willard Pierce, Mrs. C. C. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Metzger, Mr. and Mrs. John Schmidt, Miss Julia and Miss Debora Moore, Miss Florence Coffin, Miss Krauss, Miss Gertrude Henry, Dr. and Mrs. Harvey Moore, Mr. and Mrs. George Mueller and daughters, Mrs. H. D. Pierce, Miss Theresa Pierce, Miss Elizabeth Cooper, Miss Clayson, Mrs. Thersa Voss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Bachman, Mr. and Mrs. Ferdinand Mayer, Miss Malott, Mrs. Henry Jameson, Miss Eunice and Miss Augusta Jameson, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Block, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Edenharter, Mr. and Mrs. Louise Hollweg, Mr. and Mrs. George Haerle, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Kurtz, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. William Line Elder, Miss Margaret Rockwood, Miss Helen Rockwood, Mrs. Ovid Butler Jameson, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Richards, Miss Edith Wallick, Mr. and Mrs. George Vonnegut, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Kenyon, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fauvre, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Jillson, Miss Ann Jillson, Miss Fauvre, Mrs. Louis Burckhardt, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Stanley, Miss Eleanor Tucker, Mrs. Carroll Carr, Mr. and Mrs. Noble C. Butler, Miss Ogle, Mr. and Mrs. Frank N. Lewis, Mrs. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Buttolph, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Francke, Miss Lillian Reeves, Miss Sue Howe, Miss Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. Emil Martin, Mrs. Charles Bookwalter, Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Schnull and daughter, Miss Schnull, Miss Pauline, Miss Bertha and Miss Louise Schellschmidt, Mr. and Mrs. Victor K. Hendricks, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Cole, Miss Josephine Robinson, Mrs. Henry Kahn, Miss Mary Josephine Wight, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Sterne, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Haueisen, Dr. and Mrs. M. Thorner, Mrs. May Donnan, Miss Margaret Donnan, Dr. and Mrs. Lafayette Page, Miss Margaret Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Lathrop, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Vonnegut and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Brenneke, Mr. and Mrs. Kerfoot Stewart, Mrs. John Worth Kern, Miss Julia Kern, Dr. and Mrs. Beno Gundelfinger, Dr. Frederick Charlton, Mr. Frederick Fahnley, Miss Carrie Fahnley, Mrs. Gavin Payne, Mrs. E. W. Tripp, Mr. and Mrs. Karl Schneider, Mrs. W. E. Hayward, Miss Hayward, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn Stone, Mr. William Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Block, Mr. Adolph Schellschmidt, Miss Myrtle Parke, Mrs. Charles Foster of Frankfort, Dr. and Mrs. Stone of Purdue University and Dr. and Mrs. Campbell of Indiana University.

Town Topics Feb. 2-07-

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES

THERE is no questioning those who attended the symphony concert on Tuesday evening as to whether they were entertained or not. Only one verdict could be given, and that, "it was one of the best orchestral concerts Clevelanders have ever had the opportunity of hearing. However, the pleasure of the audience did not end there. The conducting of Dr. Muck was probably one of the biggest treats the local public has enjoyed. One would hardly know that there was a conductor present, so easily was his work accomplished. His conducting did not detract from the enjoyment of the evening. It apparently was no effort for him to conduct the body of seventy men, for he apparently welded them into one being and made this ensemble answer his will as easily as a straw is blown by the wind. His conducting is a pleasure not only from the view point of the extraordinary ensemble he gets from his men, but mostly because it is done so easily that it does not tire those in the audience. Watching a man conduct and throwing every bit of his physical strength into it, until it seems that after a concert the conductor would be exhausted to the point where he would want to rest for several hours, is not a pleasure to the auditor. Muck's conducting must be infinitely more interesting from the orchestra side than from the audience's position, because at times when he rests in his conducting it must be nothing more nor less than the man's personal magnetism transmitted to his men by his keen eyes, which suggests the correct tempo, the various shadings and the wonderful attacks which characterizes everything the orchestra plays. To the writer it was the keenest pleasure to see this artist lead his men with apparently no effort, and above all, no physical exertion. Doubtless all the hard work is done in the rehearsals. Upon his entrance one saw a man of slender stature with dignified and aristocratic bearing, and possessing a personality which could not help but attract even the most blase concert goer. He has a fine face, one upon which the stamp of the scholarly musician is indelibly placed, and naturally nothing of the "tawdry" could be expected. If for no other reason Dr. Muck should be commended for his manner of withdrawing his personality the moment his baton is raised for the orchestra to begin playing and immediately becoming a part of the organization rather than the head. However, while talking of his mannerisms or rather lack of them, it should be remembered that he has no novices to lead, but seasoned and fully matured players, who for years have been identified with this orchestra, playing together almost daily. This organization has practically seventy-five soloists, so to speak, as each man is an artist on his particular instrument. The violinists produced a singing tone, the equal of which has never been heard here before except at former concerts of the same organization. The same virtuosity exists in the wood winds and basses, which characterized the string section. Very few, if any oboists have ever been heard here who could be compared with the principal in this section. The same could be said of the flutist. Timothée Adamowski, the soloist, is a great improvement over the soloist this organization presented last year. Mr. Adamowski possesses virility first of all in his playing; nothing effeminate, nothing of the sickly and mawkish could be found in his interpretation. The broad manner in which he played the Saint-Saens number allows no questioning his position as a soloist His playing grew on the audience so that by the time he finished the concerto he had to acknowledge his applause four times. It is to be hoped that the symphony patrons may enjoy one if not more concerts of the organization next season.

Paper Times Union
City Brooklyn
Date FEB 2 1907 State N Y

C. A. Ellis, of Boston, is looking forward to a very busy season in 1907-1908. As manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Quartet, and the Longy Club, which give, all told, a rough total of 175 concerts in a season, he has enough to keep most men busy. The orchestra will make another week's trip to the Middle West in January, 1908, and the quartet will probably go west in the autumn. He is also the manager of Madame Melba, Paderewski and Madame Samaroff. Madame Melba is now planning a long concert tour, which will embrace about forty cities and mean the whole of the season in America. This is being booked now. Paderewski comes to America in October to give in the neighborhood of 100 concerts. His tour will begin at the end of October and run into May. A goodly portion of these concerts are already booked. Madame Samaroff, who will have given about seventy concerts by the end of this season, will give about the same number next year. She plays some concerts in England and the Continent next spring and autumn, but will begin her third American tour in November.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn New York
Date State N Y

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening, February 22. She will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for the Piano, in B flat minor. The symphony will be Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," Emile Ferir playing the solo viola. The other number on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar."

Paper News Union
City Dallas Brooklyn
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State Tex. N.Y

The Boston Symphony Orhcestra returned to Boston on Sunday evening, Feb. 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30, when the concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near to the record for an orchestral concert.

Indianapolis Morning Star Feb-2-07- T

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin Wins Personal Tribute as "Cool and Calm" Conductor.

PROGRAM A MUSICAL TREAT

Concert a Brilliant One Socially and as Art Example.

The coolest and calmest, the safest and most sane conductor who has yet visited Indianapolis stood at ease before his desk on the stage at English's Opera House last night and led a mighty orchestra through a brief—albeit wide-reaching and comprehensive—program. The conductor was Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The orchestra was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The combination proved to be all that might have been and was expected.

Dr. Muck is absent from the Royal Opera for one year by permission of the German Emperor. It is small wonder that Wilhelm wants his conductor back; not strange that he would only lend him. The only unusual element in the affair is that the Kaiser let him go at all. Every one who saw him at his work last night and "heard" the resultant musical fabric was of that opinion. And it was an audience whose opinion counts.

In the theater were men and women who stand for the best in the musical and artistic life of Indianapolis. They applauded and cried aloud in their enthusiasm, and their "bravos" may be taken to convey wholesome indorsement of the Boston Orchestra and that for which it stands.

The fame of this orchestra rests securely upon a foundation of years and effort which defies attack by the wildest critic. The organization is a marvelous musical mechanism—capable of expressing any emotion from the whisper of death to a riot of rage. Its membership represents the best—each in his particular field—procurable after years of search. Each man fits perfectly into his place; each section fits perfectly into the harmonious whole.

Oldest Symphonic Body.

As it is the oldest symphonic body existing in the United States it naturally, like its violins, has improved with the years and stands today upon a pedestal which other orchestras the world wide approach with respect and caution. It has no peers and it will be long before its equal is heard here or elsewhere.

There were friendly glances and smiles of understanding flashed from the great stageful of men to Dr. Muck as he appeared last night. There seems to be, aside from the strict lines of authority, a sort of camaraderie existing between Dr. Muck and his men. Even as he conducts, this leader and his men have their little tilts of appreciation. A nod or a smile edges its way through the volumes of sound, pushes aside the notes as they leap and play and finds lodgment in the heart to which it is dispatched. There's just genuine good fellowship—and it seems to count for something when the books are balanced.

To all appearances Dr. Muck, as he stepped to the stage and fingered his baton at his desk, might have been exchanging pleasantries with other guests at some afternoon reception. He stood at ease; slight of figure; face, lean and smooth-shaven; his hair worn short enough to cause doubt, almost, that it thatched a "temperament"; in height medium. He stood as a soldier at parade rest. That was his favorite attitude; with the left foot slightly in advance and his body turned toward the left. Seldom during the entire evening did he abandon this position. He seemed nonchalant, immovable. But when his baton moved, even so tiny a fraction of an inch, things happened. And the things that happened are those which have made the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, an orchestra outorchestraing itself.

There were times that the audience almost forgot that there was a conductor. He did not intrude. His personality and his command went directly to the men, and were not spent in waving arms and flying heels. More like an overseer he presided, indicating by a nod here and a wave there the mood or tempo of the moment. There is no lost motion, no wasted effort about Dr. Muck. He is not stern, yet he is exacting. He does not reach for and pull the music "out by the roots." He asks for it modestly and politely, but always firmly, and he gets it. He does not poke and dig at his men; he caresses and humors them. Instead of force he uses kindness. The orchestra is his pet; and it does his will because it can, it wants to and it is a pleasure to do so. It is like a father and his child.

Such relationships as these entered into the program, for of course the orchestra reflects the conductor and the orchestra is the medium of transmission. The program, short, began with the Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. Its four movements constituted the first half of the program and served to lead the audience from one pitch of enthusiasm to another. It ended—that first half—with many of the audience standing, cries of "bravo" and genuine emotion. Particularly effective were the second and fourth movements.— particularly the second This brought the first demonstration of the evening and by some it was thought to be the most pleasing portion of the program.

Richard Strauss, composer of the much-discussed and now put-away "Salome," was represented in the second half of the program by his tone poem, "Don Juan." It was a musical coat of many colors. It swept through the gamut of passion, given with deliberation and yet brilliancy. It was characteristic of the composer, who, in "Salome," is said to have exhibited his knowledge of all musical rules and ethics only by the careful way in which every rule is broken and shattered. "Don Juan" was more than pleasing; its warmth and riot of emotion throbbed and echoed; at times it was only a whisper, as of an April wind against the window pane at night; then it roared and raged like a February gale; it told of love and hate, joy and sadness and of life itself.

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," in which the brasses of Wagner are characteristically introduced, closed the splendid program. During the prelude there was a time when Dr. Muck was so quiet and unostentatious about his conducting that he stopped altogether. He stood absolutely motionless. His hand, with the baton, was at his side; he surveyed the waving arms and music-lit eyes of his men. He seemed proud of them, and his confidence in them was eloquently spoken by his inaction.

SOCIETY MUCH IN EVIDENCE.

Audience at Concert Included Many Prominent Leaders in Social Affairs.

That Indianapolis society folk are music lovers is always evidenced when a musical event of prominence takes place, and the concert last evening was an added proof, as the opera house was crowded with a brilliant audience. There were several concert parties, and the music lovers came from all over the State.

Mr. and Mrs. William E. English entertained in their box Mrs. Muck, the wife of the conductor, and Mr. and Mrs. George Gaston. Mr. and Mrs. George A. Gay had as guests in their box Mr. and Mrs. Horace F. Wood, and their guest, Mrs. Holden of Camden, N. J., and Mr. Louis Levey. In Mr. and Mrs. Hugh McGowan's box were Miss McGowan, Miss Frances McGowan, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph McGowan, Mrs. Samuel E. Morss and Mrs. E. B. Peck. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Reid were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Reid. In another box were Mrs. John Holtzman, Mrs. Alexander Lemcke and Miss Eleanor Lemcke. Other people in the audience of musical and social prominece were Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Willard Pierce, Mrs. C. C. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Metzger, Mr. and Mrs. John Schmidt, Miss Julia and Miss Debora Moore, Miss Florence Coffin, Miss Krauss, Miss Gertrude Henry, Dr. and Mrs. Harvey Moore, Mr. and Mrs. George Mueller and daughters, Mrs. H. D. Pierce, Miss Theresa Pierce, Miss Elizabeth Cooper, Miss Clayson, Mrs. Thersa Voss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Bachman, Mr. and Mrs. Ferdinand Mayer, Miss Malott, Mrs. Henry Jameson, Miss Eunice and Miss Augusta Jameson, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Block, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Edenharter, Mr. and Mrs. Louise Hollweg, Mr. and Mrs. George Haerle, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Kurtz, Mr. and Mrs. Herman Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. William Line Elder, Miss Margaret Rockwood, Miss Helen Rockwood, Mrs. Ovid Butler Jameson, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Richards, Miss Edith Wallick, Mr. and Mrs. George Vonnegut, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Kenyon, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Fauvre, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Jillson, Miss Ann Jillson, Miss Fauvre, Mrs. Louis Burckhardt, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Stanley, Miss Eleanor Tucker, Mrs. Carroll Carr, Mr. and Mrs. Noble C. Butler, Miss Ogle, Mr. and Mrs. Frank N. Lewis, Mrs. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Buttolph, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lieber, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Francke, Miss Lillian Reeves, Miss Sue Howe, Miss Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. Emil Martin, Mrs. Charles Bookwalter, Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Schnull and daughter, Miss Schnull, Miss Pauline, Miss Bertha and Miss Louise Schellschmidt, Mr. and Mrs. Victor K. Hendricks, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Cole, Miss Josephine Robinson, Mrs. Henry Kahn, Miss Mary Josephine Wight, Dr. and Mrs. Albert Sterne, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Haueisen, Dr. and Mrs. M. Thorner, Mrs. May Donnan, Miss Margaret Donnan, Dr. and Mrs. Lafayette Page, Miss Margaret Lockwood, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Lathrop, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Vonnegut and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. D. E. Brenneke, Mr. and Mrs. Kerfoot Stewart, Mrs. John Worth Kern, Miss Julia Kern, Dr. and Mrs. Beno Gundelfinger, Dr. Frederick Charlton, Mr. Frederick Fahnley, Miss Carrie Fahnley, Mrs. Gavin Payne, Mrs. E. W. Tripp, Mr. and Mrs. Karl Schneider, Mrs. W. E. Hayward, Miss Hayward, Mr. and Mrs. Lynn Stone, Mr. William Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Block, Mr. Adolph Schellschmidt, Miss Myrtle Parke, Mrs. Charles Foster of Frankfort, Dr. and Mrs. Stone of Purdue University and Dr. and Mrs. Campbell of Indiana University.

[138]

DIRECTOR SWAYS HIS PLAYERS AND AUDIENCE

TRIUMPH OF DR. MUCK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

PLAYING NEAR PERFECTION

The great audience at English's last night was one that did credit to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra that it assembled to hear. The strong personality of the famous director, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin; the perfection of the playing of the large number of musicians and the intense interest and evident appreciation of the audience, were alike great factors that combined to make last night's entertainment, the last of the regular series given under the direction of Ona B. Talbot, a most notable affair.

Dr. Muck received an ovation and the applause grew to unusual proportions at the close of the Brahms symphony. He was obliged to return time and again to the desk and bow his acknowledgments, finally signaling the men of the orchestra to rise and share in the demonstration.

While the playing of the orchestra is superb, it is without doubt the personality of Dr. Muck that predominates. He is a man of magnetism and this was shown in his sway over his men, but no less so over the audience. Rarely does one see a man of stronger personal influence than that possessed by him. It is quite easy to understand why music critics in all the cities have given so much attention to the man and have described him so minutely.

No Grand Flourishes.

His use of the baton is direct and precise, sharp and decisive, forceful to an unusual degree. While he is by no means the almost motionless conductor that Theodore Thomas was, still he has no grand flourishes or tricks, such as are sometimes seen at the director's desk. Dr. Muck has the appearance of a professor of science from a college. He is slender, with clean-cut features, has black hair and wears glasses. He has a modesty of mien that is strictly professional, and except for the magnetism, one would scarcely realize that the strong force of the orchestra was directly in front.

In the opinion of Dr. Muck himself, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the three great orchestras of the world, the others being the Philharmonic, of Berlin, and the Vienna Orchestra. The Boston Symphony is without doubt the greatest in America, and as such every American lover of music and every one that has pride in his country, has a just pride in it. That Indianapolis, and in fact, Indiana, for the audience was made up of people from all parts of the State, had this great organization brought here is a matter of congratulation, for unless the great artists and combinations of artists are brought here, very few persons ever have the privilege of hearing them.

High Degree of Perfection.

Much had been said in praise of the Boston Symphony, but it took a hearing to realize the high degree of perfection attained by a large number of musicians playing under the direction of a master. The program contained only three numbers and the concert was over before 10 o'clock, but so rich had been the feast, that there was no complaint that the program was no longer.

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, with its four movements, constituted the first part of the program, and the tone-poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, after Linau's poem of the same name, by Richard Strauss, and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger," the second part. The three composers are of the modern school, and each is original and unique in himself.

The Brahms number was majestic, the second movement of the symphony, an adagio, being especially beautiful. The other movements were interesting. The tone quality of the instruments and the smoothness of the playing was delicious to the ear. At times the tonal power was like that of a grand organ, in its round, sonorous and overwhelming beauty, diminishing then until it was but a whisper. One could scarcely realize that the music was from a large number of different instruments, instead of a single one, so perfect was the tone quality, the technique and the balance of the different sections.

The easy way in which Willy Hess, concertmeister, handled his instrument was a single evidence of the ease and charm that characterized the handling of every instrument in the great orchestra. There was never the least straining after effect.

Tone Poem Brilliant.

The "Don Juan" tone-poem was kaleidoscopic in its brilliancy. Richard Strauss, its composer, is said to throw all rules of composition to the winds, and it is this and the marvelous effects that he produces that place him in a class all by himself. He is the latest idol of the musical public, and the "Don Juan" is a fine example of what he can do in the way of expression. This poem runs the gamut of human emotions, from the soft dreams to the greatest tragedy. The music at times so sparkles and scintillates, that it seems like the sharp edges of broken crystals, and again it sinks to the calm of a quiet pool. The composition is a great [illegible], and one hearing can give no adequate conception of what it contains.

The only familiar theme on the evening program was that of the "prize song" in "Die Meistersinger," which is used briefly in the prelude to the opera. This is one of the lightest of Wagner's works, and while it has been presented in this city, probably not more than once, [illegible] of it is well known, having been played by orchestras, and [illegible] by soloists.

Interesting to the audience to see how well the music was continued during this interval.

The orchestra left this morning for Cincinnati, where it will give a concert this afternoon and this evening. It will then return to Boston. While Emperor William lent Dr. Muck to America for a year, Boston allowed the orchestra to give a tour of a single week through the West, and the West is profoundly grateful.

Mrs. Talbot announced last night a series of chamber concerts to be given in the sculpture hall of the John Herron Art Institute. The first will be given Wednesday evening, March 6, by Henry Bramsen, Royal Chamber violoncellist to the King of Denmark, first 'cellist of the Pittsburg Orchestra, and Marta Sandal Bramsen, soprano. The second will be April 9, by the famous Kneisel Quartet, that is so well liked in this city, and whose coming is an annual musical event.

Paper [illegible] Star

City Washington

Date JAN 6 - 1907 State D C

At St. Mark's Church, corner of Third and A streets, to-night, there will be given a Christmas carol service, embracing carols traditional, [illegible], and modern. Incidental solos will be given by Miss Cora Spencer and Master Drury Pa[illegible], sopranos; Mrs. Eleanor Baker Spencer, [illegible]; Mr. B. A. Terrell and Mr. George [illegible] Blakeney, tenors; Mr. Charles F. [illegible], baritone, with violin obligato by Mr. La[illegible] Merriman. No cards of admission will be required.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 8, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most popular violinists of the orchestra, whose appearance as a soloist is always warmly welcomed by the patrons of Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for a good many years—not since the orchestra used to come here in times past—so that his appearance will be all the more interesting. He will play Saint Saens' Concerto for violin in B minor, No. 3, one of the most popular works ever written for this instrument.

The programmee which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is decidedly modern in tone. The first work on it will be Elgar's "In the South," a composition the charm of which, always great, grows immensely with repeated hearings.

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Russian school, the school which, while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's Fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never been heard in this city.

The symphony was composed in 1895 and published in 1896. Its first—and until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston month before last its last—American performance was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, under Anton Seidl, on March 5, 1898, just before the distinguished conductor's death.

Glazounoff is a young man and a very prolific writer. He is the son of a rich book seller in St. Petersburg, where he was born in 1865. He has devoted himself, outside of his university work, entirely to music, beginning with the piano when he was nine years old. His most important teachers were Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff. His first symphony was performed in 1891 with great success. Since then his career has been one of almost unbroken success. From 1899 to 1905 he was a professor in the Conservatory of St. Petersburg. In March of the latter year, with Liadoff and others, he left that institution because Rimsky-Korsakoff had been ejected from the presidency because of his sympathy with the students in their political troubles. He has published seven symphonies, several fantasias and symphonic poems, as well as works in smaller form.

SUNDAY HERALD FEBRUARY 3, 1907.

COMING CONCERTS.

The Chickering Chamber concert of Sunday the 10th will be given by the Boston Symphony quartet.

Mme. Maud Powell, the distinguished violinist, will play here at a Symphony concert in the place of Cesar Thomson, who will not come to America this season.

The programme of the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, the 15th and 16th, will include Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" (first time here); Brahms' piano concerto No. [illegible] (Mr. Gabrilowitsch), and Brahms' Academie overture.

Mr. Stephen Townsend, baritone, will give a song recital in Steinert Hall on [illegible] evening of the 18th with the assistance of Mr. Max Heinrich.

The pupils of Frank E. Morse will give a song recital in Steinert Hall on Wednesday evening, the 20th.

Cincinnati

[illegible]

3. Februar 1907

Musikalisches.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Musikhalle.

Wenn man die Thatsache in Betracht zieht, daß das gestrige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Nachmittage stattfand und unter diesen Umständen viele Musikfreunde auf den Genuß der Bostoner Symphoniker zu ihrem größten Bedauern Verzicht leisten mußten, kann der Besuch des Konzertes als recht befriedigend betrachtet werden. An Enthusiasmus fehlte es absolut nicht und Herr Dr. Karl Muck, der geniale Dirigent und seine Künstlerschaar dürfen mit dem Willkomm, der ihnen bereitet wurde und mit dem Applaus, den das Publikum ihnen zollte, wohl zufrieden sein.

Dieser Applaus, diese unbegrenzte Anerkennung waren aber auch vollauf gerechtfertigt, denn das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ohne jede Frage die glänzendste Organisation ihrer Art in diesem Lande und kann sich auch zweifelsohne erfolgreich mit den besten Symphonie-Orchestern der alten Welt messen. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ein Künstler-Orchester im idealsten Sinne des Wortes unter der Leitung eines genialen Dirigenten.

Die Force des Orchesters liegt in erster Linie in den Streichinstrumenten, namentlich den Geigen und es dürfte ein Ding der Unmöglichkeit sein, in irgend einem Orchester ein Geigenensemble von solcher Reinheit und Vorzüglichkeit zu finden, wie das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester es besitzt.

Mit solchem Material können, wenn noch ein so glänzender Dirigent wie Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter ist, ideale Resultate erzielt werden, wie das gestrige Konzert auch unwiderleglich bewies.

Das Hauptinteresse konzentrirte sich selbstredend auf die E-Moll Symphonie von Sibelius, ein hier noch unbekanntes Werk dieses in letzter Zeit überaus in die Mode gekommenen finnischen Komponisten. Wie in allen Kompositionen Sibelius' prädominirt auch in dieser Symphonie das Tragische, das Traurige, wenn auch, besonders im Allegro-Satz sowie im Finale einige freundliche Momente nicht fehlen. Das Werk ist von tiefem Gedankenreichthum und in demselben bekundet sich wieder die Genialität sowie die glänzende Orchestrirungsgabe des Komponisten. Die Wiedergabe war eine in jeder Hinsicht formvollendete und die poetische Auffassung Dr. Mucks war so recht dazu angethan, die klassischen Schönheiten des Tonwerkes hervorzuheben.

Der Solist des Konzertes war Professor Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der sich Beethoven's D-Dur Konzert für Geige ausgewählt hatte. Professor Heß ist ein hervorragender Geigenkünstler. Mit einem großen, durchweg vornehmen Ton verbindet er eine glänzende Technik. Das einzig bedauerliche Element war nur, daß Herr Heß augenscheinlich etwas nervös war und infolgedessen verschiedentlich ein wenig hastete. Bis auf diesen kleinen Uebelstand war die Interpretation des Werkes eine ganz vorzügliche und sein eminentes Können auf technischem Gebiet that der Solist namentlich im Larghetto sowie im Rondo dar. Vom Orchester wurde Herr Heß in der denkbar besten Weise unterstützt. Das Publikum sowie seine Kollegen an den Pulten bereiteten dem Solisten enthusiastische Ovationen und er wurde durch mehrere Hervorrufe geehrt.

Außerdem brachte das Konzert noch die herrliche Oberon-Ouvertüre, die poesievollste Tonschöpfung Carl Maria von Weber's, in einer Aufführung, wie sie eindrucksvoller kaum gedacht werden könnte. Von wahrhaft berückender Schönheit waren die Pianissimo-Passagen und das Publikum dankte dem genialen Dirigenten sowie seiner Künstlerschaar für diesen hehren Genuß durch einen wahren Beifallssturm.

* * *

---

r Post

Cincinnati

State 0 I

Feb 3/07

Musikalisches.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Musikhalle.

Wenn man die Thatsache in Betracht zieht, daß das gestrige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Nachmittage stattfand und unter diesen Umständen viele Musikfreunde auf den Genuß der Bostoner Symphoniker zu ihrem größten Bedauern Verzicht leisten mußten, kann der Besuch des Konzertes als recht befriedigend betrachtet werden. An Enthusiasmus fehlte es absolut nicht und Herr Dr. Karl Muck, der geniale Dirigent und seine Künstlerschaar dürfen mit dem Willkomm, der ihnen bereitet wurde und mit dem Applaus, den das Publikum ihnen zollte, wohl zufrieden sein.

Dieser Applaus, diese unbegrenzte Anerkennung waren aber auch vollauf gerechtfertigt, denn das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ohne jede Frage die glänzendste Organisation ihrer Art in diesem Lande und kann sich auch zweifelsohne erfolgreich mit den besten Symphonie-Orchestern der alten Welt messen. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ein Künstler-Orchester im idealsten Sinne des Wortes unter der Leitung eines genialen Dirigenten.

Die Force des Orchesters liegt in erster Linie in den Streichinstrumenten, namentlich den Geigen und es dürfte ein Ding der Unmöglichkeit sein, in irgend einem Orchester ein Geigenensemble von solcher Reinheit und Vorzüglichkeit zu finden, wie das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester es besitzt.

Mit solchem Material können, wenn noch ein so glänzender Dirigent wie Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter ist, ideale Resultate erzielt werden, wie das gestrige Konzert auch unwiderleglich bewies.

Das Hauptinteresse konzentrirte sich selbstredend auf die E-Moll Symphonie von Sibelius, ein hier noch unbekanntes Werk dieses in letzter Zeit überaus in die Mode gekommenen finnischen Komponisten. Wie in allen Kompositionen Sibelius' prädominirt auch in dieser Symphonie das Tragische, das Traurige, wenn auch, besonders im Allegro-Satz sowie im Finale einige freundliche Momente nicht fehlen. Das Werk ist von tiefem Gedankenreichthum und in demselben bekundet sich wieder die Genialität sowie die glänzende Orchestrirungsgabe des Komponisten. Die Wiedergabe war eine in jeder Hinsicht formvollendete und die poetische Auffassung Dr. Mucks war so recht dazu angethan, die klassischen Schönheiten des Tonwerkes hervorzuheben.

Der Solist des Konzertes war Professor Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der sich Beethoven's D-Dur Konzert für Geige ausgewählt hatte. Professor Heß ist ein hervorragender Geigenkünstler. Mit einem großen, durchweg vornehmen Ton verbindet er eine glänzende Technik. Das einzig bedauerliche Element war nur, daß Herr Heß augenscheinlich etwas nervös war und infolgedessen verschiedentlich ein wenig hastete. Bis auf diesen kleinen Uebelstand war die Interpretation des Werkes eine ganz vorzügliche und sein eminentes Können auf technischem Gebiet that der Solist namentlich im Larghetto sowie im Rondo dar. Vom Orchester wurde Herr Heß in der denkbar besten Weise unterstützt. Das Publikum sowie seine Kollegen an den Pulten bereiteten dem Solisten enthusiastische Ovationen und er wurde durch mehrere Hervorrufe geehrt.

Außerdem brachte das Konzert noch die herrliche Oberon-Ouvertüre, die poesievollste Tonschöpfung Carl Maria von Weber's, in einer Aufführung, wie sie eindrucksvoller kaum gedacht werden könnte. Von wahrhaft berückender Schönheit waren die Pianissimo-Passagen und das Publikum dankte dem genialen Dirigenten sowie seiner Künstlerschaar für diesen hehren Genuß durch einen wahren Beifallssturm.

---

[139]

Indianapolis News

DIRECTOR SWAYS HIS PLAYERS AND AUDIENCE

TRIUMPH OF DR. MUCK WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY.

PLAYING NEAR PERFECTION

The great audience at English's last night was one that did credit to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra that it assembled to hear. The strong personality of the famous director, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin; the perfection of the playing of the large number of musicians and the intense interest and evident appreciation of the audience, were alike great factors that combined to make last night's entertainment, the last of the regular series given under the direction of Ona B. Talbot, a most notable affair.

Dr. Muck received an ovation and the applause grew to unusual proportions at the close of the Brahms symphony. He was obliged to return time and again to the desk and bow his acknowledgments, finally signaling the men of the orchestra to rise and share in the demonstration.

While the playing of the orchestra is superb, it is without doubt the personality of Dr. Muck that predominates. He is a man of magnetism and this was shown in his sway over his men, but no less so over the audience. Rarely does one see a man of stronger personal influence than that possessed by him. It is quite easy to understand why music critics in all the cities have given so much attention to the man and have described him so minutely.

No Grand Flourishes.

His use of the baton is direct and precise, sharp and decisive, forceful to an unusual degree. While he is by no means the almost motionless conductor that Theodore Thomas was, still he has no grand flourishes or tricks, such as are sometimes seen at the director's desk. Dr. Muck has the appearance of a professor of science from a college. He is slender, with clean-cut features, has black hair and wears glasses. He has a modesty of mien that is strictly professional, and except for the magnetism, one would scarcely realize that the strong force of the orchestra was directly in front.

In the opinion of Dr. Muck himself, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the three great orchestras of the world, the others being the Philharmonic, of Berlin, and the Vienna Orchestra. The Boston Symphony is without doubt the greatest in America, and as such every American lover of music and every one that has pride in his country, has a just pride in it. That Indianapolis, and in fact, Indiana, for the audience was made up of people from all parts of the State, had this great organization brought here is a matter of congratulation, for unless the great artists and combinations of artists are brought here, very few persons ever have the privilege of hearing them.

High Degree of Perfection.

Much had been said in praise of the Boston Symphony, but it took a hearing to realize the high degree of perfection attained by a large number of musicians playing under the direction of a master. The program contained only three numbers and the concert was over before 10 o'clock, but so rich had been the feast, that there was no complaint that the program was no longer.

The Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, with its four movements, constituted the first part of the program, and the tone-poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20, after Linau's poem of the same name, by Richard Strauss, and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger," the second part. The three composers are of the modern school, and each is original and unique in himself.

The Brahms number was majestic, the second movement of the symphony, an adagio, being especially beautiful. The other movements were interesting. The tone quality of the instruments and the smoothness of the playing was delicious to the ear. At times the tonal power was like that of a grand organ, in its round, sonorous and overwhelming beauty, diminishing then until it was but a whisper. One could scarcely realize that the music was from a large number of different instruments, instead of a single one, so perfect was the tone quality, the technique and the balance of the different sections.

The easy way in which Willy Hess, concertmeister, handled his instrument was a single evidence of the ease and charm that characterized the handling of every instrument in the great orchestra. There was never the least straining after effect.

Tone Poem Brilliant.

The "Don Juan" tone-poem was kaleidoscopic in its brilliancy. Richard Strauss, its composer, is said to throw all rules of composition to the winds, and it is this and the marvelous effects that he produces that place him in a class all by himself. He is the latest idol of the musical public, and the "Don Juan" is a fine example of what he can do in the way of expression. This poem runs the gamut of human emotions, from the soft dreams to the greatest tragedy. The music at times so sparkles and scintillates, that it seems like the sharp edges of broken crystals, and again it sinks to the calm of a quiet pool. The composition is a great study, and one hearing can give no adequate conception of what it contains.

The only familiar theme on the evening's program was that of the "prize song" in "Die Meistersinger," which is heard briefly in the prelude to the opera. This is one of the lightest of Wagner's operas, and while it has been presented in this city, probably not more than once, the music of it is well known, having often been played by orchestras, and many of its themes by soloists.

The [illegible] Muck stood quietly at his desk and let the men play without him, though he was careful to take up his work again when it was time to lead. It is one of Dr. Muck's customs to take a little rest during the evening, and it was interesting to the audience to see how well the music was continued during this interval.

The orchestra left this morning for Cincinnati, where it will give a concert this afternoon and this evening. It will then return to Boston. While Emperor William lent Dr. Muck to America for a year, Boston allowed the orchestra to give a tour of a single week through the West, and the West is profoundly grateful.

Mrs. Talbot announced last night a series of chamber concerts to be given in sculpture hall of the John Herron Art Institute. The first will be given Wednesday evening, March 6, by Henry Bramsen, Royal Chamber violoncellist to the King of Denmark, first 'cellist of the Pittsburg Orchestra, and Marta Sandal Bramsen, soprano. The second will be April 9, by the famous Kneisel Quartet, that is so well liked in this city, and whose coming is an annual musical event.

Paper Star

City Washington

Date JAN 6 - 1907 State D C

At St. Mark's Church, corner of Third and A streets, to-night, there will be given a Christmas carol service, embracing carols traditional, ancient, and modern. Incidental solos will be given by Miss Cora Spencer and Master Drury Pa[illegible], sopranos; Mrs. Eleanor Baker Spencer, contralto; Mr. B. A. Terrell and Mr. George [illegible] Blakeney, tenors; Mr. Charles F. [illegible], baritone, with violin obligato by Mr. Law[illegible] Herriman. No cards of admission will be required.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 8, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most popular violinists of the orchestra, whose appearance as a soloist is always warmly welcomed by the patrons of Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for a good many years—not since the orchestra used to come here in times past—so that his appearance will be all the more interesting. He will play Saint Saens' Concerto for violin in B minor, No. 3, one of the most popular works ever written for this instrument.

The programmee which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert is decidedly modern in tone. The first work on it will be Elgar's "In the South," a composition the charm of which, always great, grows immensely with repeated hearings.

The symphony will be an interesting example of the neo-Russian school, the school which, while admitting Tschaikowsky's greatness, has always denied that he was typically Russian. It is Glazounoff's Fifth, in B flat major, a work which has never been heard in this city.

The symphony was composed in 1895 and published in 1896. Its first—and until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston month before last its last—American performance was by the Philharmonic Society of New York, under Anton Seidl, on March 5, 1898, just before the distinguished conductor's death.

Glazounoff is a young man and a very prolific writer. He is the son of a rich book seller in St. Petersburg, where he was born in 1865. He has devoted himself, outside of his university work, entirely to music, beginning with the piano when he was nine years old. His most important teachers were Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsdakoff. His first symphony was performed in 1881 with great success. Since then his career has been one of almost unbroken success. From 1899 to 1905 he was a professor in the Conservatory of St. Petersburg. In March of the latter year, with Liadoff and others, he left that institution because Rimsky-Korsakoff had been ejected from the presidency because of his sympathy with the students in their political troubles. He has published seven symphonies, several fantasias and symphonic poems, as well as works in smaller form.

SUNDAY HERALD
FEBRUARY 3, 1907.

COMING CONCERTS.

The Chickering Chamber concert of Sunday the 10th will be given by the Boston Symphony quartet.

Mme. Maud Powell, the distinguished violinist, will play here at a Symphony concert in the place of Cesar Thomson, who will not come to America this season.

The programme of the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, the 15th and 16th, will include Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" (first time here); Brahms' piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch), and Brahms' Academic overture.

Mr. Stephen Townsend, baritone, will give a song recital in Steinert Hall on the evening of the 18th with the assistance of Mr. Max Heinrich.

The pupils of Frank E. Morse will give a song recital in Steinert Hall on Wednesday evening, the 20th.

Cincinnati
„Westliche Blätter"
v. 3. Februar 1907

Musikalisches.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Musikhalle.

Wenn man die Thatsache in Betracht zieht, daß das gestrige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Nachmittage stattfand und unter diesen Umständen viele Musikfreunde auf den Genuß der Bostoner Symphoniker zu ihrem größten Bedauern Verzicht leisten mußten, kann der Besuch des Konzertes als recht befriedigend betrachtet werden. An Enthusiasmus fehlte es absolut nicht und Herr Dr. Karl Muck, der geniale Dirigent und seine Künstlerschaar dürfen mit dem Willkomm, der ihnen bereitet wurde und mit dem Applaus, den das Publikum ihnen zollte, wohl zufrieden sein.

Dieser Applaus, diese unbegrenzte Anerkennung waren aber auch vollauf gerechtfertigt, denn das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ohne jede Frage die glänzendste Organisation ihrer Art in diesem Lande und kann sich auch zweifelsohne erfolgreich mit den besten Symphonie-Orchestern der alten Welt messen. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ein Künstler-Orchester im idealsten Sinne des Wortes unter der Leitung eines genialen Dirigenten.

Die Force des Orchesters liegt in erster Linie in den Streichinstrumenten, namentlich den Geigen und es dürfte ein Ding der Unmöglichkeit sein, in irgend einem Orchester ein Geigenensemble von solcher Reinheit und Vorzüglichkeit zu finden, wie das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester es besitzt.

Mit solchem Material können, wenn noch ein so glänzender Dirigent wie Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter ist, ideale Resultate erzielt werden, wie das gestrige Konzert auch unwiderleglich bewies

Das Hauptinteresse konzentrirte sich selbstredend auf die E-Moll Symphonie von Sibelius, ein hier noch unbekanntes Werk dieses in letzter Zeit überaus in die Mode gekommenen finnischen Komponisten. Wie in allen Kompositionen Sibelius' prädominirt auch in dieser Symphonie das Tragische, das Traurige, wenn auch, besonders im Allegro-Satz sowie im Finale einige freundliche Momente nicht fehlen. Das Werk ist von tiefem Gedankenreichthum und in demselben bekundet sich wieder die Genialität sowie die glänzende Orchestrirungsgabe des Komponisten. Die Wiedergabe war eine in jeder Hinsicht formvollendete und die poetische Auffassung Dr. Mucks war so recht dazu angethan, die klassischen Schönheiten des Tonwerkes hervorzuheben.

Der Solist des Konzertes war Professor Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der sich Beethoven's D-Dur Konzert für Geige ausgewählt hatte. Professor Heß ist ein hervorragender Geigenkünstler. Mit einem großen, durchweg vornehmen Ton verbindet er eine glänzende Technik. Das einzig bedauerliche Element war nur, daß Herr Heß augenscheinlich etwas nervös war und infolgedessen verschiedentlich ein wenig hastete. Bis auf diesen kleinen Uebelstand war die Interpretation des Werkes eine ganz vorzügliche und sein eminentes Können auf technischem Gebiet that der Solist namentlich im Larghetto sowie im Rondo dar. Vom Orchester wurde Herr Heß in der denkbar besten Weise unterstützt. Das Publikum sowie seine Kolleaen an den Pulten bereiteten dem Solisten enthusiastische Ovationen und er wurde durch mehrere Hervorrufe geehrt.

Außerdem brachte das Konzert noch die herrliche Oberon-Ouvertüre, die poesievollste Tonschöpfung Carl Maria von Weber's, in einer Aufführung, wie sie eindrucksvoller kaum gedacht werden könnte. Von wahrhaft berückender Schönheit waren die Pianissimo-Passagen und das Publikum dankte dem genialen Dirigenten sowie seiner Künstlerschaar für diesen hehren Genuß durch einen wahren Beifallssturm.

* * *

Post

Cincinnati

State O I

Feb 8/07

Musikalisches.

Das gestrige Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in der Musikhalle.

Wenn man die Thatsache in Betracht zieht, daß das gestrige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters am Nachmittage stattfand und unter diesen Umständen viele Musikfreunde auf den Genuß der Bostoner Symphoniker zu ihrem größten Bedauern Verzicht leisten mußten, kann der Besuch des Konzertes als recht befriedigend betrachtet werden. An Enthusiasmus fehlte es absolut nicht und Herr Dr. Karl Muck, der geniale Dirigent und seine Künstlerschaar dürfen mit dem Willkomm, der ihnen bereitet wurde und mit dem Applaus, den das Publikum ihnen zollte, wohl zufrieden sein.

Dieser Applaus, diese unbegrenzte Anerkennung waren aber auch vollauf gerechtfertigt, denn das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ohne jede Frage die glänzendste Organisation ihrer Art in diesem Lande und kann sich auch zweifelsohne erfolgreich mit den besten Symphonie-Orchestern der alten Welt messen. Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester ist ein Künstler-Orchester im idealsten Sinne des Wortes unter der Leitung eines genialen Dirigenten.

Die Force des Orchesters liegt in erster Linie in den Streichinstrumenten, namentlich den Geigen und es dürfte ein Ding der Unmöglichkeit sein, in irgend einem Orchester ein Geigenensemble von solcher Reinheit und Vorzüglichkeit zu finden, wie das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester es besitzt.

Mit solchem Material können, wenn noch ein so glänzender Dirigent wie Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter ist, ideale Resultate erzielt werden, wie das gestrige Konzert auch unwiderleglich bewies

Das Hauptinteresse konzentrirte sich selbstredend auf die E-Moll Symphonie von Sibelius, ein hier noch unbekanntes Werk dieses in letzter Zeit überaus in die Mode gekommenen finnischen Komponisten. Wie in allen Kompositionen Sibelius' prädominirt auch in dieser Symphonie das Tragische, das Traurige, wenn auch, besonders im Allegro-Satz sowie im Finale einige freundliche Momente nicht fehlen. Das Werk ist von tiefem Gedankenreichthum und in demselben bekundet sich wieder die Genialität sowie die glänzende Orchestrirungsgabe des Komponisten. Die Wiedergabe war eine in jeder Hinsicht formvollendete und die poetische Auffassung Dr. Mucks war so recht dazu angethan, die klassischen Schönheiten des Tonwerkes hervorzuheben.

Der Solist des Konzertes war Professor Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, der sich Beethoven's D-Dur Konzert für Geige ausgewählt hatte. Professor Heß ist ein hervorragender Geigenkünstler. Mit einem großen, durchweg vornehmen Ton verbindet er eine glänzende Technik. Das einzig bedauerliche Element war nur, daß Herr Heß augenscheinlich etwas nervös war und infolgedessen verschiedentlich ein wenig hastete. Bis auf diesen kleinen Uebelstand war die Interpretation des Werkes eine ganz vorzügliche und sein eminentes Können auf technischem Gebiet that der Solist namentlich im Larghetto sowie im Rondo dar. Vom Orchester wurde Herr Heß in der denkbar besten Weise unterstützt. Das Publikum sowie seine Kolleaen an den Pulten bereiteten dem Solisten enthusiastische Ovationen und er wurde durch mehrere Hervorrufe geehrt.

Außerdem brachte das Konzert noch die herrliche Oberon-Ouvertüre, die poesievollste Tonschöpfung Carl Maria von Weber's, in einer Aufführung, wie sie eindrucksvoller kaum gedacht werden könnte. Von wahrhaft berückender Schönheit waren die Pianissimo-Passagen und das Publikum dankte dem genialen Dirigenten sowie seiner Künstlerschaar für diesen hehren Genuß durch einen wahren Beifallssturm.

[139]

Paper Press
City New York
State NY
Date FEB 3 - 1907

Reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is anxious to retain his services and that Dr. Muck would like to stay in America. But he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, and it seems the leave of absence was granted only on condition that he sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. Unfortunately it is very doubtful whether this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the difficult task of trying to replace him next season.

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB - 3 State N

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADERSHIP

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next Fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Ledger
City Philadelphia
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State

Madame Melba, who has not been heard in Philadelphia this season, will be the soloist at the February concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State NY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the printed report that Dr. Muck has been reengaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next Fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 4 - 1907 State NY

Fifteen symphony concerts in this city in the current fifteen days was our recent forecast. And this while Boston Symphony men are just returning home from their Western tour and the Pittsburg Orchestra is still in the Canadian provinces.

The Cincinnati Orchestra this week is introducing the Sibelius violin concerto with Maud Powell, who first played it in New York.

Paper Star
City Milwaukee Evening
Date FEB 5 - 1907 State Wis.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played on Saturday afternoon and also drew out an exceptionally large audience. From the first strains of the Oberon overture the audience was electrified by the perfection of the ensemble, the discretion of the leader and the impeccable character of the whole performance. The Boston orchestra is, of course, a thing apart. It is the supreme achievement of band playing, unhampered by those untoward conditions which habitually attend the concerts of organizations less fortunately endowed. The money question has no part in securing men for the Boston orchestra. The best man for the place is secured at any price and an artistic devotee foots the bills. From the standpoint of playing there was no comment to offer. The concert was perfect of its kind, the orchestra so finely balanced that when one notes the dulcet qualities of the brass choir, melodious, despite the warring elements of inclement weather, all is said. Dr. Karl Muck, the famous leader, left an impression of a conductor who is at his best in the classics, and undying regret is expressed that he did not give to Cincinnati one of the readings of the classic symphonies which are dear to the heart of this public. Dr. Muck gave instead the premier hearing of a great new symphony and so, declining to add to his personal laurels through a representation which might have presented him in the very best light, he offered the newest and, to his judgment, the most interesting study which has lately been introduced into the realm of orchestral music—the Sibelius No. 1 Symphony, a thing of poignant inspiration and magnificent orchestral possibilities. This also was an object lesson from the standpoint of orchestral perfection and still conveyed the impression that it was too perfect and made one long for the Beethoven and Brahms and Schubert and Schumann symphonies. But to all who heard the concert, and they were many, it was one of sheer delight.

—oxo—

And in connection with this comment the personal equation is forcibly introduced. Immediately preceding the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a request was received from an anonymous correspondent that an analysis of the Sibelius Symphony should be published in the next issue of the paper. Had an address been furnished, it would have been possible to send a letter explaining conditions which prevented so reasonable and seasonable a demand from being gratified. The answer is—that the musical column of the Times-Star is published but once a week, and that on Tuesday. Requests for special work must reach the paper before Monday noon of the issue, and for the analysis desired some time must be allowed. Happily the material was at hand, and had the exigencies of actual news permitted, the analysis would have been published, and gladly. The writer of this column is never more flattered than when such requests are proffered, and could she but convince the powers that be, the musical column of the Times-Star would appear every day. As it is unknown correspondents are invited to sign a name or send an addressed and stamped envelope for reply, but they are also implored not to request solutions of technical problems which are to be met with in any and every music primer, nor to imperatively demand the solution of such abstruse problems as to why all musicians wear long hair. Many do it, but some do not, and the answer is—because they like it that way. This, be it known, is the question which is most frequently sent in to the writer of a music column. N. P. S.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 5 - 1907 State NY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston on Sunday eveping, February 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30. The concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near to the record for an orchestral concert, the press agent thinks.

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., NO. 37.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 6, 1907.

WORCESTER LOSES SYMPHONY BY SNOW

Concert Cancelled, as Players Feared Storm Would Hold Them in City.

FOOT OF SNOW TIES UP STREET AND STEAM CARS

Freight Traffic Practically Abandoned—Other Bay State Cities Suffer.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WORCESTER, Feb. 5, 1907. The storm today was the worst that Worcester has experienced this season. Up to noon more than a foot of snow had fallen.

The drifts in outside towns are deep, and the lines from Southbridge, Spencer, Webster and Clinton are considerably off schedule. The Boston & Worcester is having one of its worst experiences since its opening on account of the drifts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance has been postponed owing to the inability of the B. & A. to guarantee it a return train tonight on account of the snow.

It was not until after the noon hour that there was any sign of a let-up in the snowfall. Freight traffic on the steam roads is practically abandoned.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FEBRUARY 9, 1907.

The Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will bring the most important novelty that Boston has had in several years, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," on which the orchestra has been at work for several weeks. Th's is one of the few monumental orchestral works which has had its first performance in America. Until his opera, "Salome," was given to the public last spring in Germany, Strauss had never written any work which caused so much controversy as this "Sinfonia Domestica."

The patrons of the Symphony concerts are most urgently requested to be in their seats promptly at the beginning of the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and of the concert on Saturday evening. The "Sinfonia Domestica" lasts in the neighborhood of 50 minutes, and is played without a pause so that those who come late will not be admitted to the hall until intermission.

The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, a favorite pianist here.

Paper Eagle
City New York Brooklyn
Date State N Y

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening, February 22. She will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for the piano, in B-flat minor. The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Emile Ferir playing the solo viola. The other number on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Bethrothed of the Tsar."

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 5 - 1907 State NY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston on Sunday eveping, February 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30. The concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near to the record for an orchestral concert, the press agent thinks.

Paper Ledger Journal
City Philadelphia Providence
State R I

Madame Melba's appearance at the fourth Boston Symphony concert on February 16, will be the only opportunity of hearing this famous singer which Philadelphians will have this season. The extension of her engagement with the Manhattan Opera Company will prevent her projected concert tour in March. She sails for England on the 26th of that month to keep her engagements in London. The price of seats is to be raised for the symphony concert on February 16.

LONGY CLUB GIVES ITS LAST CONCERT

Well Contrasted Programme, Including an Early Work of Richard Strauss.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club gave the third and last concert of its seventh season in Potter Hall last night. The programme was as follows: Beethoven, trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, op. 11 (Messrs. Grisez, Keller and De Voto); Richard Strauss, Waldhorn concerto, op. 11 (Messrs Hain and De Voto); Arthur Bird, serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons (Messrs. D. Maquarre and Brooke, Longy and Lenom, Grisez and Mimart, Hain and Lorbeer, Sadony and Helleberg).

The programme was well contrasted. Beethoven's trio for piano, clarinet (or violin) and 'cello was published in 1798. The theme of the variations was taken from an opera by Weigl, "The Corsair," which was produced the year before.

There is a story that a famous Viennese publisher showed the theme to Beethoven and asked him to vary it; that the composer did not know the author of the tune until he had completed his work, and then he was exceeding wroth. Others say that he himself chose the tune to gratify a clarinet virtuoso for whom he wrote the trio.

However this may be, the music is delightfully, not stupidly, old-fashioned. In the adagio and in some of the variations there are suggestions of the later Beethoven, so that the hearer today can the more readily understand a remark made by a German music journal when the trio first appeared, viz.: "With his uncommon knowledge of harmony and his serious taste Beethoven could do good things if he were willing to write in a more natural manner." The performance last night was excellent, although in the first movement the 'cello was inclined to assume too much importance.

The father of Richard Strauss was a mighty horn player before the Lord, and the son was perhaps thus influenced in the composition of a concerto for that instrument. There was a time when flute, oboe, clarinet and horn concertos were heard in symphony concerts, and even the bassoon and the trombone were not slighted as solo instruments in orchestral concerts of the first rank. One by one they have dropped out, and it is only a question of time when the 'cello will join them. May the day soon come!

Richard Strauss wrote the concerto in 1883 or 1884, when he was under the spell of Schumann, fond of Raff, and a timid worshipper of Wagner, before Alexander Ritter had converted him to the ideas that were then ultra-modern. Compared with the earlier symphonic poems of Strauss, this concerto is naive. The themes are simple and commonplace. In his instrumental music Strauss is seldom thematically strong. The harmonies are orthodox, and, in fact, the work at the time it was composed gave little promise of a brilliant future.

It may not be amiss to add, in view of the absurd pother about "Salome," raised especially by otherwise estimable persons who have not read Wilde's tragedy or seen the opera, that this concerto is a moral work. There is not a measure that could bring the blush of shame to even the most sensitive critic in New York. The horn is used as an instrument and never emblematically, and Mr. Hain played it in a highly moral manner. Mr. de Voto, whose polished mechanism and agreeable touch gave much pleasure in the rococo passages of the trio, ably seconded Mr. Hain in the concerto. The most striking feature of the work is the andante, though in the finale Strauss avoids ingeniously and more than once downright melodic vulgarity.

Mr. Arthur Bird's Serenade contains an adagio in which the English horn, played admirably by Mr. Lenom, has an important and poetic part. The other movements have less distinction, but the workmanship shows a trained musician. Early in Mr. Nikisch's reign over the Symphony orchestra two pieces by Bird, an "Oriental Scene" and an intermezzo, were played here. They were full of fancy and color. It is a pity that Mr. Bird has taken life so easily of late years. He was a composer of true promise, and his critical articles published in sundry musical periodicals show him to be a man of much acumen and fastidious taste.

There was an appreciative audience of fair size.

Paper Times
City Washington
Date FEB 10 1907 State D C

The fourth of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will take place at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 19. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

[140]

Paper Press
City New York
State N Y
Date FEB 3 - 1907

Reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is anxious to retain his services and that Dr. Muck would like to stay in America. But he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, and it seems the leave of absence was granted only on condition that he sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. Unfortunately it is very doubtful whether this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the difficult task of trying to replace him next season.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N
FEB 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADERSHIP

Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next Fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Ledger
City Philadelphia
Date FEB 3 - 1907 State Pa

Madame Melba, who has not been heard in Philadelphia this season, will be the soloist at the February concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the printed report that Dr. Muck has been reengaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years which goes into effect next Fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

Fifteen symphony concerts in this town in the current fifteen days was our recent forecast. And this while Boston Symphony men are just returning home from their Western tour and the Pittsburg Orchestra is still in the Canadian provinces.

The Cincinnati Orchestra this week is producing the Sibelius violin concerto with Maud Powell, who first played it in New York.

Paper Star
City Milwaukee
State Wis.
Date FEB 5 - 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra played on Saturday afternoon and also drew out an exceptionally large audience. From the first strains of the Oberon overture the audience was electrified by the perfection of the ensemble, the discretion of the leader and the impeccable character of the whole performance. The Boston orchestra is, of course, a thing apart. It is the supreme achievement of band playing, unhampered by those untoward conditions which habitually attend the concerts of organizations less fortunately endowed. The money question has no part in securing men for the Boston orchestra. The best man for the place is secured at any price and an artistic devotee foots the bills. From the standpoint of playing there was no comment to offer. The concert was perfect of its kind, the orchestra so finely balanced that when one notes the dulcet qualities of the brass choir, melodious, despite the warring elements of inclement weather, all is said. Dr. Karl Muck, the famous leader, left an impression of a conductor who is at his best in the classics, and undying regret is expressed that he did not give to Cincinnati one of the readings of the classic symphonies which are dear to the heart of this public. Dr. Muck gave instead the premier hearing of a great new symphony and so, declining to add to his personal laurels through a representation which might have presented him in the very best light, he offered the newest and, to his judgment, the most interesting study which has lately been introduced into the realm of orchestral music—the Sibelius No. 1 Symphony, a thing of poignant inspiration and magnificent orchestral possibilities. This also was an object lesson from the standpoint of orchestral perfection and still conveyed the impression that it was too perfect and made one long for the Beetnoven and Brahms and Schubert and Schumann symphonies. But to all who heard the concert, and they were many, it was one of sheer delight.

—OXO—

And in connection with this comment the personal equation is forcibly introduced. Immediately preceding the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra a request was received from an anonymous correspondent that an analysis of the Sibelius Symphony should be published in the next issue of the paper. Had an address been furnished, it would have been possible to send a letter explaining conditions which prevented so reasonable and seasonable a demand from being gratified. The answer is—that the musical column of the Times-Star is published but once a week, and that on Tuesday. Requests for special work must reach the paper before Monday noon of the issue, and for the analysis desired some time must be allowed. Happily the material was at hand, and had the exigencies of actual news permitted, the analysis would have been published, and gladly. The writer of this column is never more flattered than when such requests are proffered, and could she but convince the powers that be, the musical column of the Times-Star would appear every day. As it is unknown correspondents are invited to sign a name or send an addressed and stamped envelope for reply, but they are also implored not to request solutions of technical problems which are to be met with in any and every music primer, nor to imperatively demand the solution of such abstruse problems as to why all musicians wear long hair. Many do it, but some do not, and the answer is—because they like it that way. This, be it known, is the question which is most frequently sent in to the writer of a music column. N. P. S.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date State N Y
FEB 3 - 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston on Sunday evening, February 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30. The concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near to the record for an orchestral concert, the press agent thinks.

BOSTON HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., NO. 37.
WEDNESDAY, FEB. 6, 1907.

WORCESTER LOSES SYMPHONY BY SNOW

Concert Cancelled, as Players Feared Storm Would Hold Them in City.

FOOT OF SNOW TIES UP STREET AND STEAM CARS

Freight Traffic Practically Abandoned—Other Bay State Cities Suffer.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WORCESTER, Feb. 5, 1907. The storm today was the worst that Worcester has experienced this season. Up to noon more than a foot of snow had fallen.

The drifts in outside towns are deep, and the lines from Southbridge, Spencer, Webster and Clinton are considerably off schedule. The Boston & Worcester is having one of its worst experiences since its opening on account of the drifts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance has been postponed owing to the inability of the B. & A. to guarantee it a return train tonight on account of the snow.

It was not until after the noon hour that there was any sign of a let-up in the snowfall. Freight traffic on the steam roads is practically abandoned.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FEBRUARY 9, 1907.

THE Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday will bring the most important novelty that Boston has had in several years, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," on which the orchestra has been at work for several weeks. This is one of the few monumental orchestral works which has had its first performance in America. Until his opera, "Salome," was given to the public last spring in Germany, Strauss had never written any work which caused so much controversy as this "Sinfonia Domestica."

The patrons of the Symphony concerts are most urgently requested to be in their seats promptly at the beginning of the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and of the concert on Saturday evening. The "Sinfonia Domestica" lasts in the neighborhood of 50 minutes, and is played without a pause so that those who come late will not be admitted to the hall until intermission.

The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, a favorite pianist here.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening, February 22. She will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for the piano, in B-flat minor. The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Emile Ferir playing the solo viola. The other number on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Bethrothed of the Tsar."

Paper Journal
City Providence
State R I

Madame Melba's appearance at the fourth Boston Symphony concert on February 18, will be the only opportunity of hearing this famous singer which Philadelphians will have this season. The extension of her engagement with the Manhattan Opera Company will prevent her projected concert tour in March. She sails for England on the 26th of that month to keep her engagements in London. The price of seats is to be raised for the symphony concert on February 18.

BOSTON HERALD
FEBRUARY 7, 1907.

LONGY CLUB GIVES ITS LAST CONCERT

Well Contrasted Programme, Including an Early Work of Richard Strauss.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club gave the third and last concert of its seventh season in Potter Hall last night. The programme was as follows: Beethoven, trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, op. 11 (Messrs. Grisez, Keller and De Voto); Richard Strauss, Waldhorn concerto, op. 11 (Messrs Hain and De Voto); Arthur Bird, serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons (Messrs. D. Maquarre and Brooke, Longy and Lenom, Grisez and Mimart, Hain and Lorbeer, Sadony and Helleberg).

The programme was well contrasted. Beethoven's trio for piano, clarinet (or violin) and 'cello was published in 1798. The theme of the variations was taken from an opera by Weigl, "The Corsair," which was produced the year before.

There is a story that a famous Viennese publisher showed the theme to Beethoven and asked him to vary it; that the composer did not know the author of the tune until he had completed his work, and then he was exceeding wroth. Others say that he himself chose the tune to gratify a clarinet virtuoso for whom he wrote the trio.

However this may be, the music is delightfully, not stupidly, old-fashioned. In the adagio and in some of the variations there are suggestions of the later Beethoven, so that the hearer today can the more readily understand a remark made by a German music journal when the trio first appeared, viz.: "With his uncommon knowledge of harmony and his serious taste Beethoven could do good things if he were willing to write in a more natural manner." The performance last night was excellent, although in the first movement the 'cello was inclined to assume too much importance.

The father of Richard Strauss was a mighty horn player before the Lord, and the son was perhaps thus influenced in the composition of a concerto for that instrument. There was a time when flute, oboe, clarinet and horn concertos were heard in symphony concerts, and even the bassoon and the trombone were not slighted as solo instruments in orchestral concerts of the first rank. One by one they have dropped out, and it is only a question of time when the 'cello will join them. May the day soon come!

Richard Strauss wrote the concerto in 1883 or 1884, when he was under the spell of Schumann, fond of Raff, and a timid worshipper of Wagner, before Alexander Ritter had converted him to the ideas that were then ultra-modern. Compared with the earlier symphonic poems of Strauss, this concerto is naive. The themes are simple and commonplace. In his instrumental music Strauss is seldom thematically strong. The harmonies are orthodox, and, in fact, the work at the time it was composed gave little promise of a brilliant future.

It may not be amiss to add, in view of the absurd pother about "Salome," raised especially by otherwise estimable persons who have not read Wilde's tragedy or seen the opera, that this concerto is a moral work. There is not a measure that could bring the blush of shame to even the most sensitive critic in New York. The horn is used as an instrument and never emblematically, and Mr. Hain played it in a highly moral manner. Mr. de Voto, whose polished mechanism and agreeable touch gave much pleasure in the rococo passages of the trio, ably seconded Mr. Hain in the concerto. The most striking feature of the work is the andante, though in the finale Strauss avoids ingeniously and more than once downright melodic vulgarity.

Mr. Arthur Bird's Serenade contains an adagio in which the English horn, played admirably by Mr. Lenom, has an important and poetic part. The other movements have less distinctions, but the workmanship shows a trained musician. Early in Mr. Nikisch's reign over the Symphony orchestra two pieces by Bird, an "Oriental Scene" and an intermezzo, were played here. They were full of fancy and color. It is a pity that Mr. Bird has taken life so easily of late years. He was a composer of true promise, and his critical articles published in sundry musical periodicals show him to be a man of much acumen and fastidious taste.

There was an appreciative audience of fair size.

Paper Times
City Washington
Date FEB 10 1907 State D C

The fourth of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will take place at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 19. Dr. Karl Much will conduct.

[140]

...N DAILY ADVERTISER.
...MORNING, FEBRUARY 7, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

...thoven. Trio, Op. 11. Clarinette, Violon-...cello and Piano.
...use. Concerto for Wald-hora.
...t. Serenade for woodwind and horns.

A programme of interest from first to last. We have before this commended the skill of M. Longy in programme making. We wish that the conductor of the new Jordan Hall orchestra would take a leaf from his book. It is certainly far more difficult to make up a series of novel programmes for a club of wind instruments than for a medium-sized orchestra. On this occasion (with a single exception) only the regular forces of the club were called upon, yet one did not in the least degree miss the importation of outside talent into the programme.

Beethoven's trio is interesting rather from its infrequent performance than from any especial skill of clarinette treatment. In fact, the clarinette part is often given (with the composer's sanction) to the violin, and the work does not suffer thereby. It was composed in 1798, before Beethoven was 30. But even in his later years, in his Pastoral Symphony, for example, Beethoven did not fully understand the effects of this comparatively new instrument. It had been introduced into the symphonic orchestra ten years before this trio by Mozart, but it was not until Weber composed "Der Freischuetz" and Mendelssohn his "Scotch Symphony" that the full tone-color of the king of the wood-wind was understood. There is in this Beethoven trio no full comprehension of the spectral character of the "Chalumeau" (the deep register of the instrument) nor of its essentially vocal qualities. The work belongs decidedly to the earliest period, and its finale, a set of variations (of which the theme is not Beethoven's but by Weigl), is very different from the highly developed variations which begin to appear in the Kreutzer sonata or the Heroic symphony. Beethoven was as yet only a somewhat sturdier Haydn.

The only assisting artist was Mr. J. Keller, who played the violoncello part. The finest portion of the trio was the adagio, which, although short, was full of intrinsic beauty, and its performance was admirable. Of Mr. Grisez's work we have very recently spoken in praise; in even the most difficult passages one need never anticipate a "couac" in his tones. Violoncello and clarinette vied with each other in their performance of the chief theme of this adagio, and the piano work, both in this and in the horn concerto, was also excellent.

Mr. Alfred De Voto, the pianist of the club, is making rapid advances in his work; not only has he won laurels at these concerts, but Mme. Melba, after being accompanied by him in a recent concert in Hotel Somerset, caused him to come twice to New York to assist her in recitals at the Vanderbilts, an honor to a Boston pianist that is certainly worth recording. There were long stretches of piano work in the horn concerto, and these were all that could be desired in surety, delicacy and good phrasing.

Richard Strauss comes honestly by his skill in writing for the horn, for his father, a most conservative musician, was one of the best horn-players of Germany. This concerto, Opus 11, belongs, of course, to that period of Strauss's career when he was still under Bulow-Brahms influence and travelling upon the regular classical highway. Its form is symmetrical, with proper abbreviations, however, for a horn-player cannot go as far as a pianist, even in a concerto. It is melodic and shows, as the symphony (in F minor) and piano quartette that soon followed also show, that Strauss would have been a powerful composer even had he remained in the classical fold. He was not yet 20 years old when he composed these works.

The concerto was originally for Waldhorn, that is the old French horn without any keys. Such an instrument could not play a scale, but could only produce the broken tones of the chord of nature (the so-called "series of harmonics"); if it were set in F, for example, it could only sound F, C, F, A, C, E-flat, F, G, A, and a few other notes above, with a modified series made by "stopping." Such was the horn for which Beethoven, Mozart, Weber and all of the old classical composers wrote. The key system only came into use during the second quarter of the 19th century. If the Waldhorn was hampered in one direction it gained in another, for its tones were purer and finer than those which issue from the keyed instrument, although the latter gives us an unbroken scale.

Last night Mr. F. Hain played the part on a ventilhorn (an instrument with keys) in F. Such purity of tone, such surety in blowing and embouchure, such perfect shading have not been heard upon this instrument since the great Xaver Reiter left this city. There was only one very slight fumble in the entire difficult work. The "stopped tones" were very little employed by Strauss in this concerto, and contrary to the usual custom he joins the first movement to the Andante. Mr. Hain was recalled at the end; he more than deserved the compliment.

The Serenade by Arthur Bird was doubly welcome. It was good music and by a native composer, for Bird was born in Cambridge in 1856. He has lived so long abroad (he resides in Berlin we believe) that he is better known in Germany than in America, and his compositions are respected abroad. Yet this Serenade was brought forth under American influence, for it was composed in competition for the Paderewski prize (for the encouragement of American composers) in 1901. It won this prize. It is written for a double quartette of four wood-wind instruments plus two horns. It must be borne in mind that the Serenade (in its orchestral and chamber-music sense) was a species of Suite, somewhat shorter and less ambitious than the Symphonic Suite, as the orchestral Suite is developed than the symphony. But Bird's Serenade was more ambitious than most works of its school.

The composition is in clear form, and in this concert indulged in any [illegible] but every number held to the established laws of musical architecture. There was nothing very impassioned in the Serenade, and a "hot bird" was no more in evidence than its usual concomitant, but there was genialty, and charm, and fine musicianship everywhere in it. The Adagio seemed to be the gem of the work; it had a pensive melancholy, and the oboe was played here with all the breadth and nobility of an English horn.

Generally one gets a drone bass (a "Musette") in the Trio of the Scherzo, but in this the effect was given in the Scherzo itself. There was some splendid bassoon work in the finale, and the attractive and masterly counterpoint here was emphasized by the incisive three-noted figure with which it began. Altogether this Serenade is one of best recent American compositions and will bear frequent repetition.

Louis C. Elson.

Paper [illegible] Star
City Washington
Date [illegible] State D C

On Tuesday evening there will be a recital of sacred music by Mendelssohn and Gounod, by the choir under the direction of Mr. Ernest E. Leigh, at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Ascension.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 19. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have had such an enormous success in Boston, New York, and Chicago. The first work on the programme will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas.

...ber Times
... Washington
...e State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given is the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 19. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat, minor, No. 1. The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh, with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have had such an enormous success in Boston, New York, and Chicago. The first work on the program will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas. Mme. Samaroff is known in Washington as Miss Lucy Hickenlooper, granddaughter of the late General Hickenlooper. She has forged to the front as one of the leading pianists of her sex.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Rudolph Gans, the distinguished Swiss pianist, will be the assisting artist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, Wednesday afternoon, February 20. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, has arranged a most attractive program for this concert. It comprises Tschaikowsky's D major string quartet, opus 11, which contains the famous Andante Cantabile, which is played so often as a single concert number. The other two works are a suite for piano and violin, by Eduard Schutt, which will be heard in Washington for the first time and finally the ever popular and beautiful quintet for piano and strings in E major, by Schumann.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date [illegible] State N Y

Richard Strauss Again.

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concert [illegible] Hall. On Tursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius' in E minor, No. I.

This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression, and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the same composer's second symphony in D major which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer.

Madame Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for the piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist for Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E-flat major,

---

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Circumstance—Tinel and His "Early Christian" Tone-Pictures—Did His Romans and Pagan Ceremonies Interest Him More Than His Martyrs?—Music That Has More Rhetorical Commonplace Than Characteristic Imagination—The Decline of Tinel's Mysticism

Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert yesterday afternoon since their return from their victorious progress through the West, and it was easy to imagine a touch of welcome and approval in the warm applause that the conductor received as he came upon the stage. The audience on Friday afternoons is not the most alert in the world, but it has not yet become so used to Dr. Muck as to make its greeting a perfunctory courtesy, and interest in him still holds it to the end of the concert. Apparently the fatigue that naturally followed the Western journey and impending labors upon Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" measurably determined the programme. It is a weekly temptation to search Dr. Muck's list for some design that may lurk underneath, but yesterday none was discoverable except the working necessities of the moment. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," began the concert. Last year the orchestra played it several times under Mr. d'Indy. The year before it had played it as often under Mr. Gericke. The piece is firmly set in the repertory, and the band comes to it as to a regular thing. Tschaikovski's concerto in B-flat minor for piano followed and Mme. Samaroff played the solo part with a varied eloquence that indicated a fresh broadening and deepening of her powers. Ten days ago the orchestra was playing the same concerto in Chicago for Mr. Gans, and again it was prepared. Last came the three tone-pictures to which Corneille's "Christian" and classic tragedy of "Polyeucte" had moved the Belgian, Edgar Tinel. They were new to Boston; they are not familiar anywhere, and upon them Dr. Muck and his men had evidently spent their pains. Other new music has sometimes more rewarded them; but the audience listened with interest to the end.

The Belgian composers—Paul Gilson, Jan Blockx, and Edgar Tinel—seem to work contentedly for themselves and for the Belgians about them. Now and then their music crosses the border into the neighboring France or Germany and even goes onward into a larger world. Tinel's own oratorio, "Franciscus" so went ten years ago from city to city. Gilson's "Sea-Pieces" passed from orchestra to orchestra. Blockx's operas have been heard outside Brussels. The composers themselves go their way unmoved, writing to their Flemish texts, finding Flemish inspirations, and seeking to develop a Flemish music. The great cosmopolitan world does not disturb them. They are concerned with a Flanders that is older than the Gallicized Belgium that has swallowed it. Blockx's music is almost unknown in America. Those that have heard it elsewhere find national and racial traits in it. There were none in Gilson's "Sea-Pieces," and an equally imaginative and expressive Frenchman or German might have written them. Tinel, as "Franciscus" disclosed him, when choral society after choral society was singing it, was interesting as an individual, not as a Belgian. It is easy to say now that "Franciscus" was overpraised—a new oratorio that is imaginatively and musically alive is so rare a thing—but in the music was the suggestion of a temperament that was half-mystic and half-sensuous. Tinel could imagine and utter the devout ecstasies of the converted saint Francis; his eye could also see and his imagination feel the courtly life wherein that conversion was wrought. The pomps of a mediæval Assisi touched him as well as its humilities. His seemed a temperament akin to Gounod's in its blending of mysticism and sensuousness, but Tinel's was of less amorous and purer and sincerer strain. Out of such imagination, leaping spontaneously to expression as it did in "Franciscus," impressive and distinctive music might come. Enthusiasts saw a Thomas-à Kempis plying the arts of composition and spiritualizing them as devout Florentine painters spiritualized their lines and colors. "Franciscus" came and went, which also is the way of new oratorios, and since, Tinel has written little music, and still less has been played outside his own Belgium.

Corneille's "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte" might easily stir the imagination of such a composer, as it has touched many another without pretence to a devout spirit or a mystically ecstatic temperament. True, Corneille's early Christians stalk and speak in his characteristic heroic vein. He could conceive them in no other. They must front his heroic Romans. They are born breakers of images and disturbers of pagan rites. (After all, was it not the manners more than the morals of the early Christians that irritated the persecuting Romans?) Yet Polyeucte and his friend Néarque, had their ecstacies of vision and devotion. The martyr's sombre rhapsody and his passionate discourse with his unbelieving wife glow with them. Presumably it was the mystical side of Polyeucte and of his tragedy that would stir Tinel. The composer could pluck him out of the sock and buskin of classic tragedy and carry into music only the essence of his rapt spirit. The contrast and background might spring from the stately march of the tragedy and from the pompous Roman setting. The heroic vein of Corneille hardly ran in Tinel. The mystic did and as "Franciscus" had long ago proved, the theatrical was not altogether absent.

...section of the ... exaltation of the martyr. In the third "picture," for example, the governor, his train and the people moved in solemn procession to the pagan temple. The music was truly and sonorously ceremonial. It had weight. It did not lack a sober eloquence and stately pace. It was largely conceived, largely written. It escaped the commonplace with which the mere word "march" on a programme is pregnant. The temple dances followed. There was sensuous and occasionally bizarre imagination in their rhythm and instrumental color. They were both of an ordered ceremony and of a lush and languorous Orient. Then, for climax, the outcry of Polyeucte against the pagan gods and his heel upon the forehead of their overturned images. The orchestra was as turbulent as the scene it would picture. The voice of pagan dance and ceremony died. The choral of the triumphant Christians pealed. In sum the "tone-picture" was an interesting musical treatment of the episode, with Corneille's severe recital amplified by a more pictoral and sensuous imagination. Yet it wanted power and individuality. There was no sense, perhaps there could not be, of the spiritualizing Tinel of "Franciscus." He had chosen to deal with externals. The pagans seemed to stir him more than the Christians. Akin, but less interesting, was what seemed at a single hearing the solemn commonplace of the overture—stately and expressive orchestral rhetoric, with the swelling choral and just a hint in a song-ful melody of the devout ecstasy of the martyr it would celebrate. The one vivid suggestion of the imaginatively and mystically sensitive Tinel of the oratorio came in the second picture, "Pauline's Dream." At moments it was as the music of phantoms of the night, of troubling ghosts of those whom Pauline loved and who were in sore pain. There were harmonies in it that were spectral, grisly, of no near and warm thing. Then rare and individual imagination played in the music and searched the hearer. It had not, after all, quite for-...

H. T. P.

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N Y

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, Feb. 1. Assisting artist, be Sibelius's, in E minor, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composers. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major, No. 2.

The Church Choral Society announces

Paper World
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston on Sunday evening, February 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30. The concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $4,100, which must come very near the record for an orchestral concert.

[141]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
THURSDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 7, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven. Trio, Op. 11. Clarinette, Violoncello and Piano.
Strauss. Concerto for Wald-horn.
Bird. Serenade for woodwind and horns.

A programme of interest from first to last. We have before this commended the skill of M. Longy in programme making. We wish that the conductor of the new Jordan Hall orchestra would take a leaf from his book. It is certainly far more difficult to make up a series of novel programmes for a club of wind instruments than for a medium-sized orchestra. On this occasion (with a single exception) only the regular forces of the club were called upon, yet one did not in the least degree miss the importation of outside talent into the programme.

Beethoven's trio is interesting rather from its infrequent performance than from any especial skill of clarinette treatment. In fact, the clarinette part is often given (with the composer's sanction) to the violin, and the work does not suffer thereby. It was composed in 1798, before Beethoven was 30. But even in his later years, in his Pastoral Symphony, for example, Beethoven did not fully understand the effects of this comparatively new instrument. It had been introduced into the symphonic orchestra ten years before this trio by Mozart, but it was not until Weber composed "Der Freischuetz" and Mendelssohn his "Scotch Symphony" that the full tone-color of the king of the wood-wind was understood. There is in this Beethoven trio no full comprehension of the spectral character of the "Chalumeau" (the deep register of the instrument) nor of its essentially vocal qualities. The work belongs decidedly to the earliest period, and its finale, a set of variations (of which the theme is not Beethoven's but by Weigl), is very different from the highly developed variations which begin to appear in the Kreutzer sonata or the Heroic symphony. Beethoven was as yet only a somewhat sturdier Haydn.

The only assisting artist was Mr. J. Keller, who played the violoncello part. The finest portion of the trio was the adagio, which, although short, was full of intrinsic beauty, and its performance was admirable. Of Mr. Grisez's work we have very recently spoken in praise; in even the most difficult passages one need never anticipate a "couac" in his tones. Violoncello and clarinette vied with each other in their performance of the chief theme of this adagio, and the piano work, both in this and in the horn concerto, was also excellent.

Mr. Alfred De Voto, the pianist of the club, is making rapid advances in his work; not only has he won laurels at these concerts, but Mme. Melba, after being accompanied by him in a recent concert in Hotel Somerset, caused him to come twice to New York to assist her in recitals at the Vanderbilts, an honor to a Boston pianist that is certainly worth recording. There were long stretches of piano work in the horn concerto, and these were all that could be desired in surety, delicacy and good phrasing.

Richard Strauss comes honestly by his skill in writing for the horn, for his father, a most conservative musician, was one of the best horn-players of Germany. This concerto, Opus 11, belongs, of course, to that period of Strauss's career when he was still under Bulow-Brahms influence and travelling upon the regular classical highway. Its form is symmetrical, with proper abbreviations, however, for a horn-player cannot go as far as a pianist, even in a concerto. It is melodic and shows, as the symphony (in F minor) and piano quartette that soon followed also show, that Strauss would have been a powerful composer even had he remained in the classical fold. He was not yet 20 years old when he composed these works.

The concerto was originally for Waldhorn, that is the old French horn without any keys. Such an instrument could not play a scale, but could only produce the broken tones of the chord of nature (the so-called "series of harmonics"); if it were set in F, for example, it could only sound F, C, F, A, C, E-flat, F, G, A, and a few other notes above, with a modified series made by "stopping." Such was the horn for which Beethoven, Mozart, Weber and all of the old classical composers wrote. The key system only came into use during the second quarter of the 19th century. If the Waldhorn was hampered in one direction it gained in another, for its tones were purer and finer than those which issue from the keyed instrument, although the latter gives us an unbroken scale.

Last night Mr. F. Hain played the part on a ventilhorn (an instrument with keys) in F. Such purity of tone, such surety in blowing and embouchure, such perfect shading have not been heard upon this instrument since the great Xaver Reiter left this city. There was only one very slight fumble in the entire difficult work. The "stopped tones" were very little employed by Strauss in this concerto, and contrary to the usual custom he joins the first movement to the Andante. Mr. Hain was recalled at the end; he more than deserved the compliment.

The Serenade by Arthur Bird was doubly welcome. It was good music and by a native composer, for Bird was born in Cambridge in 1856. He has lived so long abroad (he resides in Berlin we believe) that he is better known in Germany than in America, and his compositions are respected abroad. Yet this Serenade was brought forth under American influence, for it was composed in competition for the Paderewski prize (for the encouragement of American composers) in 1901. It won this prize.

It is written for a double quartette of regular wood-wind instruments plus two horns. It must be borne in mind that the serenade (in its orchestral and chamber-music sense) was a species of Suite, somewhat shorter and less ambitious than the regular Suite, as the orchestral Suite is less developed than the symphony. But this Serenade was more ambitious than many works of its school.

Mr. Bird's composition is in clear form. No part of this concert indulged in any radical vagaries, but every number held to established laws of musical architecture. There was nothing very impassioned in the Serenade, and a "hot bird" was no more in evidence than its usual concomitant, but there was genialty, and charm, and fine musicianship everywhere in it. The Adagio seemed to be the gem of the work; it had a pensive melancholy, and the oboe was played here with all the breadth and nobility of an English horn.

Generally one gets a drone bass (a "Musette") in the Trio of the Scherzo, but in this the effect was given in the Scherzo itself. There was some splendid bassoon work in the finale, and the attractive and masterly counterpoint here was emphasized by the incisive three-noted figure with which it began. Altogether this Serenade is one of best recent American compositions and will bear frequent repetition.

Louis C. Elson.

Paper —— Star

City —— Washington

Date —— State D C

On Tuesday evening there will be a recital of sacred music by Mendelssohn and Gounod, by the choir under the direction of Mr. Ernest E. Leigh, at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Ascension.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 19. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat minor, No. 1. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have had such an enormous success in Boston, New York, and Chicago. The first work on the programme will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas.

...er —— Times

... —— Washington

...e —— State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given is the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 19. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte in B flat, minor, No. 1. The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh, with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra have had such an enormous success in Boston, New York, and Chicago. The first work on the program will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas. Mme. Samaroff is known in Washington as Miss Lucy Hickenlooper, granddaughter of the late General Hickenlooper. She has forged to the front as one of the leading pianists of her sex.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Rudolph Gans, the distinguished Swiss pianist, will be the assisting artist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ball room of the New Williard Hotel, Wednesday afternoon, February 20. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, has arranged a most attractive program for this concert. It comprises Tschaikowsky's D major string quartet, opus 11, which contains the famous Andante Cantabile, which is played so often as a single concert number. The other two works are a suite for piano and violin, by Eduard Schutt, which will be heard in Washington for the first time, and finally the ever popular and beautiful quintet for piano and strings in E major, by Schumann.

Paper —— Telegraph

City —— New York

Date —— State N Y

Richard Strauss Again.

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concert in Carnegie Hall. On Tursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius' in E minor, No. I.

This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression, and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the same composer's second symphony in D major which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer.

Madame Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for the piano in B-flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist for Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms' concerto in E-flat major, No. II.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Circumstance—Tinel and His "Early Christian" Tone-Pictures—Did His Romans and Pagan Ceremonies Interest Him More Than His Martyrs?—Music That Has More Rhetorical Commonplace Than Characteristic Imagination—The Decline of Tinel's Mysticism

Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert yesterday afternoon since their return from their victorious progress through the West, and it was easy to imagine a touch of welcome and approval in the warm applause that the conductor received as he came upon the stage. The audience on Friday afternoons is not the most alert in the world, but it has not yet become so used to Dr. Muck as to make its greeting a perfunctory courtesy, and interest in him still holds it to the end of the concert. Apparently the fatigue that naturally followed the Western journey and impending labors upon Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" measurably determined the programme. It is a weekly temptation to search Dr. Muck's list for some design that may lurk underneath, but yesterday none was discoverable except the working necessities of the moment. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," began the concert. Last year the orchestra played it several times under Mr. d'Indy. The year before it had played it as often under Mr. Gericke. The piece is firmly set in the repertory, and the band comes to it as to a regular thing. Tschaikovski's concerto in B-flat minor for piano followed and Mme. Samaroff played the solo part with a varied eloquence that indicated a fresh broadening and deepening of her powers. Ten days ago the orchestra was playing the same concerto in Chicago for Mr. Ganz, and again it was prepared. Last came the three tone-pictures to which Corneille's "Christian" and classic tragedy of "Polyeucte" had moved the Belgian, Edgar Tinel. They were new to Boston; they are not familiar anywhere, and upon them Dr. Muck and his men had evidently spent their pains. Other new music has sometimes more rewarded them; but the audience listened with interest to the end.

The Belgian composers—Paul Gilson, Jan Blockx, and Edgar Tinel—seem to work contentedly for themselves and for the Belgians about them. Now and then their music crosses the border into the neighboring France or Germany and even goes onward into a larger world. Tinel's own oratorio, "Franciscus" so went ten years ago from city to city. Gilson's "Sea-Pieces" passed from orchestra to orchestra. Blockx's operas have been heard outside Brussels. The composers themselves go their way unmoved, writing to their Flemish texts, finding Flemish inspirations, and seeking to develop a Flemish music. The great cosmopolitan world does not disturb them. They are concerned with a Flanders that is older than the Gallicized Belgium that has swallowed it. Blockx's music is almost unknown in America. Those that have heard it elsewhere find national and racial traits in it. There were none in Gilson's "Sea-Pieces," and an equally imaginative and expressive Frenchman or German might have written them. Tinel, as "Franciscus" disclosed him, when choral society after choral society was singing it, was interesting as an individual, not as a Belgian. It is easy to say now that "Franciscus" was overpraised—a new oratorio that is imaginatively and musically alive is so rare a thing—but in the music was the suggestion of a temperament that was half-mystic and half-sensuous. Tinel could imagine and utter the devout ecstasies of the converted saint Francis; his eye could also see and his imagination feel the courtly life wherein that conversion was wrought. The pomps of a mediæval Assisi touched him as well as its humilities. His seemed a temperament akin to Gounod's in its blending of mysticism and sensuousness, but Tinel's was of less amorous and purer and sincerer strain. Out of such imagination, leaping spontaneously to expression as it did in "Franciscus," impressive and distinctive music might come. Enthusiasts saw a Thomas-à Kempis plying the arts of composition and spiritualizing them as devout Florentine painters spiritualized their lines and colors. "Franciscus" came and went, which also is the way of new oratorios, and since, Tinel has written little music, and still less has been played outside his own Belgium.

Corneille's "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte" might easily stir the imagination of such a composer, as it has touched many another without pretence to a devout spirit or a mystically ecstatic temperament. True, Corneille's early Christians stalk and speak in his characteristic heroic vein. He could conceive them in no other. They must front his heroic Romans. They are born breakers of images and disturbers of pagan rites. (After all, was it not the manners more than the morals of the early Christians that irritated the persecuting Romans?) Yet Polyeucte and his friend Néarque, had their ecstacies of vision and devotion. The martyr's sombre rhapsody and his passionate discourse with his unbelieving wife glow with them. Presumably it was the mystical side of Polyeucte and of his tragedy that would stir Tinel. The composer could pluck him out of the sock and buskin of classic tragedy and carry into music only the essence of his rapt spirit. The contrast and background might spring from the stately march of the tragedy and from the pompous Roman setting. The heroic vein of Corneille hardly ran in Tinel. The mystic did and as "Franciscus" had long ago proved, the theatrical was not altogether absent.

Yet, face to face with the "tone-pictures" yesterday, the hearer caught hardly a reflection of the exaltation of the martyr. In the third "picture," for example, the governor, his train and the people moved in solemn procession to the pagan temple. The music was truly and sonorously ceremonial. It had weight. It did not lack a sober eloquence and stately pace. It was largely conceived, largely written. It escaped the commonplace with which the mere word "march" on a programme is pregnant. The temple dances followed. There was sensuous and occasionally bizarre imagination in their rhythm and instrumental color. They were both of an ordered ceremony and of a lush and languorous Orient. Then, for climax, the outcry of Polyeucte against the pagan gods and his heel upon the forehead of their overturned images. The orchestra was as turbulent as the scene it would picture. The voice of pagan dance and ceremony died. The choral of the triumphant Christians pealed. In sum the "tone-picture" was an interesting musical treatment of the episode, with Corneille's severe recital amplified by a more pictoral and sensuous imagination. Yet it wanted power and individuality. There was no sense, perhaps there could not be, of the spiritualizing Tinel of "Franciscus." He had chosen to deal with externals. The pagans seemed to stir him more than the Christians. Akin, but less interesting, was what seemed at a single hearing the solemn commonplace of the overture—stately and expressive orchestral rhetoric, with the swelling choral and just a hint in a songful melody of the devout ecstasy of the martyr it would celebrate. The one vivid suggestion of the imaginatively and mystically sensitive Tinel of the oratorio came in the second picture, "Pauline's Dream." At moments it was as the music of phantoms of the night, of troubling ghosts of those whom Pauline loved and who were in sore pain. There were harmonies in it that were spectral, grisly, of no near and warm thing. Then rare and individual imagination played in the music and searched the hearer. It had not, after all, quite for-[illegible] Tinel.

H. T. P.

Paper —— Times

City —— New York

Date —— State N Y

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening Feb. 1. Assisting artist, be Sibelius's, in E minor, No. 1. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composers. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major, No. 2.

The Church Choral Society announces

Paper —— World

City —— New York

Date —— State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Boston on Sunday evening, February 3, after the most successful tour it has ever made in the West. It gave six concerts, in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. The climax of the tour was reached in Chicago on Wednesday evening, January 30. The concert was given in the Auditorium to an audience which completely filled that great theatre. The gross receipts were $6,100, which must come very near the record for an orchestral concert.

[141]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

EDGAR TINEL AND HIS THREE "TONE-PICTURES"

An Unfamiliar Composer and a New Composition at the Symphony Concerts This Week—Early Strauss by the Longy Club—Mrs. Beach's Recital—London Sees a "Shilling-Shocker"—Miss Farrar Warmly Praised in "Tannhauser"—Other News of the Day

Edgar Tinel, whose name appears tomorrow for the first time upon the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is nevertheless a composer of long-established European reputation. He was born at Sinay in East Flanders, March 27, 1857, the son of a schoolmaster who was also an organist of some attainments. At the age of eight he began piano lessons with his father. Afterward he went to the Royal Conservatory at Brussels, when Fétis, who was then director, received him with marked kindliness and interest. Here he studied under Gevaërt, Kufferath and Brassin. His work was hampered by extreme poverty, and he was obliged to spend part of the time allotted for practice in mending and even making his clothes. At the age of thirteen he was allowed to give up his general studies, and this enabled him to earn money for his expenses by teaching the piano and singing in choirs. In 1872 he won a prize for piano-playing, and in the following year obtained the first prize. Then on a trip to Germany he made the acquaintance of Raff, the composer, and in consequence decided to devote himself wholly to composition. In 1877, he won the Belgian prix de Rome with a cantata, "De Klokke Roeland." It is recorded that when his trunk was searched for books that might help him in the competition, a procedure to which every candidate was subjected, the only one that was found was Thomas à Kempis's "Imitation of Christ."

The years of travel and study to which the Prix de Rome entitled him were spent in Germany, France and Italy. He became an enthusiast over the reform of church music, and the proper cultivation of the Gregorian modes. In 1881 he succeeded Lemmens as director of the Institute of Sacred Music at Malines. In 1889 he was appointed inspector of town music schools. In the following year (some say 1895) he published a treatise on Gregorian music and its proper interpretation. In 1896 he became professor of counterpoint and fugue at the Brussels Conservatory, a position he now holds. A correspondent of the Musical Courier has given the following description of his looks: "Tinel is of most striking appearance. In figure and demeanor somewhat reminding you of a thin, gaunt Jesuit priest, his face and head seem a combination of Berlioz and Schumann, if such a thing can be imagined. But his eyes have neither the dreaminess of the latter nor the vivacity of the former, they merely look at you in thoughtful intent way through evidently very sharp glasses."

Among Tinel's compositions are a Sonata for piano, for four hands; the prize-winning cantata, "De Klokke Roeland"; "Die Drei Ritter," a ballad for baritone, chorus and orchestra; a Te Deum for mixed chorus and organ, an organ sonata, several sets of violets and sacred songs, and the oratorio that gained him universal recognition, "Franciscus," which had more than one hundred performances in ten years. Originally produced at the expense of the city of Malines, in 1888, it gradually traversed Europe. In America it was performed for the first time in February, 1893, by the Oratorio Society in New York; in the following November portions of it were sung by the Cecilia Society in Boston; it was given at a Worcester Festival in 1895. The Flemish poem by Louis de Koninck tells, in three parts, the story of St. Francis's courtly life at Assisi, his renunciation of the world; his life in the convent, including his praise of the theory and practice of poverty; and finally his death, funeral procession and glorification. The music is a combination of styles, sensuous, severe, contrapuntal and modern. The orchestration is unusually sonorous and brilliant, and the music is often dramatic, as well as extendedly lyric in character. "St. Francis" was followed by a music-drama, "Godelive," which was first sung at Brussels on July 22, 1897, but which failed to leave the impression made by "Franciscus." It is too conservative, and essentially undramatic. Other music by Tivel comprises an "Alleluia" for voices and organ, a mass "of the Holy Virgin of Lourdes," some "Tableaux Symphoniques" and an overture and entr' actes for Corneille's "Polyeucte."

Presumably from these come the "three tone-pictures" that are to be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday. The programme enumerates them as an overture, "Pauline's Dream," and a "Festival in the Temple of Jupiter." The "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte" is counted one of Corneille's masterpieces, and once or twice a year it may still be seen on the stage of the Théâtre Français. The scene is a city of Armenia in the days of the later Roman emperors, and the characters are Roman and Armenian. Polyeucte, who is an actual saint in the Romish calendar and whose death the martyrologies record is an Armenian, wed to Pauline, the daughter of the Roman governor. His friend Néarque has converted him to Christianity. Full of new zeal and high exaltation Polyeucte obeys the governor's summons to the rites of the temple and there interrupts the sacrifice, insults the god and overturns his image. He is condemned to death and he approaches his fate with continuing fortitude and exaltation. His wife intercedes vainly with her father. A noble Roman, Sévère, who has once loved Pauline and whom she has loved in turn, adds his intercessions, but to no purpose. Polyeucte meanwhile presses his own faith upon his wife and the governor and their swift conversion glorifies his death. The power of the tragedy lies in the exaltation of Polyeucte, blazing with zeal, disdainful of [illegible] even of death itself, breaking [illegible] of loyalty and affection, transported by religious ecstasies that Corneille's imagination lifts to heroic heights. The gentler appeal of the play springs from the devotion of Pauline, as loyal to Polyeucte, as piteous of his fate, as agonized to avert it, as though her love for Sévère had not rekindled at his coming.

Tinel is a devout man. What a few years ago it was the custom to call "Christian mysticism" stirs his imagination and colors his music. Time and again it flashes, like a soft white flame, in "Franciscus." It gives what little vitality there is in "Sainte-Godelive." The beginnings of "Franciscus" reveal also an imagination that answers to courtly pomps. It is easy to understand the appeal of "Polyeucte" to him, though its heroic vein and the characteristic grandeur of Corneille seem to lie beyond his gentler powers. "Pauline's Dream" makes an episode of the first act of the tragedy. In sleep a boding vision has come to her eyes of Sévère returning, not from the shades, but from the victories of war, triumphant, threatening Polyeucte. The vision follows Polyeucte among the Christians, makes him the prey of his rival and of the governor, and Pauline may not save him.

"Le sang de Polyeucte a satisfait leurs rages." The incident in the temple is narrated in the third act of the tragedy. Before the altar stand the Roman governor and his train. The sacrificial rites begin. Polyeucte and Néarque are restless and disdainful. The assembly heeds and murmurs. Polyeucte breaks into open impieties and loud blasphemies. He overturns the sacred vessels, he mocks the god, he flings down its image.

"Les mystères troublés, le temple profané,
Le fuité et les claméurs d'un peuple mutiné."

Here at least is imaginative material for a tone-picture.

[redacted] H.

Two Chamber Concerts

Can it be that the name of Richard Strauss on the programme of a chamber concert increases the number of the audience? Chamber music—and very orthodox and uninspired chamber music—was the pastime, long since abandoned, of Strauss's youth. Last night his name followed nothing more interesting than a commonplace concerto for horn. Yet the largest audience that the Longy Club has attracted this winter made Potter Hall seem nearly full. Perhaps the cause was the unusual instrument for which the concerto was written or even the sympathetic virtuosity with which Mr. Hain was sure to play it. Anyhow there was the concerto and there was the audience. Strauss wrote the music before he was twenty years old for his father who was a notable horn player in his time and whom middle-aged American musicians that studied in Munich can easily remember pottering about the opera house and concert rooms there. It is a very innocent and discreet concerto. The youthful Strauss does not try to widen the range or force the capacity of the horn, and he does not forget that its tone soon cloys with mellowness. Therefore he has written a short concerto in which the song of the slow section follows the opening allegro without a pause, and that a rondo brings to a light close. The melodies are amiably conventional; the development of them as amiably academic. The horn unfolds, varies, shades and even embroiders them. The accompanying orchestra—Mr. de Voto and a piano replaced it last night—affords due aid and background, with here and there a piquant contrast or combination of instrumental timbres that hints faintly at the mature Strauss. Now and then ingenuity shapes the course of the music or fancy brightens its flow. The rest is intelligent exercise in writing for an unusual instrument that with all its limitations has a tempting fascination. Already, one likes to fancy Strauss was beginning to feel the individuality of instruments.

The horn in its quality and its range is twenty times as vivid and alive to this young Strauss as is the clarinet to Beethoven in his youthful trio for it, 'cello and piano that began the concert. Beethoven was quite willing that a violin should replace it, and there is seemingly no tonal color in the pretty pattern-weaving of the music that the stringed instrument does not serve as well. For once in a way Mr. Grisez's virtuosity took its ease. For ending came the serenade for flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons—two of each—with which Arthur Bird, American by birth, but German by long residence, acquired taste and cast of musical thought, won one of the Paderewski prizes for composition in the smaller forms six years ago. In form the serenade is really one of the little suites which the composers of the eighteenth century liked to call by that name, but in substance and coloring Mr. Bird has not sought archaic suggestion. His melodies have character, imagination and fertility. They escape mere prettiness, and they never become mere excuses for mathematical music-making. Animation enlivens and fancy flavors his treatment of them. He "leads" his instruments, as the technicians say, ingeniously, he contrasts or combines their timbres with euphony and poetic suggestion. In the slow movement he even tunes the oboe to singularly warm and lyric song. The whole impression is of a small thing adroitly, individually and imaginatively done, which is [illegible] than large, lab[illegible], empty [illegible] plac[illegible]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB 10, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Olga Samaroff Soloist at the Symphony.

Pittsburg Orchestra Soon to Be Here—Handel and Haydn.

Numerous Recitals of the Next Few Days.

The 14th Symphony program comprised the scherzo, "The Sorceress' Apprentice," by Paul Dukas; Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Mme Olga Samaroff soloist, and, for the first time here, three symphonic pictures for orchestra by Edgar Tindel, derived from Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The jingling and mysterious measures of the quaint Dakas scherzo opened the program in an agreeable manner, for Dr Muck's forces tripped and danced through the peculiar harmonies in a charmingly dainty and spirited way, conjuring, musically, the vivid suggestions of necromancy, as intended by the composer.

In the score the themes are cleverly "juggled" among different instruments and the players skilfully followed the ideas and brought out the tricky phrases as well as the "shivering trumpet blasts" in splendid fashion. It is a jolly little piece and right merrily was it performed by the Symphony men.

Mme Samaroff's performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto was generally commendable, the chief fault being in the almost inaudible pianissimo which at times crept into her playing; a gentleness permissible in a very small hall, but not in association with an orchestra of Symphony proportions. Aside from this little defect the artist's work was thoroughly pleasing and combined the necessary vigor in fortissimo with fine gradations of nuance, technical facility and clarity and carefully proportioned shadings.

In the opening movement Mme Samaroff's heavy chord passages needed no excuse by reason of sex, for they were given with masculine power; her varying themes, of a lighter nature, were very sweetly set forth and the strenuous cadenza measures were admirably handled. The cantabile quality of her work in the second part was exquisite and in the turbulent final movement the dash and brilliancy of her interpretation were unmistakably appealing. She was most heartily applauded for her excellent work.

Tinel's three "pictures" are varied enough in musical color to illustrate quite vividly the themes of the Corneille tragedy without being of any marked value. Parts of the first section, the phrases given to the brasses, are pleasingly sonorous and these showed to advantage this contingent of the orchestra. The second movement "Pauline's Dream," is rather spasmodic in character with fortissimo ejaculations ad lib. The last movement is made up of cleverly devised contrasts worked out by the different bands and culminating in a furious finale for the brasses against arabesque figures on the strings. This latter part was the most interesting of the "pictures" and the work by Dr Muck's men was of that brilliant quality which makes their ensemble playing so nearly perfect.

This week the program will have for a novelty the "Sinfonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss, a work of extraordinary technical difficulties. Special attention is called to the fact that this piece opens the concert and lasts for 50 minutes and is played without pause, so a prompt attendance is requested, as the doors will remain closed until the end of the symphony. Mr Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the well-known pianist, will be heard in Brahms' second concerto and the concert will close with his "Academic" overture.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

At the fourth concert of the Boston symphony quartet, which will be given in Chickering hall Monday evening, Feb 25, the assisting artist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The works will be an unknown string quartet, Emile Jacques-Dalcroze; Gabriel Faure's sonata for violin and piano in A major, and Claude Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10.

RALPH E. SAMAROFF WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY.

Plays Tchaikowsky Piano Concerto with Inspiring Aban-

BOSTON AMERICAN—
FEBRUARY 10, 1907.

FIRST HOB HEARING OF TINEL TONE PICTURES

By Kent Perkins.

Barring the short opening number, Paul Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fetching bit of grotesquerie based on Goethe's ballad of that name, the fourteenth symphony concert of the season last night was a full feast of glowing melody and full-voiced harmony, modern in spirit and form, yet unspotted by the straining after novelty for novelty's sake that some "modern" composers use to cloak poverty of imagination and paucity in inspiration.

There were only two pieces besides that of Dukas, but they were both long and full of varied musical meat, so that neither quantity nor quality was lacking.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose presence has come to be exceedingly welcome to Boston audiences, played Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. She was a bit nervous, but this showed only tridingly in her manner and did not in the least mar the beauty, poesy and brilliance of her work. She played with an abandon that was inspiriting and she over came the terrific difficulties of the piece with an ease that was astonishing.

In passages whose swiftness was that of lightning her music was like spouts of living fire, shining, clear, seemingly a continuous gleaming tone. Yet it was formed of separate notes, struck by flying fingers, not once missing their mark. At the close she was greeted with hearty and prolonged applause, both from audience and orchestra, and was thus called forth several times.

Edgar Tinel's three symphonic pictures, Op. 21, from Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte," performed for the first time in Boston, formed the last part of the programme. The three pictures are overture, Pauline's dream, festival in the temple of Jupiter.

The music is a pictorial, grandoise, duly tinged with tragedy, and probably affected by the Roman theme and its classic handling by Corneille, yet it is strongly human and rich in emotional appeal. There are moments of graceful beauty in the two dances in the temple. There are also intervals of considerable duration where the convulsive shivers and manufactured thrills remind one too forcibly and vividly of the Bowery and its melodrama. The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave the work the benefit of a performance that was magnificent in force and finish.

COMING MUSICAL EVENTS OF INTEREST TO ALL BOSTONIANS

The next Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday bring the most important novelty that Boston has had in several years, Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," on which the orchestra has been at work for several weeks. Until his opera "Salome" was given to the public Strauss had never written any work which caused so much controversy as this "Sinfonia Domestica." Its purport is to illustrate certain phases of the composer's home life and deals with himself, his wife and his baby, as well as certain female relatives.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts are most urgently requested to be in their seats promptly at the beginning of the public rehearsal on Friday and of the concert on Saturday evening. The "Sinfonia Domestica" lasts in the neighborhood of fifty minutes and is played without a pause, so that those who come late will not be admitted to the hall until the intermission. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, a favorite pianist here, will be the soloist. He will play Brahms's Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, opus 83.

C. A. Ellis, Madame Melba's manager, is in negotiations, the result of which promises for Madame Melba's appearance in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 9, the most interesting concert of a special nature that has been given in Boston in many years. Madame Melba will be the principal attraction, but it is Mr. Ellis's purpose to have other features, which would be most acceptable to the public in any event.

The Kneisel String Quartet gives the fourth of its season's concerts at Chickering Hall on the evening of Tuesday, February 19. An unusually brilliant audience is expected.

For the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Chickering Hall on Monday evening, February 25, Professor Willy Hess has arranged a more than usually interesting programme. The assisting artist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 14 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony to Present Some New Music.

TWO important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Tuesday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor, No. 1.

This work when played in Boston created a profound impression and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the composer's second symphony, in E major, which is better known.

On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composer.

Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms' concerto in E flat major, No. 2.

[142]

WESTERN OPINION OF OUR WHAT CONDUCTOR MUCK

Mr. Arthur Harlmann, Fiddler, Makes Suggestions as to How the Boston Organization Might Be Improved.

BY PHILIP HALE.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, visiting Chicago, was welcomed in a most hearty manner. The tribute paid Maj. H. L. Higginson and the orchestra in the official programme book of the Chicago organization was as generous as it was complimentary. Boston might in this respect learn lessons in fine courtesy from the western city.

That the Chicagoans should make comparisons between their own orchestra and the one visiting them was inevitable. That some of the Chicago newspapers should say frankly that the Chicago orchestra is the better of the two was to be expected. The people of Chicago take a godlike pride in all that they have done, are doing and purpose to do. They not only see that it is all good; they shout their belief.

This reminds me of the heroic speech of the late Mr. Kelly, the Rolling Mill Man, a true wit and humorist, whose praise was sounded by Mr. Antonio Pastor in his reminiscences published recently in the New York Sun. (Mr. Pastor should write his memoirs. Though living, he is even now one of the immortals. Who does not remember him in his glorious days, with leg boots and shiny plug hat, inviting the audience to join in the chorus of "Down in a Coal Mine"?).

Mr. Kelly was in Chicago—The Herald may have told the story before, but it is a joy forever. He faced an audience roaring with delight. He had recited one of his monologues, possibly the one that described his method of obtaining a pie when he had no money. Men in their ecstasy had beaten their sides till they were sore, had punched their neighbors or slapped them on the back in wild, gregarious appreciation. "Kelly! Kelly!" And the only Kelly returned to the stage. He waved his hand for silence. "Ah, ladies and gentlemen," he said, with deep emotion, "after all, there is only one city." Shouts, howls, yells of delight for at least 10 minutes. The audience was finally exhausted, and Mr. Kelly could again be heard. "And that, ladies and gentlemen, is—New York."

Chicago's Verdict.

When the Chicago Orchestra, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, as it is now named, appeared on the platform at Orchestra Hall, Feb. 1, there was an "enthusiastic and prolonged demonstration upon the part of the audience." This, the Chicago Journal tells us, was "a spontaneous outbreak of approval of the gifted leader and his band of artists. At least a portion of the audience had heard this week the Boston Symphony organization, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whose work bears the unqualified indorsement of musical Germany. They had time to arrive at a conclusion, and yesterday they expressed it." The headline voiced this conclusion: "Local Orchestra Pre-eminent." "It has this week become plainly apparent that the Theodore Thomas orchestra is the best in the country and has but few equals in the world."

"Its wood-wind section cannot be equalled in the perfect blending of tone, and such men as Barthel, Schuers, Quensel, Kruse and Starke are in a class by themselves. Tettelman, the drummer, is a superb artist, a man whose musical instinct is so keen and whose sense of dynamic proportions so exact that his every performance is a work of art. And there are no better trap men anywhere than Wintrich and Wagner." There is similar eulogy of violinists and 'cellists. "The men that sit back of Esser and Meyer in the viola section are entirely capable, and today stand out in bold relief in the light of recent events. Chicago has now more reason than ever to be proud of its magnificent orchestra, and its splendid leader."

This is as it should be.

The Chicago News was almost as violently patriotic, not to say chauvinistic or parochial. Speaking of the Theodore Thomas orchestral concert of Feb. 1, it said:

"Again the orchestra had an opportunity to test the strength of strings, possibly as a natural consequence after the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suggesting 'there were kings before Agamemnon,' and the brass was absolute in pitch, a virtue that in all candor could not be remarked of the visitors, despite their strength of lungs."

In its review of the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Chicago, the News remarked after praising the various choirs: "But there are others, and Chicagoans have no ground for either adverse comparison or complaint." It, however, did justice to Dr. Muck's fine moral tone in his interpretation of "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the "perverse and debased" Strauss, as some of the New York critics characterized him in the late aesthetical discussion: "A certain refinement of performance in this reading eliminated the languorous sensuality that Strauss presents in its score in 'Salome'"?

Has the Chicago critic heard "Salome"? Or, like some of the clerical gentlemen who have rushed excitedly to print, is he boastfully unacquainted with Wilde's tragedy and Strauss' opera?

In Indianapolis.

The Indianapolis Star, however, liked Dr. Muck's interpretation of "Don Juan": "'Don Juan' was more than pleasing; its warmth and riot of emotion throbbed and echoed; at times it was only a whisper, as of an April wind that the window pane at night; then it roared and raged like a February gale; it told of love and hate, joy and sadness and of life itself." That's the stuff. They know a good thing in Indianapolis when they hear it.

"In the theatre," says the Star, "were men and women who stand for the best in the musical and artistic life of Indianapolis. They applauded and cried aloud with enthusiasm." "The fame of this orchestra rests securely upon a foundation of years and effort which defies attack by the wildest critic. The organization is a marvellous musical mechanism—capable of expressing any emotion from the whisper of death to a riot of rage."

The players "flashed friendly glances and smiles of understanding" to Dr. Muck.

"To all appearances Dr. Muck, as he stepped to the stage and fingered his baton at his desk, might have been exchanging pleasantries with other guests at some afternoon reception. He stood at ease; slight of figure, face lean and smooth-shaven; his hair worn short enough to cause doubt, almost, that it thatched a "temperament"; in height medium. He stood as a soldier at parade rest. That was his favorite attitude; with the left foot slightly in advance and his body turned toward the left. Seldom during the entire evening did he abandon this position. He seemed nonchalant, immovable. But when his baton moved, even so tiny a fraction of an inch, things happened." We are also informed that Dr. Muck does not "poke and dig at his men."

A Voice from St. Paul.

Mrs. George Barton French, formerly Katherine Richards Gordon, heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in Chicago and wrote a "private letter" about the performance to her father. Father, wishing that the letter should preserve its confidential character, took it to a St. Paul newspaper office. "Certainly," says Mrs. French, "Dr. Muck has but one rival—Nickish (sic)—and I don't quite admit that, you know. I think our St. Paul musicians would have had a good lesson in manners concerning applause, etc. The musicians all applauded Ganz with their hands (not bows and fiddles); also Dr. Muck did, and not with his baton. At the end of the concert Dr. Muck shook hands with the concert meister. Rather different behavior from the cold way we are used to, eh? Then, as the paper says, Dr. Muck turned to the concert meister, and he, in turn, requested the orchestra to rise and bow. I tell you the enthusiasm in that courteous sharing of applause was tremendous."

Views of Dr. Muck.

The critic of the Daily News (Chicago) described Dr. Muck as "a man of slender, graceful figure, a strikingly well-balanced head and a face of ascetic type, with Dantean profile."

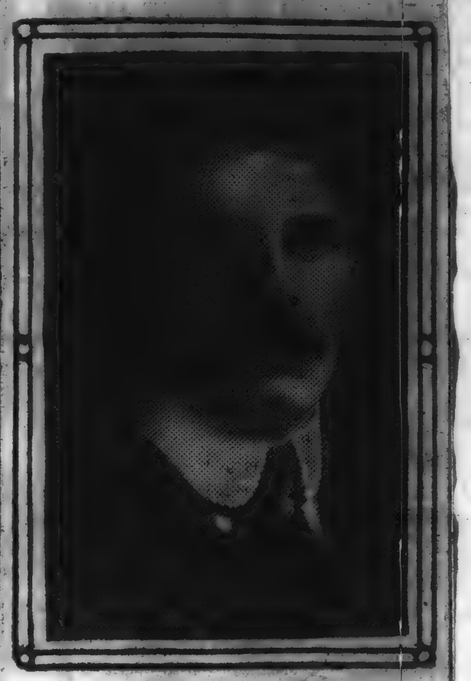
To a representative of the Inter Ocean, who asked him many questions in the lobby of the Auditorium, though, Dr. Muck, strange to say, "looked tired and bored," the conductor seemed "slender, of medium height, with the military carriage that distinguishes most Germans; he is physically almost of the athletic type." The reporter then analyzed minutely his features in an informal, breezy western manner.

Dr. Muck, according to this reporter, finds Strauss' "Salome," as most of his later works, "of only passing interest. Since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinion of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Helden Leben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first eight measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

Dr. Muck also told the reporter why he liked the overture to "Rienzi." He then pained him by remarks concerning "Beethoven tradition and accepted style." "There are standards, but they vary. I do not believe I ever conduct a work twice alike. So much depends on the mood of the moment. Of course the general lines of the interpretations, etc., etc."

This moved the reporter to regret that so sane and in every way exemplary an artist as Dr. Muck should "even for a passing moment and thoughtlessly assume this hackneyed artistic pose. Standing as one of the highest musical authorities, one of the most convincing interpreters of the day, he has doubtless outlived the time when he calculated consciously. Perhaps he can in a moment penetrate to the heart of a composition, at a glance analyze its manifold meanings. But when he communicates his intentions to the orchestra he certainly has them definitely outlined in his mind, and no matter how perfect the musical machine at his command, it is necessary to hold rehearsals."

Mrs. Helen Hunt, Solo Singer at gra



Luigi M. von Kunits,
Concert-Master.

STRAUSS' GREAT SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concerts of the 15th and 16th Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," on which the orchestra has been at work for several weeks, will be produced. This is one of the few monumental orchestral works which has had its first performance in America. When Richard Strauss visited this country, three years ago, he brought with him the score of this, his then latest composition. It was played under his direction in Carnegie Hall, New York, by the orchestra which had been organized by Mr. Hermann Hanz Wetzler.

Until his opera "Salome" was given to the public Strauss had never written any work which caused so much controversy as the "Symphonia Domestica." Its purport is to illustrate certain phases of the composer's home life. It deals with himself, his wife and his baby, as well as certain female relatives. Strauss himself has always insisted that no programme should go with the performance of the work, as he wished it to stand as absolute music and be judged on its merits as such. None the less, Strauss himself while in this country outlined a fairly comprehensive programme, the skeleton of which has been noted above.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts are most urgently requested to be in their seats promptly at the beginning of the public rehearsal on Friday and of the concert on Saturday evening. The symphony lasts in the neighborhood of 50 minutes, and is played without a pause, so that those who come late will not be admitted to the hall until the intermission.

Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering Hall on Monday evening, the 25th, will include an unfamiliar string quartet by Jaques-Dalcroze, Gabriel Faure's sonata in A major for violin and piano, and Debussy's quartet in G minor. Mr. Gabrilowitsch will be the pianist.

Paper Sun

City New York

1 3 1907 State N Y

Out of the home programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the current week there tumbles a slip of brilliant orange-colored paper with this special notice: "The 'Symphonia Domestica,' by Richard Strauss will begin the concert. It will be played in one movement, lasting fifty minutes, without pause. For this reason subscribers are urgently requested to be prompt in attendance."

Easy-going New Yorkers will be "urged" to the same purpose if not the same effect one week later.

FALL RIVER EVENING NEWS.
FEBRUARY 14. 1907.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Savoy Theater Filled—Much Interest to See Conductor Muck.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Fall River in several years, at the Savoy theater, Wednesday night, and was welcomed by an assembly that filled the pretty and popular theater. Among the audience was a large delegation of New Bedford music lovers. The program, which was not announced previous to the entertainment, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13. Grieg: Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16. Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

Naturally, there was large interest to see Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the orchestra. As the program developed it was evident that his reputation as a stickler for extremely classical and heavy works was rightly attributed. As usual the orchestra was admired for its wonderful execution, its purity of tone; the balance of the different instruments was perfection. But after these notable characteristics had given their usual thrill of pleasure, the recital failed to arouse genuine gratification and enthusiasm, except possibly with a few of the most highly educated musicians in an audience that contained many music lovers. The different movements of the three selections were easily distinguished, but what their real meaning was, what was the grand motif that either of the composers had in mind in his composition, was made clear to very few of those present. There was a general sameness of tone to the selections, when greater variety of character would have gratified and relieved a feeling that approached tediousness before the concert was concluded.

As soloist, the orchestra presented Mme. Olga Samaroff, who gave an exhibition of wonderful skill on the piano, and of fine memorizing in presenting the long and difficult work. On these lines her work was fully appreciated and she was recalled before the audience three times that she might realize how genuine this recognition of her accomplishments was.

Fall River

THE DAILY GLOBE,
FEBRUARY 14, 1907.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Very Large Audience at the Savoy Theatre Last Evening.

The Savoy theatre was filled last night with music lovers to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and itsnew conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntla," op. 13.

Grieg, Concerta in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16.
- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro moderato motto c marcato.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Unpoco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
- IV. Adogio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist—Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The audience appeared very much pleased and at times enthusiastic, but nevertheless, Dr. Muck has much to learn about the desires and tastes of some oudiences, judging from the arranging of last night's program. It goes without saying that the rythm, precision and harmony were all in delightful evidence throughout all the selections, but there was a monotony about the program which at times was conducive to somnotence alike among those who know good music and some of those who love to think they do. Had just a little more diversity and less weight been injected into last night's program, about 85 per cent of last night's audience would have been better pleased, even though not all of that 85 per cent will admit that fact in company. All of his activity, motion and life, which have been accredited to Dr. Muck by the newspapere, were realized in his work last night, and he seems to have thorough control and command of the famous orchestra, in every portion of his duty as a great director. The soloist, Miss Samaroff, was enthusiastically greeted in her several numbers, and the audience worked hard for an encore number from the young pianist, without success.

[143]

WESTERN OPINION OF OUR WHAT CONDUCTOR MUCK

Mr. Arthur Harlmann, Fiddler, Makes Suggestions as to How the Boston Organization Might Be Improved.

BY PHILIP HALE.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, visiting Chicago, was welcomed in a most hearty manner. The tribute paid Maj. H. L. Higginson and the orchestra in the official programme book of the Chicago organization was as generous as it was complimentary. Boston might in this respect learn lessons in fine courtesy from the western city.

That the Chicagoans should make comparisons between their own orchestra and the one visiting them was inevitable. That some of the Chicago newspapers should say frankly that the Chicago orchestra is the better of the two was to be expected. The people of Chicago take a godlike pride in all that they have done, are doing and purpose to do. They not only see that it is all good; they shout their belief.

This reminds me of the heroic speech of the late Mr. Kelly, the Rolling Mill Man, a true wit and humorist, whose praise was sounded by Mr. Antonio Pastor in his reminiscences published recently in the New York Sun. (Mr. Pastor should write his memoirs. Though living, he is even now one of the immortals. Who does not remember him in his glorious days, with leg boots and shiny plug hat, inviting the audience to join in the chorus of "Down in a Coal Mine"?)

Mr. Kelly was in Chicago—The Herald may have told the story before, but it is a joy forever. He faced an audience roaring with delight. He had recited one of his monologues, possibly the one that described his method of obtaining a pie when he had no money. Men in their ecstasy had beaten their sides till they were sore, had punched their neighbors or slapped them on the back in wild, gregarious appreciation. "Kelly! Kelly!" And the only Kelly returned to the stage. He waved his hand for silence. "Ah, ladies and gentlemen," he said, with deep emotion, "after all, there is only one city." Shouts, howls, yells of delight for at least 10 minutes. The audience was finally exhausted, and Mr. Kelly could again be heard. "And that, ladies and gentlemen, is—New York."

Chicago's Verdict.

When the Chicago Orchestra, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, as it is now named, appeared on the platform at Orchestra Hall, Feb. 1, there was an "enthusiastic and prolonged demonstration upon the part of the audience." This, the Chicago Journal tells us, was "a spontaneous outbreak of approval of the gifted leader and his band of artists. At least a portion of the audience had heard this week the Boston Symphony organization, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whose work bears the unqualified indorsement of musical Germany. They had time to arrive at a conclusion, and yesterday they expressed it."

The headline voiced this conclusion: "Local Orchestra Pre-eminent." "It has this week become plainly apparent that the Theodore Thomas orchestra is the best in the country and has but few equals in the world."

"Its wood-wind section cannot be equalled in the perfect blending of tone, and such men as Barthel, Schuers, Quensel, Kruse and Starke are in a class by themselves. Tettelman, the drummer, is a superb artist, a man whose musical instinct is so keen and whose sense of dynamic proportions so exact that his every performance is a work of art. And there are no better trap men anywhere than Wintrich and Wagner." There is similar eulogy of violinists and 'cellists. "The men that sit back of Esser and Meyer in the viola section are entirely capable, and today stand out in bold relief in the light of recent events. Chicago has now more reason than ever to be proud of its magnificent orchestra and its splendid leader."

This is as it should be.

The Chicago News was almost as violently patriotic, not to say chauvinistic or parochial. Speaking of the Theodore Thomas orchestral concert of Feb. 1, it said:

"Again the orchestra had an opportunity to test the strength of strings, possibly as a natural consequence after the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suggesting 'there were kings before Agamemnon,' and the brass was absolute in pitch, a virtue that in all candor could not be remarked of the visitors, despite their strength of strings."

In its review of the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Chicago, the News remarked after praising the various choirs: "But there are others, and Chicagoans have no ground for either adverse comparison or complaint." It, however, did justice to Dr. Muck's fine moral tone in his interpretation of "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the "perverse and debased" Strauss, as some of the New York critics characterized him in the late aesthetical discussion: "A certain refinement of performance in this reading eliminated the languorous sensuality that Strauss presents in its 'acme' in 'Salome' "?

Has the Chicago critic heard "Salome"? Or, like some of the clerical gentlemen who have rushed excitedly into print, is he boastfully unacquainted with Wilde's tragedy and Strauss' opera?

In Indianapolis.

The Indianapolis Star, however, liked Dr. Muck's interpretation of "Don Juan": "'Don Juan' was more than pleasing; its warmth and riot of emotion throbbed and echoed; at times it was only a whisper, as of an April wind against the window pane at night; then it roared and raged like a February gale; it told of love and hate, joy and sadness and of life itself." That's the stuff. They know a good thing in Indianapolis when they hear it.

"In the theatre," says the Star, "were men and women who stand for the best in the musical and artistic life of Indianapolis. They applauded and cried aloud in their enthusiasm." "The fame of this orchestra rests securely upon a foundation of years and effort which defies attack by the wildest critic. The organization is a marvellous musical mechanism—capable of expressing any emotion from the whisper of death to a riot of rage."

The players "flashed friendly glances and smiles of understanding" to Dr. Muck.

"To all appearances Dr. Muck, as he stepped to the stage and fingered his baton at his desk, might have been exchanging pleasantries with other guests at some afternoon reception. He stood at ease; slight of figure, face lean and smooth-shaven; his hair worn short enough to cause doubt, almost, that it thatched a "temperament"; in height medium. He stood as a soldier at parade rest. That was his favorite attitude; with the left foot slightly in advance and his body turned toward the left. Seldom during the entire evening did he abandon this position. He seemed nonchalant, immovable. But when his baton moved, even so tiny a fraction of an inch, things happened." We are also informed that Dr. Muck does not "poke and dig at his men."

A Voice from St. Paul.

Mrs. George Barton French, formerly Katherine Richards Gordon, heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in Chicago and wrote a "private letter" about the performance to her father. Father, wishing that the letter should preserve its confidential character, took it to a St. Paul newspaper office. "Certainly," says Mrs. French, "Dr. Muck has but one rival—Nickish (sic)—and I don't quite admit that, you know. I think our St. Paul musicians would have had a good lesson in manners concerning applause, etc. The musicians all applauded Ganz with their hands (not bows and fiddles); also Dr. Muck did, and not with his baton. At the end of the concert Dr. Muck shook hands with the concert meister. Rather different behavior from the cold way we are used to, eh? Then, as the paper says, Dr. Muck turned to the concert meister, and he, in turn, requested the orchestra to rise and bow. I tell you the enthusiasm in that courteous sharing of applause was tremendous."

Views of Dr. Muck.

The critic of the Daily News (Chicago) described Dr. Muck as "a man of slender, graceful figure, a strikingly well-balanced head and a face of ascetic type, with Dantean profile."

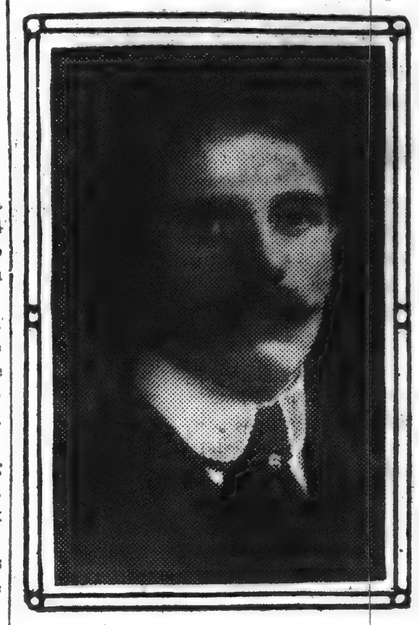
To a representative of the Inter Ocean, who asked him many questions in the lobby of the Auditorium, though, Dr. Muck, strange to say, "looked tired and bored," the conductor seemed "slender, of medium height, with the military carriage that distinguishes most Germans; he is physically almost of the athletic type." The reporter then analyzed minutely his features in an informal, breezy western manner.

Dr. Muck, according to this reporter, finds Strauss' "Salome," as most of his later works, "of only passing interest. Since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinion of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Helden Leben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first eight measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

Dr. Muck also told the reporter why he liked the overture to "Rienzi." He then pained him by remarks concerning "Beethoven tradition and accepted style." "There are standards, but they vary. I do not believe I ever conduct a work twice alike. So much depends on the mood of the moment. Of course the general lines of the interpretations, etc., etc."

This moved the reporter to regret that so sane and in every way exemplary an artist as Dr. Muck should "even for a passing moment and thoughtlessly assume this hackneyed artistic pose. Standing as one of the highest musical authorities, one of the most convincing interpreters of the day, he has doubtless outlived the time when he calculated consciously. Perhaps he can in a moment penetrate to the heart of a composition, at a glance analyze its manifold meanings. But when he communicates his intentions to the orchestra he certainly has them definitely outlined in his mind, and no matter how perfect the musical machine at his command, it is necessary to hold rehearsals."

Mrs. Helen Hunt, Solo Singer at gra



Luigi M. von Kunits,
Concert-Master.

STRAUSS' GREAT SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concerts of the 15th and 16th Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," on which the orchestra has been at work for several weeks, will be produced. This is one of the few monumental orchestral works which has had its first performance in America. When Richard Strauss visited this country, three years ago, he brought with him the score of this, his then latest composition. It was played under his direction in Carnegie Hall, New York, by the orchestra which had been organized by Mr. Hermann Hanz Wetzler.

Until his opera "Salome" was given to the public Strauss had never written any work which caused so much controversy as the "Symphonia Domestica." Its purport is to illustrate certain phases of the composer's home life. It deals with himself, his wife and his baby, as well as certain female relatives. Strauss himself has always insisted that no programme should go with the performance of the work, as he wished it to stand as absolute music and be judged on its merits as such. None the less, Strauss himself while in this country outlined a fairly comprehensive programme, the skeleton of which has been noted above.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts are most urgently requested to be in their seats promptly at the beginning of the public rehearsal on Friday and of the concert on Saturday evening. The symphony lasts in the neighborhood of 50 minutes, and is played without a pause, so that those who come late will not be admitted to the hall until the intermission.

Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering Hall on Monday evening, the 25th, will include an unfamiliar string quartet by Jaques-Dalcroze, Gabriel Faure's sonata in A major for violin and piano, and Debussy's quartet in G minor. Mr. Gabrilowitsch will be the pianist.

Paper Sun

City New York

State N Y

Out of the home programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the current week there tumbles a slip of brilliant orange-colored paper with this special notice: "The 'Symphonia Domestica,' by Richard Strauss will begin the concert. It will be played in one movement, lasting fifty minutes, without pause. For this reason subscribers are urgently requested to be prompt in attendance."

Easy-going New Yorkers will be "urged" to the same purpose if not the same effect one week later.

FALL RIVER EVENING NEWS.
FEBRUARY 14, 1907.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Savoy Theater Filled—Much Interest to See Conductor Muck.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Fall River in several years, at the Savoy theater, Wednesday night, and was welcomed by an assembly that filled the pretty and popular theater. Among the audience was a large delegation of New Bedford music lovers. The program, which was not announced previous to the entertainment, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13. Grieg: Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16. Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

Naturally, there was large interest to see Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the orchestra. As the program developed it was evident that his reputation as a stickler for extremely classical and heavy works was rightly attributed. As usual the orchestra was admired for its wonderful execution, its purity of tone: the balance of the different instruments was perfection. But after these notable characteristics had given their usual thrill of pleasure, the recital failed to arouse genuine gratification and enthusiasm, except possibly with a few of the most highly educated musicians in an audience that contained many music lovers The different movements of the three selections were easily distinguished, but what their real meaning was, what was the grand motif that either of the composers had in mind in his composition, was made clear to very few of those present. There was a general sameness of tone to the selections, when greater variety of character would have gratified and relieved a feeling that approached tediousness before the concert was concluded.

As soloist, the orchestra presented Mme. Olga Samaroff, who gave an exhibition of wonderful skill on the piano, and of fine memorizing in presenting the long and difficult work. On these lines her work was fully appreciated and she was recalled before the audience three times that she might realize how genuine this recognition of her accomplishments was.

THE DAILY GLOBE,
FEBRUARY 14, 1907.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Very Large Audience at the Savoy Theatre Last Evening.

The Savoy theatre was filled last night with music lovers to hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and itsnew conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The programme was as follows:

Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntia," op. 13.

Grieg, Concerta in A minor for pianoforte, op. 16.
- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro moderato motto c marcato.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Unpoco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
- IV. Adogio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist—Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The audience appeared very much pleased and at times enthusiastic, but nevertheless, Dr. Muck has much to learn about the desires and tastes of some oudiences, judging from the arranging of last night's program. It goes without saying that the rythm, precision and harmony were all in delightful evidence throughout all the selections, but there was a monotony about the program which at times was conducive to somnotence alike among those who know good music and some of those who love to think they do. Had just a little more diversity and less weight been injected into last night's program, about 85 per cent of last night's audience would have been better pleased, even though not all of that 85 per cent. will admit that fact in company. All of his activity, motion and life, which have been accredited to Dr. Muck by the newspapere, were realized in his work last night, and he seems to have thorough control and command of the famous orchestra, in every portion of his duty as a great director. The soloist, Miss Samaroff, was enthusiastically greeted in her several numbers, and the audience worked hard for an encore number from the young pianist, without success.

THE FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD
THURSDAY FEBRUARY 14 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT GRAND MUSIC EVENT

It was a very pleasant experience of itself to go into the Savoy last night and find the pretty theatre filled to overflowing, except the gallery, for a Boston Symphony orchestra concert. This organization has a band of faithful followers of considerable size in this city that can always be counted on for its concerts, but in some seasons the general public has paid scant attention to the annual Symphony concert. The fine big audience last night and the unquestioned enjoyment with which the selections with their varied movements, as a whole, were followed were good evidences both of the popularity here of this great musical organization and of the growing appreciation of the best that there is in music.

It is three or four seasons since the orchestra has been here before, and the big welcoming house must have been very satisfactory to the musicians as it certainly was to O. Elton Borden, who had charge of the local management of the concert.

Even the gallery, with its capacity of 400 seats, was quite well filled, and there were people enough standing on the two floors below to have filled it completely. A party of 160 came over from New Bedford, and there were many others from out of town. The receipts were over $100 better in total than the best record of a Boston Symphony concert at the Academy.

Of the orchestra and its work there is practically nothing new to be said. It is as near perfection as any organization for the rendering of orchestral music has ever been. There were 68 musicians and they played with the brilliancy, swing, melody and precision of asingle grand instrument under the hands of a master who was also a genius. It was almost as though the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, were playing such an instrument, so absolute was his control and so direct the response to every slightest movement of his baton.

Interest in the talented man and a desire to see him contributed more than a little to the drawing of people to the concert. The first conductor of the Royal Opera of Berlin, he is one of the leading men in the whole musical world. Of slight figure and still in early middle lief, he looks the good fellow in private life that he is reported to be. On the conductor's platform the "good fellow" gives way to the artist. There have been strong men here in direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra before, but never anyone stronger than this season's conductor, on leave of absence for a year by special permission of the German Emperor. He has no mannerisms, but a personality that dominates every man under him, great and celebrated musicians as many of them are. He puts an immense amount of vitality itno his work, his intensity being of a degree almost tiring to one watching him.

The remarkable success that he has made with the musical world in the short time that he has been here is easily understood, once he has been seen conducting.

Almost equally interesting with Dr. Muck was the soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff. A Texan by birth, she has lived most of her life abroad, and is a thorough cosmopolitan, having studied and played in all of the musical centers of Europe. Most of her life has been spent in Paris, Berlin and Moscow. Compoloite that she is, and foreign as her name is, Mme. Samaroff is after all an American, and America has good cause to be proud of her for she is one of the greatest of living women pianists. Like all great artists her technique is without a flaw. Apart from her technique she has a very graceful individual style, and great brilliancy of execution. A marked delicacy of touch, she possesses also an unexpected reserved force, which was specially marked in the third movement.

The Greig selection played by her was the Concerto in A minor, op. 16, in three movements, allegro molto moderato, adagio and allegro moderato molto e marcato. The number was new here, but it was reminiscent of other things by Greig that have been given here, notably the "Peer Gynt" suite. The number is very exacting, requiring a force which very few women players could give. In the third movement the force of the playing was most marked.

Mme. Samaroff is a very graceful woman. When playing she is very serious, and those who were looking for a pretty woman were at first disappointed. When she came out in response to the repeated calls this disappointment wholly disappeared, for, freed from her work, her face lighted up in response to the enthusiastic tribute and she was pretty and even charming.

The orchestral part in the pianoforte number was, of course, perfectly played.

Excepting Mme. Samaroff's number the programme was somewhat heavy. This observation applies especially to the symphony number. Brahms' works are always more or less heavy to any except cultured musicians, and Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68, which was played last night, and was new here, is because of its constant repetitions more tedious than some of the others. The perfect rendering was a treat to the musicians present ,long as was the number. With three numbers in all in place of four as customary the concert lasted as long as usual because of the length of the symphony number. There are four general movements with several subdivisions.

There were passages which delighted everybody. Notable among these was the solo by Prof. Willy Hess, the talented leading violinist. The last movement roused everybody because of its spirit. The whole number in its playing exacted the closest attention of every man in the orchestra, and it was not to be wondered at that many in the audience forced in spite of themselves to follow it through were tired at the close.

The opening number was the overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13, by Goldmark, a composer little known here. It has an oriental color and is unlike overtures better known here.

The people in the audience enjoyed recognizing Prof. Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski, Otto Roth among the violins, Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist; Emile Ferir, viola, and a dozen others, well known and popular here through frequent visits here with the orchestra, and in smaller organization.

Boston Transcript

824 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

WANING PROSPECT OF STRAUSS'S "SALOME"

Dr. Muck Almost Turns Operatic Conductor—Tschaikovski and Mme. Samaroff—A Concert of String Quartets—A Prize Play Imitates "The Lion and the Mouse"—Bernhardt Acts One More Youthful Gallant—Mr. Savage to Try Wagner's "Ring" in English?

Apparently the prospect of a performance in Boston of Richard Strauss's "Salome" is diminishing. "From all I can gather," writes a correspondent within the Metropolitan Opera House, "there is likely to be no performance of 'Salome' in Boston or anywhere else by the Conried company. I can't get an official statement to that effect, but I feel pretty sure that Boston will not be permitted to gaze upon the Strauss 'operalization,' of the Eden Musée. The reasons are many—the cost of the orchestra, the difficulty of keeping the cast in rehearsal, the chance of some trouble, and finally (I suspect) the reluctance of Conried to go counter to the wishes of the directors. It does n't pay to buck Wall Street and the Four Hundred."

The Week-End Concerts

Dr. Muck was almost the operatic conductor at the Symphony concert of Saturday, and the dramatic qualities that are in him had an outlet that his severer programmes do not always afford. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is as truly music to accompany, enforce and illuminate an action, as though the enchanted broom were running to and fro with its buckets on the stage and not merely in Goethe's verses in the programme book. There is the magical spell to weave; the broom to exorcise; its speed with the buckets and the deluge of water and of fear with which it overwhelms the apprentice to portray until the potent word of the master-sorcerer sends it back to its corner. The scherzo is a sprightly musical farce, one of the few like Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" that really "comes off"—impossible to represent illusively on the stage, but quite possible to depict in tones. Dr. Muck and his men played it as though they were acting it. They spun the tale vivaciously, wove its atmosphere of humorous fantasy, caught its dramatic accents, contrasts and climaxes. They flung it off with the zest that a farce must have in tones or in anything else; and they added the last virtue of buoyant spontaneity and lightly incisive brilliance. The rhythm throughout pricked the fancy more keenly than spoken words; the whole scherzo rippled with action; the end was like a "quick curtain."

Again in Tschaikovski's piano concerto in B-flat minor, Dr. Muck and Mme. Samaroff sought and gained the dramatic accent that makes it one of the very few modern concertos that is alive. The music is no mere combination of tonal patterns, imaginative or perfunctory, and no adroit or obvious means for the display of the pianist's virtuosity. It is the best praise of it and of the pianist that the listener hears with little thought of technical achievement. As remote is the quest of mere ingenuity. The listener does not wonder what the composer will invent next. Instead, he yields quickly to a truly dramatic poem that Tschaikovski chose to have a piano and an orchestra sing. Each has its moods and passions. The voice of the one answers the voice of the other. Melody struggles with melody, in a very conflict of musical wills. There are retorts, encouragements, pauses, excitements. A dozen contrasting emotions play through the music, from the struggling melody of the introduction to the whirling dance of the close. Again, the rhythm is as action. Again, the whole is as a drama in tones. Again, Dr. Muck, with Mme. Samaroff gave it motion, illusion and vitality. Granted an imagination like Tschaikovski's and there is no need to anticipate the extinction of concertos. Granted such a performance as Dr. Muck's and Mme. Samaroff's and there is no need to deprecate the playing of them as so much routine.

In the scherzo and in the concerto Dr. Muck had music that is inherently dramatic. In Tinel's "tone-pictures" out of Corneille's "Polyeucte,' he had music that was intended to be such, but was not. In spite of the secluded asceticism that Tinel cultivates, the "tone-pictures" are rhetorical, declamatory, theatrical, meet adornment for [illegible] when Polyeucte [illegible] an anniversary of Corn[illegible] death. In the music it is eas[illegible] hear Mounet-Sully, Sylvain[illegible] udley stalking and mouthing [illegible] agedy on the stage of the The[illegible] while a dutiful audience tries [illegible] sponsive emotions. The play[illegible] is to make Corneille's verse[illegible] and it was the conductor's bu[illegible] Saturday to make Tinel's music "sound." He and his men must transform its swelling rhetoric into sonorous tonal pomp; they must lift its stilted declamation into heroic utterance; they must give the music the grandiose stride and air. In a word, they must glorify it as the French singers of a passing generation used to glorify Meyerbeer's operas. The first concern of the theatre is to persuade for and on the instant, letting cool and subsequent reflections be what they will. If Tinel's music is to make any impression at all, it must be played with equal theatrical intent. To treat it perfunctorily is to betray every one of its weaknesses. To inflate it too much is to turn it into empty bombast. Between is a golden mean that touches it with a grandiose glamor and makes it seem large and almost significant. At that mean Dr. Muck held the "tone-pictures." They sounded grandiloquent; they almost sounded dramatic; and to make them so was perhaps a more difficult and strenuous feat of conducting than to give Dukas's scherzo or Tschaikovski's concerto its native dramatic accent. It would be good to hear Dr. Muck conduct an opera of Meyerbeer.

Mme. Samaroff's playing of the solo part in Tschaikovsky's concerto confirmed her place among the young pianists of the new school whose traits, apropos of Mr. Ganz, we were noting the other day. Throughout Mme. Samaroff was eloquent with the appropriate eloquence of the music; throughout she seemed to take no thought of herself but every thought of Tschaikovsky. She conceived the concerto as a whole tone-poem, not as a succession of individual and telling effects. It never halted and it never made undue haste. It marched surely and clearly to its moments of decisive contrast and climax. Mme. Samaroff's gradual unfolding and illuminating of the spacious melody of the introduction was truly moving, as a broad, deep beam traverses and dispels surrounding mists. She kept the ensuing allegro alive with rhythm and warmly dramatic with sensuous feeling. The lyric intermezzo—for the second movement is none other—she softened or brightened with a pliant and sensitive charm that has not always been so delicate in her playing. In the finale she and the orchestra struck alternate fire until the music first glinted and then blazed. And all this without a hint of extravagance, exaggeration or toil, with entire command of an expressive technic, an animating touch, and a tone that is as the idea or the emotion made beautiful, vital or eloquent sound. Throughout the impression was of the pianist's mastery of herself, her instrument and her music. The impression was so deep, so stirring, because of the sense behind of full understanding, of emotion felt and controlled, of passion that is ordered because it is so strong.

Mr. Hess is an unpretentiously skilful maker of programmes. Yesterday afternoon he and his three comrades of the Symphony Quartette had the whole of the Sunday chamber concert at Chickering Hall to themselves. They played only quartettes or parts of quartettes—Tschaikovski's in D major—the quartette of the lovely andante; Grieg's in G minor—the quartette that is almost orchestral in the expression of restless moods; the varied andante of Beethoven's quartette in A major, and three short fragments of a serenade for the four string voices by Jacques-Dalcroze. It was a long programme, as the lists of these concerts go. On paper, with what are really twelve pieces for string quartette it suggested monotony. Yet in actual performance it brought no sense of cloyed or strained attention. It was almost novel, for example, to hear Tschaikovski's quartette from first to last, and to recall that the long, tremulous, softly shimmering curve of the Andante—a perfect Russian melody in its insistently melancholy and graceful flow—is not its only charm. It is a lyric Tschaikovski that is writing it throughout as one who puts impulsive or musing fancies, and not deep emotions or poignant song to music paper. Beethoven turned playful like a robuster Mozart made his Andante and variations interesting.

The fragments of Jacques-Dalcroze's "serenade" showed him writing more lightly than he did in his concerto for violin last winter, but with similar faith and skill in rhythm and the contrasting play of instrumental voices rather than in the invention and enrichment of melody. His melodies were short-breathed, but so also were the little pieces that contained them, while from them he summoned lightly his fanciful play with rhythms and the voices of his quartet. Even the neglected viola tempted him. It was Grieg, rather than Dalcroze, who seemed the modern of moderns in the quartet that ended the concert. Only Smetana's "Out of My Own Life" is comparable with it, among the quartets of our own time, in its intensity of personal feeling, in the restless passion of its utterance, and its desire to make the four instruments speak with the power, poignancy and variety of an orchestra itself. Its changeful moods by the very intensity of them melt the form to the composer's purpose and make the voices his cry. How Grieg would write for orchestra, the listener says as he hears, and yet when Grieg did write for orchestra, how poor in comparison was his work. Thus did Mr. Hess keep the interest of his hearers to the end, and thus—one more proof of his skill in programme-making—did he keep to music that asked the best traits of his quartet. It still lacks the highly polished graces, the delicate euphonies, the balanced poise, the sensitive variations of tone that are the crown of a string quartet. But it has the warmth of feeling, the eagerness of expression, the incisiveness of rhythm and accent, the swiftness of transition, the response to vivid, fitful or sustained mood that was the heart of most of the music it played yesterday. It has still to play with finesse. It does play with emotion.

H. T. P.

N SUNDAY GLOBE
FEBRUARY 17, 190[illegible]

MUSICAL MATTERS

Strauss' Eccentric "Sinfonia Domestica."

Mme Homer Sings Tonight With the Handel and Haydn.

Pittsburg Orchestra and Other Concerts.

Domestic affairs musically illustrated by Richard Strauss under the title of "Sinfonia Domestica" formed the feature of the 15th Symphony program, in which Brahms' second piano concerto and his "Academic Festival" overture aided in making up a concert of two hours' duration. Mr Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist in the concerto. This popular pianist chose a work that is not very frequently heard, probably because of its numerous uninteresting passages and monotonous moments. It is a strange combination of Brahms in some strongly contrasted moods with long stretches of what might be termed musical lassitude, in which the solo instrument has little to express and that of no great musical importance.

The first movement is very deliberate in its thematic treatment; the second is fragmentary and seemingly disconnected in ideas; in the third part the duets between cello and violin are the principal and most interesting periods, and the last movement is charmingly graceful and animated and partaking of the character of a dance.

In the first part Gabrilowitsch displayed his virtuosity in the cadenza, again showing wonderful deftness in the showers of arpeggios, clear and crisp, that fairly drifted from his nimble fingers until at the close his thunderous fortissimo held its own against the orchestral force. The monotony of the piano part in the second movement gave him little chance for effective work. The figurations in the third part between the cello and piano were beautifully played, and the soloist at the end of the coda gave as brilliant an exhibition of trills and other rapid and delicate finger work as one could reasonably expect to hear. The finale gave Gabrilowitsch additional opportunity for showing dainty and cantabile passage work of exquisite character.

Dr Muck's orchestra was augmented to about 100 men for the performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica," a composition into which Strauss apparently endeavored to weave technical difficulties fairly disheartening to the instrumentalist of mediocre ability. Since the monumental work was first produced it has been the subject of lively controversy as to its merits and value to musical literature for the scheme of illustrating domesticity in such a great melodic or rather nonmelodic, form has excited considerable derision, and probably not without just cause.

Strauss is said to have made the claim that it is "absolute" music and needs no program, yet when in this country last season he gave a fairly explicit synopsis of the piece, and this idea has been accepted as really his intention. His keen scent for sensational subjects is shown in some of his later works, "Salome," for instance, and even the New York skyscrapers are said to have impressed him as subjects for orchestral exploitation.

Nearly an hour of audacious tone pictures, dealing with certain phases of the composer's life, himself, his wife, his baby and "his sisters and his cousins and his aunts," may be interesting for some people, but the circle cannot be very large. Granting him marvelous skill in instrumental combinations and grasp of orchestral effects, that seem to have no limitations, he deliberately manipulates his thematic materials in a manner disagreeable to the concert patron, who loves music for its intrinsic worth and does not revel in the abnormal.

It is no use to discuss the "musical speech," uttered in this symphony. Since it was finished in 1903-04 it has been played many times by many orchestras in Europe, and with very few repetitions by the same bands, and America has heard it a few times. Strauss conducted the work in New York three years ago.

The orchestra performed an arduous task in playing this elaborate and comparatively incoherent work, and at its close Dr Muck and all the men seemed fatigued, and also much pleased with accomplishing a feat of endurance and concentrated attention that was nerve testing. That they solved the musical enigma satisfactorily one may readily understand. The audience was very enthusiastic over the performance, Dr Muck calling upon his associates to rise and bow recognition for the plaudits. These evidently were for the players and not the composition.

And how different was the reception given the "Academic" overture, for the usually sedate symphony people fairly drowned with applause portions of the always delightful work because of the splendid verve and swing with which the "students' songs" were played. "Gaudeamus," beloved by hundreds of thousands, was loudly applauded.

The orchestra will make its fourth trip this week. The program March 1 and 2 will comprise the symphonic poems, "The Sea," by Debussy, given here for the first time; "Olaf's Wedding Dance," by A. Ritter, also for the first time at these concerts; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the overture to the "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz.

---

[144]

FEB. 16, 1907.

E. SAMAROFF AND SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays Tinel's "Symphonic Pictures" Here for First Time.

DUKAS' WITTY SCHERZO AGAIN ON PROGRAMME

Soloist Gives Superb Performance of Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the solo pianist. The programme was as follows:

Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas
Concerto for piano No. 1.....Tschaikowsky
Three Symphonic Pictures derived from Corneille's "Polyeucte".....Tinel

Dukas' Scherzo was played last night at the Symphony concerts for the third time. Although the composer is over 40 years old, the list of his published works is a short one. His opera, founded on Maeterlinck's musical, yet vivid, version of the legend of Bluebeard, is completed, but has not yet been performed. Since 1897 no new important work for orchestra by Dukas has been produced. His "Villanelle" for horn and piano was performed about a month ago at a concert in Paris.

It would seem that Dukas has not naturally a fertile musical mind, and that composition is to him a set and arduous task. He is now known at the age of 40 to the world as the composer of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." He is, then, a brother in eloquence of "Single-speech" Hamilton, who, by the way, is said to have made other speeches and good ones. Dukas has his overture to "Polyeucte," his symphony, his piano sonata, but who knows them or hears of them?

His scherzo in illustration of Goethe's ballad presupposes for enjoyment an acquaintance with the poem. It is not necessary to go back to Lucian's satiric sketch, where Goethe found the story. There was a time when Lucian's "Dialogues of the Dead" were read in class at Exeter, and in other schools; but the "Lie-Fancier" was not read by many schoolboys, and Lucian today is numbered among the "quick sellers." How many in the audience last night, outside of the German born, were familiar with Goethe's ballad?

This is an instance where the title does not give to the great majority of American hearers at least immediate information concerning the musical contents of the piece. Of course, all respectable sorcerers have apprentices, as the virtuoso today seldom travels without his secretary; but if the scherzo be judged humorous or grim or satirical, the judge must base his opinion on comparisons made at the time between Goethe's ballad and Dukas' work, and he thus runs the risk of not hearing all the music, or of failing to appreciate the transliteration into music of a particular passage.

Suppose the hearer ignorant of the poem and the story. Does the scherzo speak for itself without any association of ideas to impress or charm him? Is the appeal instinctional or merely one to the intellect?

The interpretation of Dr. Muck and the performance of the orchestra were extraordinarily brilliant, so brilliant that they might have vitalised less interesting and effective music.

It is perhaps not too much to say that any one entirely ignorant of Goethe's ballad would be nevertheless entertained and impressed by the rhythmic quaintness and capricious-ness, the swing and dash, the mystery, the humor, the musicality, the glitter of the instrumentation. This music appeals both to the sensitive nerves and to cool intellect. Perhaps that was familiar with the story perhaps had a fuller appreciation than another whom the scherzo was simply a brilliant prozzo. But this music is more than Shramme music.

Should one ask whether a broom be proper material for an art work, answer him, "Some broomstick may be tragic." Men, women, little children have been tortured, hanged, burned, drowned, because they were convicted on the evidence of trustworthy persons who saw them riding to Satan's Sabbat astride a broomstick.

Mme. Samaroff gave a superb performance of the gorgeously barbaric concerto of Tschaikowsky. For once the introductory defiant theme was taken at a pace that allowed the expression of arrogant pomp. The contrast with the main body of the movement was the more dramatic. The whole performance of the first movement was dramatic and exciting, from the mumbling theme, which the composer heard from a beggar's lips, to the sonorous close.

Admirable, too, was Mme. Samaroff's reading of the second movement, by reason of simplicity and expression of contrasted moods. The finale was in the Cossack spirit and the performance was distinguished by its rhythm and color. The pace at which it was taken was swift, but none too swift; the mechanism was clear and polished; it never became a scramble.

The whole performance was thoughtful, considered, thoroughly prepared, brilliant in detail, irresistible in dash, full of authority. The repose of the player, her modesty, her freedom from self-consciousness, made this performance more memorable. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was an inspiration to her. He, a man of strong, if not bigoted, musical convictions, saw in Polyeucte, the hero of Corneille's tragedy, a symbol of the soul, as his own poverty had taught him to glorify in music St. Francis of Assisi, who was never tired of singing the praises of poverty.

Tinel's tragedy. Tinel wrote an orchestral movement descriptive of the scene, and a musical illustration of Jupiter's Temple. The festival march,

The first item of the parade for the Emperor Severus, who, lured by rest, was reported dead on the battle field, for the close a grand apotheosis—the triumph of Christianity, as shown by the conversions that followed the beheadment of Polyeucte.

The dream of Pauline—how Severus appeared to her and reproached her for infidelity, and her father, Felix, stabbed her husband—gave opportunity for dramatic composition, as the temple scene for pomp and ceremony, song and dance, melodramatic intensity. Nor was the stern, yet mystical Tinel disturbed by the thought of ballet music. It will be remembered that he introduced a waltz in his "Franciscus."

It is a curious fact that when Gounod's "Polyeucte" was produced at the Opera, Paris, the chief feature was the first appearance of Rosita Mauri, the Spanish dancer, in the temple scene. Dancers costumed as Roman legionaries in blue and pink answered the fanfare of Bellona. The entrance of Venus Amphitrite was declared "delicious." A waltz of Nereids was one of the most successful numbers.

As for Rosita she danced a mazurka in a fine anachronistic spirit. She impersonated Venus, and there was a grave discussion at the time whether her legs were not too thin for ideal beauty. This amiable and entertaining discussion did not save the opera. Donizetti's "Polinto" is now forgotten. The Iconoclast of Nicomedia cuts no figure today on the operatic stage. He still awaits a composer.

Tinels' overture and temple music are fortunate in this: They may pass in the concert hall as absolute music. Pauline's Dream is naturally in need of an interpreter. The overture might be concerned with any man or woman, for a choral does not necessarily have any definite, particular significance. It is used by composers of chamber music, symphonies, violin concertos, without any compelling reason. "Festival in Jupiter's Temple" might be any festival with march and dances—for the music that afterward deals specifically with Polyeucte is of less importance.

When the music is carefully examined it is for the most part conventional or unaffectedly cheap. The overture is sound and orthodox. It is also too long by reason of undue development and damnable iteration. There is one phrase—the more sentimental portion of the second theme—that fairly gets on the hearer's nerves before the composer, enamored of it, is willing to dismiss it in its original form. Nevertheless this overture is the best of the three "Pictures."

Tinel, a well educated musician, with orchestral fluency, is not dramatic. His lack of dramatic force is shown in his "Franciscus." When he came to write music for Pauline's dream, the task was beyond his ability, and as absolute music, the movement is uninteresting. Nor does the "Festival" music suggest the solemn rites, the sacred dances.

The march might have been sketched by any English doctor of music as a closing organ voluntary, and the dances have neither mystical significance nor voluptuous grace.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra did their utmost in the service of Tinel, but the material with which they had to work was ordinary, lumpish, insufficient.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907

Since Weingartner ceased coming to America and Gericke returned to Vienna, the works of Berlioz have been less frequently performed than they used to be. Next Friday, however, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will favor Brooklynites with that composer's "Harold in Italy," which will, no doubt, be a notable one—such a one as Berlioz himself never was able to hear. It was composed in 1834 and in those days Paris, one of the leading musical cities of Europe, was very far behind where New York is now. A vivid picture of the situation is given by Ernest Newman in his "Musical Studies":

It was not until 1828 (the year after his death) that Beethoven made any impression on Paris. Orchestras were generally incompetent and audiences ignorant. The calibre of the average French orchestra of the time may be gauged from the fact that even the more reputable bands found Mozart's symphonies by no means easy. One shudders to think what the ordinary orchestra must have been like, and what was the quality of the music to which they had grown accustomed. As for the audiences, where they were not extremely uneducated, they were extremely prejudiced, clinging blindly to the remains of the pseudo-classical principles that had been bequeathed to them by their fathers. An audience that could be worked into a perfect frenzy of rage because an actor, outraging all the proprieties of the time, actually referred in "Othello" to something so vulgar as a handkerchief, would hardly look with favor on anything revolutionary either in idea or technique. At the opera the Italians were mostly in vogue. The French public knew little of instrumental music pure and simple, and were almost entirely ignorant of the huge developments of German music.

Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" for the First Time—A Notably Imaginative and Sympathetic Performance That Seemed to Give the Music Its True Voice—Two First Impressions: The Beauty of Much of the Tone-Poem and the Humanity of It All—Music of the Zest of Life

Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday, and, by æsthetic standards, for the first time in America. True, a "scratch" orchestra played it in New York, with the composer conducting, three years ago; but with all allowance for the deceits of memory, theirs was not the "Sinfonia Domestica" that came to hearing yesterday. They skimmed the surface and barely entered the substance; they struggled with the letter and missed the spirit. Dr. Muck may care little for Strauss's later tone-poems; but for that very reason he sought the more to bring the "Sinfonia Domestica" to full, sympathetic and expressive utterance. The men of the orchestra may grumble as they will about the labor that Strauss lays upon almost every one of them. He does ask the difficult, but he never asks the impossible, and there is that in his way of asking and in the spur of actual performance that puts the players to their mettle. It is the fashion to call Strauss's music intricate, and in a sense it is so; but, given the conductor and the band, it can be made as luminous and integral as it was yesterday, when every part and almost every phrase seemed to spring organically from its predecessor and lead as organically into whatever followed. From beginning to end Dr. Muck found, guided and maintained the large melodic lines of the tone-poem. He seemed to follow and to feel every curve and convolution of them, every interplay contrast or conflict, every change in their motion or their pace, every lightening or darkening of their color, every intensifying of their weight. The composition and the adjustment of the harmonic background along which and through which these lines flowed was as lucid and imaginative. The blending or the contrasting of instrumental colors, the pointing or the subduing of instrumental detail, was as luminous and felicitous. The music seemed to vibrate spontaneously with Strauss's endless varieties and subleties of intertwining rhythms. The introduction was as transparent exposition. The scherzo was nimble with fancy. The slow movement touched heights and depths of sustained and imaginative song. The final fugue was human and humorous sport with tones and the musical ideas they uttered.

Meanwhile, from the very beginning of the tone-poem, conductor and men had been crowning all these virtues by a very notable achievement of insight, imagination and expression. Steadily they gave the "Sinfonia Domestica" the quality of tone that is born of the spirit rather than the letter of the music and that imparts this spirit vitally. There are some who seem to believe that Strauss's music must always be played rudely, coarsely, noisily. There have been performances of his tone-poems in which the one object of all concerned seemed to be to cavort, shriek and shout. Now the "Sinfonia Domestica" is a lyric poem in tones, and those tones seek oftenest the lightness, brightness, iridescent quality and songful voice that Dr. Muck and the band gave to them. They bent their tone to rapt song that was still lyric rather than epic; they made it flicker with humor; they kept it buoyantly and brightly alive. Of course, moments come when Strauss would have this tone frankly delineative, and the players made it so, lightly, adroitly and fancifully. Those that are fain to hear the baby resent its bath or the clock strike the hour need miss no detail. Best of all, conductor and men charged this tone with the subdued and vibrant intensity which is the true voice of the "Sinfonia Domestica." They never thundered. They never tried to be ugly or boisterous. They did not bawl but a lyric. Rightly did an audience that had listened with very eager and seemingly responsive intentness recall the conductor again and again and bring the men of the orchestra to their feet. The ears, even of doubters and scorners, must have leapt to the true voice of Strauss's music.

Under such a performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" two impressions were bound to be very clear, vital and transporting—one was of the beauty and imaginative power of much of the music; the other was of the humanity of it all. It is easy to grant Strauss's inability to invent melodic ideas that in themselves and in the first statement of them have penetrating beauty and significance. The melodies of the father, the mother and the child as the introduction to the tone-poem unfolds them and their divisions are not impressive. It is safest, perhaps, to say that they have character, as in the robustness of the man's melody, the capriciousness of the woman's, or the plaintive sweetness of the child's. It is good to invent beautiful and striking melodies, but it is also good to invent melodies that, as imagination plays upon them and varies them, treats them harmonically, rhythmically and instrumentally, and combines and contrasts them, shall become clothed with [illegible] become instruments of his brain and hand that is essential. Of them are born such exquisite and caressing minor melodies as that of the mother's care for her child (as the programmists have it) that flows in the scherzo and recurs in the fugue. From them spring under Strauss's imagination, the light, almost affectionate fancies of that same scherzo—a child's play idealized in tones that catch the very motion and breath of it, and that touch it with the soft, responsive emotion, again idealized, of the watching parents. Above all, out of these seemingly prosaic melodies comes the deep, changeful, and altogether transporting beauty of the first part of the slow movement—an orchestral song, if ever one was written, of the joy and the passion of living in the dreams and the work of imagination, in the zest and stimulus of affection. To hear is to yield mind and heart to it, to be upborne on its flow, to be encompassed and possessed by its emotions. It is the song, at last of the thrill and the delight of life. And then it wavers and fades into vague and flitting "dream-fancies." The ear hears some of the very melodies which it has caught clearly and implicitly in shadowy, distorted, tremulous sounds, as the eye sees in night vision the images that have pre-occupied it by day. The illusion, the imagination, the ingenuity and the human plausibility of these tone-dreams are equal. They are one of Strauss's feats of poetry.

The other thrilling impression of the tone-poem was its essential humanity from first to last. Strauss has already put his philosophies and sardonic humors, his hero of romance and his hero of imagination into tones, depicting, illuminating, transfiguring. In the "Sinfonia Domestica," since his imagination ranges wide and many things touch it to creation, he would transfigure the routine of domestic life and affection and against the circumstances and episodes of it as against a background, he would set the deep emotions, the lyric feelings, the poetry, that underlie it. Those emotions invite expression in tones. They rise in suggestion from the very themes he has invented, to play through the scherzo and to flood the adagio. Yet half the essence of them lies in the realistic background against which they flow, with its details of the comparing aunts likening the baby to father or mother, of the bath, of the cradle song, of the awakening. Through his tones, and by equal power of imagination and expression Strauss imparts the incidents themselves and the emotions which is as the idealization of them. Life has its affectionate play as in the scherzo. Life has its passions as in the adagio. It has also its animated humors, and hence plausibly the double fugue that leads into the closing passages. The programmists will have it that father and mother hold brisk and sportive debate of the child and its future, as it plays with them the while. The notion is plausible; Strauss has intimated that his own imaginative programme warrants it.

But the larger and perhaps the truer impression is that, as the adagio was the song of the deeper joys and passion of life, so here is the merry song of its lighter but still intimate delights. To and fro in the music go the characteristic voices of the husband and the wife, "giving and taking" in light debate and playful retort, making sport of each other's traits and weaknesses, chaffing each other, in plain English, merrily and intimately, and chaffing over and about the child. As Dr. Muck and the orchestra played this fugue yesterday with rare imaginative perception, it was no Brobdingagian and meaningless clamor, no mere extended riot of polyphony and instrumentation, but a "mood picture" in tones and of one of the most intimate and human of domestic moods. Instead of din, there was agile lightness. Instead of melodic, harmonic and instrumental thunders, there was the briskest of merriment. Here the wife sought the last word in gay caprice. There the sturdy voice of the man intercepted her. Then both for an instant paused for softer thought (with a catch in their voices, so to say) of their child. And so gayly, into the tremulously happy and buoyant final measures—the joyful climax of what from beginning to end has been a tone-poem of the zest of life, not as heroes of epic or romance live it, but as it goes forward under every roof, if they that dwell beneath could only feel the elation, the passion, and the poetry of it as Strauss has felt and expressed them. He has put common humanity into tones, exalted it, and made it glow. So much for first impressions.

H. T. P.

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., No. 41.
SUNDAY, FEB. 10, 1907.

MME. SAMAROFF AND SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays Tinel's "Symphonic Pictures" Here for First Time.

DUKAS' WITTY SCHERZO AGAIN ON PROGRAMME

Soloist Gives Superb Performance of Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the solo pianist. The programme was as follows:

Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas
Concerto for piano No. 1.....Tschaikowsky
Three Symphonic Pictures derived from Corneille's "Polyeucte".....Tinel

Dukas' Scherzo was played last night at the Symphony concerts for the third time. Although the composer is over 40 years old, the list of his published works is a short one. His opera, founded on Maeterlinck's whimsical, yet vivid, version of the legend of Bluebeard, is completed, but it has not yet been performed. Since 1897 no new important work for orchestra by Dukas has been produced. A "Villanelle" for horn and piano was performed about a month ago at a concert in Paris.

It would seem that Dukas has not naturally a fertile musical mind, and that composition is to him a set and arduous task. He is now known at the age of 40 to the world as the composer of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." He is, then, a brother in eloquence of "Single-speech" Hamilton, who, by the way, is said to have made other speeches and good ones. Dukas has his overture to "Polyeucte," his symphony, his piano sonata, but who knows them or hears of them?

This scherzo in illustration of Goethe's ballad presupposes for enjoyment an acquaintance with the poem. It is not necessary to go back to Lucian's satiric sketch, where Goethe found the story. There was a time when Lucian's "Dialogues of the Dead" were read in class at Exeter, and in other schools; but the "Lie-Fancier" was not read by many schoolboys, and Lucian today is numbered among the "quick sellers." How many in the audience last night, made of the German born, were familiar with Goethe's ballad?

There is an instance where the true does not give to the great majority American hearers at least immediate information concerning the musical contents of the piece. Of course, all respectable sorcerers have apprentices, as every virtuoso today seldom travels without his secretary; but if the scherzo may be judged humorous or grim or mystical, the judge must base his opinion on comparisons made at the time between Goethe's ballad and Dukas' music, and he thus runs the risk of not hearing all the music, or of failing to note, or particularize the transliteration into music of a superlar passage.

Suppose the hearer ignorant of the poem as music and the story. Does the scherzo appeal even without any association of ideas in dress or charm him? Is the appeal intellectual or merely one to the instinctive?

The performance of the orchestra were extraordinarily brilliant, so brilliant indeed that they might have vitalized less interesting music.

It is not too much to say that any hearer who have been ignorant of Goethe's ballad would the more entertained and impressed by the melodic quaintness and capriciousness, the swing and dash, the mystery, strumentation, musicality, the glitter of the instrumentation. This music appeals both to sensitive nerves and to cool intellect. Perhaps that was familiar with the story he took had a fuller appreciation than scherzo whom the scherzo was simply a programme. But this music is more than Shakespeare music.

If it should one ask whether a broom be a material for an art work, answer him, "The broomstick may be tragic." Men, children, little children, have been tortured, hanged, burned, drowned, because they were convicted on the evidence of trustworthy persons who saw them riding to Satan's Sabbat astride a broomstick.

Mme. Samaroff gave a superb performance of the gorgeously barbaric concerto of Tschaikowsky. For once the introductory defiant theme was taken at a pace that allowed the expression of arrogant pomp. The contrast with the main body of the movement was the more dramatic. The whole performance of the first movement was dramatic and exciting, from the mumbling theme, which the composer heard from a beggar's lips, to the sonorous close.

Admirable, too, was Mme. Samaroff's reading of the second movement, by reason of simplicity and expression of contrasted moods. The finale was in true Cossack spirit and the performance was distinguished by its rhythm and color. The pace at which it was taken was swift, but none too swift; the mechanism was clear and polished; it never became a scramble.

The whole performance was thoughtful, considered, thoroughly prepared, delightful in detail, irresistible in dash, fire, authority. The repose of the player, her modesty, her freedom from self-consciousness, made this performance more memorable. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was an inspiration to her.

Tinel, a man of strong, if not bigoted religious convictions, saw in Polyeucte, the hero of Corneille's tragedy, a symbolic soul, as his own poverty had led him to glorify in music St. Francis of Assissi, who was never weary of singing the praises of poverty. Inspired by the tragedy, Tinel wrote an overture, a movement descriptive of Pauline's dream, and a musical illustration of the festival in Jupiter's Temple, with its stately processional march, and then the intrusion of Polyeucte in his Christian fervor, [illegible] gods and priests, and finally [illegible] sacred vessels and overthrew

There was plenty of material for the overture. Chorals and church tones to represent the Christians; plaintive themes to typify the conflict between Polyeucte's love for his Pagan wife Pauline and his duty as a fierce iconoclast; or a theme to typify the pure love of the heroine for the Roman Severus, who, loved by her, was reported dead on the battle field; for the close a grand apotheosis—the triumph of Christianity, as shown by the conversions that followed the beheadment of Polyeucte.

The dream of Pauline—how Severus appeared to her and reproached her for infidelity, and her father, Felix, stabbed her husband—gave opportunity for dramatic composition, as the temple scene for pomp and ceremony, song and dance, melodramatic intensity. Nor was the stern, yet mystical Tinel disturbed by the thought of ballet music. It will be remembered that he introduced a waltz in his "Franciscus."

It is a curious fact that when Gounod's "Polyeucte" was produced at the Opera, Paris, the chief feature was the first appearance of Rosita Mauri, the Spanish dancer, in the temple scene. Dancers costumed as Roman legionaries in blue and pink answered the fanfare of Bellona. The entrance of Venus Amphitrite was declared "delicious." A waltz of Nereids was one of the most successful numbers.

As for Rosita she danced a mazurka in a fine anachronistic spirit. She impersonated Venus, and there was a grave discussion at the time whether her legs were not too thin for ideal beauty. This amiable and entertaining discussion did not save the opera. Donizetti's "Polinto" is now forgotten. The Iconoclast of Nicomedia cuts no figure today on the operatic stage. He still awaits a composer.

Tinels' overture and temple music are fortunate in this: They may pass in the concert hall as absolute music. Pauline's Dream is naturally in need of an interpreter. The overture might be concerned with any man or woman, for a choral does not necessarily have any definite, particular significance: It is used by composers of chamber music, symphonies, violin concertos, without any compelling reason. "Festival in Jupiter's Temple" might be any festival with march and dances—for the music that afterward deals specifically with Polyeucte is of less importance.

When the music is carefully examined it is for the most part conventional or unaffectedly cheap. The overture is sound and orthodox. It is also too long by reason of undue development and damnable iteration. There is one phrase—the more sentimental portion of the second theme—that fairly gets on the hearer's nerves before the composer, enamored of it, is willing to dismiss it in its original form. Nevertheless this overture is the best of the three "Pictures."

Tinel, a well educated musician, with orchestral fluency, is not dramatic. This lack of dramatic force is shown in his "Franciscus." When he came to write music for Pauline's dream, the task was beyond his ability, and as absolute music, the movement is uninteresting. Nor does the "Festival" music suggest the solemn rites, the sacred dances.

The march might have been sketched by any English doctor of music as a closing organ voluntary, and the dances have neither mystical significance nor voluptuous grace.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra did their utmost in the service of Tinel, but the material with which they had to work was ordinary, lumpish, insufficient.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907 State N Y

Since Weingartner ceased coming to America and Gericke returned to Vienna, the works of Berlioz have been less frequently performed than they used to be. Next Friday, however, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will favor Brooklynites with that composer's "Harold in Italy," which, no doubt, will be a notable one—such a one as Berlioz himself never was able to hear. It was composed in 1834 and in those days Paris, one of the leading musical cities of Europe, was very far behind where New York is now. A vivid picture of the situation is given by Ernest Newman in his "Musical Studies":

It was not until 1828 (the year after his death) that Beethoven made any impression on Paris. Orchestras were generally incompetent and audiences ignorant. The calibre of the average French orchestra of the time may be gauged from the fact that even the more reputable bands found Mozart's symphonies by no means easy. One shudders to think what the ordinary orchestra must have been like, and what was the quality of the music to which they had grown accustomed. As for the audiences, where they were not extremely uneducated, they were extremely prejudiced, clinging blindly to the remains of the pseudo-classical principles that had been bequeathed to them by their fathers. An audience that could be worked into a perfect frenzy of rage because an actor, outraging all the proprieties of the time, actually referred in "Othello" to something so vulgar as a handkerchief, would hardly look with favor on anything revolutionary either in idea or technique. At the opera the Italians were mostly in vogue. The French public knew little of instrumental music pure and simple, and were almost entirely ignorant of the huge developments of German music.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 16, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" for the First Time—A Notably Imaginative and Sympathetic Performance That Seemed to Give the Music Its True Voice—Two First Impressions: The Beauty of Much of the Tone-Poem and the Humanity of It All—Music of the Zest of Life

Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday, and, by æsthetic standards, for the first time in America. True, a "scratch" orchestra played it in New York, with the composer conducting, three years ago; but with all allowance for the deceits of memory, theirs was not the "Sinfonia Domestica" that came to hearing yesterday. They skimmed the surface and barely entered the substance; they struggled with the letter and missed the spirit. Dr. Muck may care little for Strauss's later tone-poems; but for that very reason he sought the more to bring the "Sinfonia Domestica" to full, sympathetic and expressive utterance. The men of the orchestra may grumble as they will about the labor that Strauss lays upon almost every one of them. He does ask the difficult, but he never asks the impossible, and there is that in his way of asking and in the spur of actual performance that puts the players to their mettle. It is the fashion to call Strauss's music intricate, and in a sense it is so; but, given the conductor and the band, it can be made as luminous and integral as it was yesterday, when every part and almost every phrase seemed to spring organically from its predecessor and lead as organically into whatever followed. From beginning to end Dr. Muck found, guided and maintained the large melodic lines of the tone-poem. He seemed to follow and to feel every curve and convolution of them, every interplay contrast or conflict, every change in their motion or their pace, every lightening or darkening of their color, every intensifying of their weight. The composition and the adjustment of the harmonic background along which and through which these lines flowed was as lucid and imaginative. The blending or the contrasting of instrumental colors, the pointing or the subduing of instrumental detail, was as luminous and felicitous. The music seemed to vibrate spontaneously with Strauss's endless varieties and subleties of intertwining rhythms. The introduction was as transparent exposition. The scherzo was nimble with fancy. The slow movement touched heights and depths of sustained and imaginative song. The final fugue was human and humorous sport with tones and the musical ideas they uttered.

Meanwhile, from the very beginning of the tone-poem, conductor and men had been crowning all these virtues by a very notable achievement of insight, imagination and expression. Steadily they gave the "Sinfonia Domestica" the quality of tone that is born of the spirit rather than the letter of the music and that imparts this spirit vitally. There are some who seem to believe that Strauss's music must always be played rudely, coarsely, noisily. There have been performances of his tone-poems in which the one object of all concerned seemed to be to cavort, shriek and shout. Now the "Sinfonia Domestica" is a lyric poem in tones, and those tones seek oftenest the lightness, brightness, iridescent quality and songful voice that Dr. Muck and the band gave to them. They bent their tone to rapt song that was still lyric rather than epic; they made it flicker with humor; they kept it buoyantly and brightly alive. Of course, moments come when Strauss would have this tone frankly delineative, and the players made it so, lightly, adroitly and fancifully. Those that are fain to hear the baby resent its bath or the clock strike the hour need miss no detail. Best of all, conductor and men charged this tone with the subdued and vibrant intensity which is the true voice of the "Sinfonia Domestica." They never thundered. They never tried to be ugly or boisterous. They did not bawl out a lyric. Rightly did an audience that had listened with very eager and seemingly responsive intentness recall the conductor again and again and bring the men of the orchestra to their feet. The ears, even of doubters and scorners, must have leapt to the true voice of Strauss's music.

Under such a performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" two impressions were bound to be very clear, vital and transporting—one was of the beauty and imaginative power of much of the music; the other was of the humanity of it all. It is easy to grant Strauss's inability to invent melodic ideas that in themselves and in the first statement of them have penetrating beauty and significance. The melodies of the father, the mother and the child as the introduction to the tone-poem unfolds them and their divisions are not impressive. It is safest, perhaps, to say that they have character, as in the robustness of the man's melody, the capriciousness of the woman's, or the plaintive sweetness of the child's. It is good to invent beautiful and striking melodies, but it is also good to invent melodies that, as imagination plays upon them and varies them, treats then harmonically, rhythmically and instrumentally, and combines and contrasts them, shall become clothed with beauty and appeal. Of such are Strauss's melodies in the "Sinfonia." It is not what they are in themselves, but what they become under his brain and hand that is essential. Of them are born such exquisite and caressing minor melodies as that of the mother's care for her child (as the programmists have it) that flows in the scherzo and recurs in the fugue. From them spring under Strauss's imagination, the light, almost affectionate fancies of that same scherzo—a child's play idealized in tones that catch the very motion and breath of it, and that touch it with the soft, responsive emotion, again idealized, of the watching parents. Above all, out of these seemingly prosaic melodies comes the deep, changeful, and altogether transporting beauty of the first part of the slow movement—an orchestral song, if ever one was written, of the joy and the passion of living in the dreams and the work of imagination, in the zest and stimulus of affection. To hear is to yield mind and heart to it, to be upborne on its flow, to be encompased and possessed by its emotions. It is the song at last of the thrill and the delight of life. And then it wavers and fades into vague and flitting "dream-fancies." The ear hears some of the very melodies which it has caught clearly and implicitly in shadowy, distorted, tremulous sounds, as the eye sees in night vision the images that have pre-occupied it by day. The illusion, the imagination, the ingenuity and the human plausibility of these tone-dreams are equal. They are one of Strauss's feats of poetry.

The other thrilling impression of the tone-poem was its essential humanity from first to last. Strauss has already put his philosophies and sardonic humors, his hero of romance and his hero of imagination into tones, depicting, illuminating, transfiguring. In the "Sinfonia Domestica," since his imagination ranges wide and many things touch it to creation, he would transfigure the routine of domestic life and affection and against the circumstances and episodes of it as against a background, he would set the deep emotions, the lyric feelings, the poetry, that underlie it. Those emotions invite expression in tones. They rise in suggestion from the very themes he has invented, to play through the scherzo and to flood the adagio. Yet half the essence of them lies in the realistic background against which they flow, with its details of the comparing aunts likening the baby to father or mother, of the bath, of the cradle song, of the awakening. Through his tones, and by equal power of imagination and expression Strauss imparts the incidents themselves and the emotions which is as the idealization of them. Life has its affectionate play as in the scherzo. Life has its passions as in the adagio. It has also its animated humors, and hence plausibly the double fugue that leads into the closing passages. The programmists will have it that father and mother hold brisk and sportive debate of the child and its future, as it plays with them the while. The notion is plausible; Strauss has intimated that his own imaginative programme warrants it.

But the larger and perhaps the truer impression is that, as the adagio was the song of the deeper joys and passion of life, so here is the merry song of its lighter but still intimate delights. To and fro in the music go the characteristic voices of the husband and the wife, "giving and taking" in light debate and playful retort, making sport of each other's traits and weaknesses, chaffing each other, in plain English, merrily and intimately, and chaffing over and about the child. As Dr. Muck and the orchestra played this fugue yesterday with rare imaginative perception, it was no Brobdingagian and meaningless clamor, no mere extended riot of polyphony and instrumentation, but a "mood picture" in tones and of one of the most intimate and human of domestic moods. Instead of din, there was agile lightness. Instead of melodic, harmonic and instrumental thunders, there was the briskest of merriment. Here the wife sought the last word in gay caprice. There the sturdy voice of the man intercepted her. Then both for an instant paused for softer thought (with a catch in their voices, so to say) of their child. And so gayly, into the tremulously happy and buoyant final measures—the joyful climax of what from beginning to end has been a tone-poem of the zest of life, not as heroes of epic or romance live it, but as it goes forward under every roof, if they that dwell beneath could only feel the elation, the passion, and the poetry of it as Strauss has felt and expressed them. He has put common humanity into tones, exalted it, and made it glow. So much for first impressions.

H. T. P.

[145]

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Symphonia Domestica Played at 15th Concert Conducted by Dr. Muck.

COMPOSER SHOWS HE IS A FAMILY MAN

Gabrilowitsch Gives Brahms' Long-Winded Concerto as Second Number.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonia Domestica.....R. Strauss
Piano concerto No. 2.....Brahms
Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist.
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Strauss' Symphonia Domestica was played for the first time nearly three years ago in New York. Emerson said in effect that a new book should not be read until it is at least a year old. At the end of the year the book may be dead without hope of resurrection and there will then be no curiosity concerning its contents. Strauss' symphony is now three years old. Wherever it is performed, as recently in Paris for at least the third time, it excites lively discussion.

Today Strauss is bitterly assailed by some on account of his magnificent opera "Salome," a great and surprising work of art which was taken from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in consequence of foolish and prurient chatter. Some of the articles written against it were foul in language and suggestion.

The hypocrite Olivia in Wycherley's "Plain Dealer" inveighs against that dramatist's "Country Wife" as a "filthy play," and in her virtuous indignation uses such vile terms and displays such an evil mind that Eliza exclaims: "Nay, no farther, cousin. We have had enough of your comment on the play, which will make me more ashamed than the play itself."

Not only the opera but the composer himself is now recklessly abused and taunted with the license of ink. He is a low and debased person, for he asks large sums of money from publishers and opera managers; he insists on orchestras of unusual size and makes unusual demands on the instruments; he actually goes so far as to write a part in "Salome" for the Heckelphone—the very name of this instrument is to the suspicious immoral. There is really no answer to these charges of heinous offences. It should be remembered that when the Symphonia Domestica was first performed Strauss was attacked for the employment of a huge orchestra to tell in tones a simple story; he was censured because he used instruments in an extraordinary fashion and indulged himself in strange combinations of timbres; he was denounced because he asked the publisher to pay him about $9000 for the work. Johannes Brahms, by the way, sold the copyright of his third symphony to a publisher for $9000 and a percentage on sums realised by performances; but Brahms was a good man, free from all orchestral eccentricities.

Is Strauss reproached today for his choice of Wilde's tragedy as a libretto? He was jeered at three years ago because he wished to illustrate by music a day in his family life. This monster, it seems, has a wife and child. He is said to be fond of them. That he should dare to interest the musical world in them was the height of impudence. What egotism! The protests were like unto those made against Walt Whitman for beginning his "Leaves of Grass" with the line, "I celebrate myself." Poor Strauss! Whatever he does is wrong.

Late in 1902 the composer said to a reporter in London: "My next tone-poem will illustrate 'a day in my family life.' It will be partly lyrical, partly humorous." The three subjects, he added, would be typical of papa, mamma and the baby. Should this statement, or should the plan of the work have excited ridicule? Neither at the time nor since has Strauss given out a long and minute analytical programme.

When the symphony was performed in certain European cities, the programme books published a simple synopsis. The husband's group of themes represent him as easy going, dreamy, fiery; the wife's as lively, gay, a graceful creature who can also be tender; the child's theme typifies him as a peaceful youngster if let alone. The scherzo tells of parental happiness; the child plays till it is tired and is put to bed. The husband works and meditates.

There is a love scene. In sleep come dreams and cares. The family awakes, there is a pleasant dispute—possibly over the bringing up of the child—and there is at last a satisfactory and full agreement.

These scenes are not confined to the Strauss family. They occur in the house next yours, in the flat below you where Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson and little Johnny dwell. Is the subject a bizarre one? Does it not appeal to human nature? Does it not admit of lyrical and humorous treatment?

Why Not Add Instruments?

Who cares, pray, what sort of an orchestra is employed, the one known to Monteverde or Haydn, or the one dreamed of by Berlioz, provided the composer gain his effects? If by using saxophones more he can the better bring back memories of childhood before an audience, why should he not add the instrument to the conventional list? Was there any outcry when Mr. Loeffler added a viola d'amore—two of them in his original version of "The Death of Tintagiles"—or when Mr. Converse added a bass tuba to his orchestra in "The Pipe of Desire"? But Strauss is a dangerous man to get to be classed with [illegible]

[illegible] checked [illegible] the number is generally [illegible] musical institutions.

Now are the members of the Strauss family as portrayed in music restful persons. It has been easy for the indefatigable enemies of Strauss to be flippant over this symphony at his expense, but they base their jests and witticisms on non-existent facts. It is all very well to be funny about baby in the bath, baby being spanked, baby with the croup, etc., etc., but as I have said Strauss has never given out any minute analysis of the work. If any mad wag hearing the music finds in it portrayal of these incidents and other incidents, disagreeable or pleasant, in babyhood, he finds them by force of his own imagination.

Let me record only a few impressions, for this alone is possible after one hearing.

The themes are for the most part insignificant or common. The strength of Strauss in his orchestral works is never in thematic invention; it is in the extraordinary use he makes of his themes, in his polyphonic weavings, in dynamic intensity, and in unusually effective instrumentation. Occasionally he invents a theme of true and inherent beauty, but this theme is short, and, as it were, accidental.

A certain amount of explanation is absolutely necessary to any honest enjoyment of portions of the work. These portions without a clew are uninteresting. As absolute music they do not charm or impress. They give only the impression of much ado about nothing.

Have Orchestral Rhetoric.

There are portions, on the other hand, which without any indication and without even a vaguely comprehensive title are very effective, chiefly by the eloquence and passion of polyphonic treatment and orchestral rhetoric. The section that thus stands out in bold relief is the "Love scene" in the adagio. There is no haunting, compelling theme, the song of triumphant love, but typical themes that have preceded are here developed and joined together till passion is at its height, and the sonority of the orchestra is full and glowing and irresistible without a suggestion of delight in sheer, brutal noise.

Strauss is less successful in the expression of naivete in his portraiture of the child in the house. It is easier for him to be complex than to be simple. His airs of childhood are more or less sophisticated. Even the cradle song soon assumes undue proportions.

The Finale is first of all singular by reason of its reckless extravagance. The interest is aroused by surprising the hearer; it is maintained chiefly by adding to this surprise. The mastery of the composer in his treatment of the material is indisputable. But a surprise quickly becomes tiresome, and there is a long and dreary stretch before the astonishingly jubilant conclusion.

I much prefer to all this pother and din and stress and fury, the mysterious and highly imaginative measures that introduce the theme of the child in the introduction of the work. That episode is something more than novel and strange. It has rare poesy. Much of the scherzo is entertaining, but here again the enjoyment too often comes from the sense of incongruity, from hearing something intrinsically trivial swollen fantastically to enormous proportions yet moving with incredible lightness, as though little and familiar animals having partaken of Mr. H. G. Wells' food of the gods should dance as monstrous shapes a fantastic fandango in a broad highway.

Work Too Long Drawn Out.

The whole work is too long drawn out. The very ingenuity, the diabolical cleverness becomes wearisome. Cacophonous passages annoy, not because they are cacophonous, but because they produce no real effect—they serve no artistic purpose. Other hearings might remove the impression that there are passages where the intricacy of the voice weaving defeats the intention of the composer.

A work like this should be played more than once in the space of a month. A single hearing is unfair to the composer, the conductor, the orchestra and the audience.

The performance was, on the whole, one of extraordinary, incredible brilliance. There were a few slips, noticeably in the brass, but it must be remembered that the music is thick with extreme mechanical difficulties. Dr. Muck richly deserved the applause and the recalls, and the tribute was paid to the players as well.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was unfortunate in that Brahms' concerto came after such a prodigious "machine." He was unfortunate also in his choice of the dry and drab concerto. He showed self-abnegation and courage by choosing it.

I was able to hear only the first two movements, and the finale is the movement in which a virtuoso has the most opportunity. In the first two movements Mr. Gabrilowisch played with understanding and with solidity of style. It was a sound and musical performance. That it was not charming or engrossing or stirring was the fault of Johannes Brahms.

The programme of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 2, will include Debussy's three symphonic poems, "The Sea" (first time), Alexander Ritter's "Olaf's Wedding Dance" (first time), Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz's overture "Roman Carnival."

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907 State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck and the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next week. On Thursday evening Sibelius's first symphony (new to New York) will be played. It was performed first in Berlin in July, 1900. Olga Samaroff will be soloist in the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor. On Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will begin the programme, and, as it lasts fifty minutes without a pause, there would better be no late-comers, unless they care to stand. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in Brahms's second piano concerto.

[146]

STRAUSS PICTURES HIS FAMILY LIFE IN SYMPHONY

Boston's Orchestra Plays with Powerful Effect Sensational Work of Composer of "Salome."

By Kent Perkins.

New York had its Richard Strauss "Salome" jamboree and the Gothamites of tender moral sensibilities called in the police. Boston last night, with the aid of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra, had its Richard Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" racket. "A Day in the Strauss Family," and there were times when one wanted to call the Hub police, not as protecters of public morals, but to take the whole yerdamter Strauss family to the station house.

This wish was roused, when in the realistic bedlam of the music Herr Strauss was beating the baby, the young Strauss was yelling with all his titanic power and Frau Strauss was stridently arguing with Herr Doctor, while she rapped out a tattoo on his head with the stove lifter to emphasize her points.

Strauss's "Domestic Symphony" has attracted almost as much attention as "Salome" and roused nearly as much controversy. The first performance "on any stage" was in New York in March, 1904. Since then it has been heard in several European capitals and has been the subject of miles of discussion, both praise and condemnation. Last night brought its first hearing in Boston and Symphony Hall was jammed full by patrons eager to hear the piece.

Was Splendidly Produced.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra had given the work long and strenuous study and rehearsal, and it was played with magnificent power, splendid tonal effect and an intelligent artistry that made known all its beauties and all its garish realism.

The people were warned to be in their seats promptly on time, as it meant a wait of over three-quarters of an hour in the lobby for those who were late. There were a few dilatory ones, however, and they peered anxiously through the glass doors at the various crisis in the Strauss family, as if wondering what terrific tragedy was going on inside. At the close of the piece the great audience gave the orchestra and its conductor tremendous outbursts of applause and cheers, and they deserved generous reward, both for their artistic and their physical labors.

Work Is Colossal.

For the "Domestic Symphony" is truly colossal in length, breadth and thickness, and makes terrific demands on the skill as well as the endurance of its performers. It is too big and too varied, too full of contradictions, beauties, blemishes and problems for detailed discussion in an article of moderate length or after a single hearing, consequently only a brief, general idea of it can be given here.

Strauss in the work has frankly attempted to give a musical picture of a day in his own family. It is built on three chief themes that represent himself, his young son when a baby, and his wife, with incidental thematic reference to aunts and uncles. Strauss professes to abhor programs for his music, yet he took care before this piece was first produced in New York to give a detailed analysis of it to a clever newspaper man who put it all in the paper.

It opens with the father in a calm and meditative mood. This gives way to more lively and strenuous thoughts, possibly roused by reflections of what will happen when Frau Strauss comes in. She does come in and there is "something doing" promptly. The baby is introduced by a lovely and tender melody played on the oboe d' Amour, an obsolete instrument that has been occasionally revived in recent years. There is argument over the baby and all the varying possibilities of the situation are voiced by the orchestra. The aunts and uncles appear and according to a note in Strauss's score, the aunts of the baby say: "Just like papa," while the uncles chirp: "Just like mamma."

Baby Put to Bed.

Things calm down in the house of Struss. The child is put to bed with an exquisite cradle song and you know just what time it is, for the clock strikes seven. There is a long forceful and beautiful intermezzo and then Papa and Mamma Struss either have a lot of bad dreams or there is a hot curtain lecture in which the man of the house holds up his end with vigor. The dove of peace settles down again and there is some exquisite and pjassionate love misic, as a relief from the Strauss squabbling.

The clock strikes seven again, this time in the morning. The baby cries and the household starts in again. There are those who can see the baby have his bath and go through all the little details of child life in the morning—and there is variety enough in the music to warrant any deduction. Apparently, after Baby Strauss begins his play, he falls and bumps his head and the worst trouble of all starts in between the father and mother. It developes in a regular Donnybrook fair, and one wonders that such awful scenes are possible in a sedate and respectable German family.

One of Richard's Dreams.

The "husband theme" finally dominates and rules the music as the symphony comes to an end, but those who profess to know the Strauss family in actual life say that this is a dream of Herr Richard's and not pure realism.

Granting what is perfectly true, that there are many beauties in tht "Domestic Symphony," what is the use of such "music"? There is art in it, but this comes in small homeopathic doses, amid oceans of trash. There are bits of entrancing loveliness and fine, strong sentiment, but why should people have to sit nearly an hour to pick out these morsels from a vast conglomeration—of what? Hodge-podge!

Richard Strauss is a composer of great talent, but he has a passion that is greater than that for art. It is money. And he knows the value of advertising. He descended to Oscar Wilde's "Salome" and tricked that detestable story out in his opera for huge royalties. He saw the skyscrapers of New York and forthwith was ready to write a symphonic form on them. He turns with ease from "Salome," portrays the intimacies of his own family life and gets $9,000 for the alone from his publisher.

He returned home once from conducting on a great musical occasion in a nearby city and his hopeful heir portrayed in the "Domestic Symphony" ran out to meet him crying:

"Oh, papa did they pay you your fee."

And the proud father replied:

"You dear child! You will grow up to be just like your father!"

No art or talent can overcome such a handicap and be true or free.

The other numbers on last night programme were Brahms's piano concerto No. two, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist and the same composer's "Academic overture."

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907 State N Y

Strings, Wood Winds and Brasses

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23. These will bring, on Thursday night, a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and, on Saturday afternoon, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has grown greatly in her art and is now ranked among our foremost women pianists. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number of the programme will be Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The [illegible] on Saturday afternoon

SUNDAY HERALD—
FEBRUARY 17, 1907.

DR. MUCK IN CHICAGO.

The Saturday Evening Herald and the Four Hundred of Chicago of Feb. 9 published the following pen portrait of Dr. Muck on the stage of the Auditorium in Chicago:

"The personnel of Dr. Karl Muck, golly, what a paradoxical symphony conductorial cognomen—was secondary in interest only to the wizardic maestro's marvellous skill and stick. He is of ordinary build, slender, trim and graceful, dignified and assertive and yet absolutely devoid of affectation or contortion mannerisms. His baton has the gentleness of a fawn or a June zephyr and frequently alternates with mekest waves of the reticent left hand, but my—what wonderful possibilities and results accrue! The magic was invisible but overwhelming. Dr. Muck has a suggestively Punch-like profile and abets it with a cuff-collar over which his wax vessel stem chin projects in sharp outline, and if his nose was a steel one he could sell it fabulously to J. J. Hill for a Northwest snow-plough or to the Manitoban farmers for breaking their state wheat fields. Dr. Karl materializes with his accustomed dignity and royally refrained from even so much as a smile throughout the first two numbers and applause. Chicago, as usual, demonstrated its exuberant provincialism in expecting and attempting to swine an encore or several—and this, too, of the holy Boston Symphony princes—what monstrous preposterousness! but Herr Muck was game—and so was Ganz. Fortified behind the uplifted grand piano top, however, Dr. Muck later disclosed to the front riders that he is neither steel nor stone. When Herr Ganz came on for the Tschaikowsky kaleidoscope the hitherto baton sphinx received him with an affinity smile that broke his face well-nigh from ear to ear, and frequently throughout the marvellous quintetto concerto irrepressibly revealed his ivories to the wonder pianist and the concertmeisters."

This sprightly weekly informs us that "Chicago society was somewhat staggered as to how to dress for a grand orchestra concert in grand opera environment. In Berlin, Boston and New York—possibly in Pittsburg—full dress at these stately functions is de rigueur, but Chicago as yet takes no chances. Of full-dress suits, tuxedos and snowy horseshoe fronts there were thousands in the mighty Auditorium assemblage, but not a solitary decollete bare even in the gilded boxes, where even some of our spotlit social men of the period were content to appear in their store and office togery. The visiting orchestra and soloists were in complete evening dress, although Mr. Ganz still surprisingly remembers and divides his claw-hammers before sitting down."

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907 State N. Y.

[illegible] baritone, and Felix Lamond, [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the programme will comprise Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, and Sibelius's first symphony (first time in New York). The soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff. On Saturday the programme will comprise Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's second piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitch.

SUNDAY HERALD—
FEBRUARY 17, 1907.

STRAUSS BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Symphonia Domestica Played at 15th Concert Conducted by Dr. Muck.

COMPOSER SHOWS HE IS A FAMILY MAN

Gabrilowitsch Gives Brahms' Long-Winded Concerto as Second Number.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonia Domestica.....R. Strauss
Piano concerto No. 2.....Brahms
Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist.
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Strauss' Symphonia Domestica was played for the first time nearly three years ago in New York. Emerson said in effect that a new book should not be read until it is at least a year old. At the end of the year the book may be dead without hope of resurrection and there will then be no curiosity concerning its contents. Strauss' symphony is now three years old. Wherever it is performed, as recently in Paris for at least the third time, it excites lively discussion.

Today Strauss is bitterly assailed by some on account of his magnificent opera "Salome," a great and surprising work of art which was taken from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in consequence of foolish and prurient chatter. Some of the articles written against it were foul in language and suggestion.

The hypocrite Olivia in Wycherley's "Plain Dealer" inveighs against that dramatist's "Country Wife" as a "filthy play," and in her virtuous indignation uses such vile terms and displays such an evil mind that Eliza exclaims: "Nay, no farther, cousin. We have had enough of your comment on the play, which will make me more ashamed than the play itself."

Not only the opera but the composer himself is now recklessly abused and taunted with the license of ink. He is a low and debased person, for he asks large sums of money from publishers and opera managers; he insists on orchestras of unusual size and makes unusual demands on the instruments; he actually goes so far as to write a part in "Salome" for the Heckelphone—the very name of this instrument is to the suspicious immoral. There is really no answer to these charges of heinous offences. It should be remembered that when the Symphonia Domestica was first performed Strauss was attacked for the employment of a huge orchestra to tell in tones a simple story; he was censured because he used instruments in an extraordinary fashion and indulged himself in strange combinations of timbres; he was denounced because he asked the publisher to pay him about $9000 for the work. Johannes Brahms, by the way, sold the copyright of his third symphony to a publisher for $9000 and a percentage on sums realized by performances; but Brahms was a good man, free from all orchestral eccentricities.

Is Strauss reproached today for his choice of Wilde's tragedy as a libretto? He was jeered at three years ago because he wished to illustrate by music a day in his family life. This monster, it seems, has a wife and child. He is said to be fond of them. That he should dare to interest the musical world in them was the height of impudence. What egotism! The protests were like unto those made against Walt Whitman for beginning his "Leaves of Grass" with the line, "I celebrate myself." Poor Strauss! Whatever he does is wrong.

Late in 1902 the composer said to a reporter in London: "My next tone-poem will illustrate 'a day in my family life.' It will be partly lyrical, partly humorous." The three subjects, he added, would be typical of papa, mamma and the baby. Should this statement, or should the plan of the work have excited ridicule? Neither at the time nor since has Strauss given out a long and minute analytical programme.

When the symphony was performed in certain European cities, the programme books published a simple synopsis. The husband's group of themes represent him as easy going, dreamy, fiery; the wife's as lively, gay, a graceful creature who can also be tender; the child's theme typifies him as a peaceful youngster. If let alone. The scherzo tells of parental happiness; the child plays till it is tired and is put to bed. The husband works and meditates.

There is a love scene. In sleep come dreams and cares. The family awakes, there is a pleasant dispute—possibly over the bringing up of the child—and there is at last a satisfactory and full agreement.

These scenes are not confined to the Strauss family. They occur in the house next yours, in the flat below you where Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson and little Johnny dwell. Is the subject a bizarre one? Does it not appeal to human nature? Does it not admit of lyrical and humorous treatment?

Why Not Add Instruments?

Who cares, pray, what sort of an orchestra is employed, the one known to Monteverde or Haydn, or the one dreamed of by Berlioz, provided the composer gain his effects? If by using an extra d'armore he can the better bring the image of childhood before an audience, why should he not add the instrument to the conventional list? Was there any outcry when Mr. Loeffler added a viola d'amore—two of them in his original version of "The Death of Tintagiles"—or when Mr. Converse added a basset-horn to his orchestra in "The Pipe of Desire"? But Strauss is a dangerous man; he is not to be trusted with fair warning that the symphony would be "partly humorous" and there is no excuse for those who insist on taking every page seriously and complaining because their sensibilities are now and then shocked. It must be confessed that the humor is generally rough and tumultuous.

Nor are the members of the Strauss family as portrayed in music restful persons. It has been easy for the indefatigable enemies of Strauss to be flippant over this symphony at his expense, but they base their jests and witticisms on non-existent facts. It is all very well to be funny about baby in the bath, baby being spanked, baby with the croup, etc., etc., but as I have said Strauss has never given out any minute analysis of the work. If any mad wag hearing the music finds in it portrayal of these incidents and other incidents, disagreeable or pleasant, in babyhood, he finds them by force of his own imagination.

Let me record only a few impressions, for this alone is possible after one hearing.

The themes are for the most part insignificant or common. The strength of Strauss in his orchestral works is never in thematic invention; it is in the extraordinary use he makes of his themes, in his polyphonic weavings, in dynamic intensity, and in unusually effective instrumentation. Occasionally he invents a theme of true and inherent beauty, but this theme is short, and, as it were, accidental.

A certain amount of explanation is absolutely necessary to any honest enjoyment of portions of the work. These portions without a clew are uninteresting. As absolute music they do not charm or impress. They give only the impression of much ado about nothing.

Have Orchestral Rhetoric.

There are portions, on the other hand, which without any indication and without even a vaguely comprehensive title are very effective, chiefly by the eloquence and passion of polyphonic treatment and orchestral rhetoric. The section that thus stands out in bold relief is the "Love scene" in the adagio. There is no haunting, compelling theme, the song of triumphant love, but typical themes that have preceded are here developed and joined together till passion is at its height, and the sonority of the orchestra is full and glowing and irresistible without a suggestion of delight in sheer, brutal noise.

Strauss is less successful in the expression of naivete in his portraiture of the child in the house. It is easier for him to be complex than to be simple. His airs of childhood are more or less sophisticated. Even the cradle song soon assumes undue proportions.

The Finale is first of all singular by reason of its reckless extravagance. The interest is aroused by surprising the hearer; it is maintained chiefly by adding to this surprise. The mastery of the composer in his treatment of the material is indisputable. But a surprise quickly becomes tiresome, and there is a long and dreary stretch before the astonishingly jubilant conclusion.

I much prefer to all this pother and din and stress and fury, the mysterious and highly imaginative measures that introduce the theme of the child in the introduction of the work. That episode is something more than novel and strange. It has rare poesy. Much of the scherzo is entertaining, but here again the enjoyment too often comes from the sense of incongruity, from hearing something intrinsically trivial swollen fantastically to enormous proportions yet moving with incredible lightness, as though little and familiar animals having partaken of Mr. H. G. Wells' food of the gods should dance as monstrous shapes a fantastic fandango in a broad highway.

Work Too Long Drawn Out.

The whole work is too long drawn out. The very ingenuity, the diabolical cleverness becomes wearisome. Cacophonous passages annoy, not because they are cacophonous, but because they produce no real effect—they serve no artistic purpose. Other hearings might remove the impression that there are passages where the intricacy of the voice weavings defeats the intention of the composer.

A work like this should be played more than once in the space of a month. A single hearing is unfair to the composer, the conductor, the orchestra and the audience.

The performance was, on the whole, one of extraordinary, incredible brilliance. There were a few slips, noticeably in the brass, but it must be remembered that the music is thick with extreme mechanical difficulties. Dr. Muck richly deserved the applause and the recalls, and the tribute was paid to the players as well.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was unfortunate in that Brahms' concerto came after such a prodigious "machine." He was unfortunate also in his choice of the dry and drab concerto. He showed self-abnegation and courage by choosing it.

I was able to hear only the first two movements, and the finale is the movement in which a virtuoso has the most opportunity. In the first two movements Mr. Gabrilowisch played with understanding and with solidity of style. It was a sound and musical performance. That it was not charming or engrossing or stirring was the fault of Johannes Brahms.

The programme of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 2, will include Debussy's three symphonic poems, "The Sea" (first time), Alexander Ritter's "Olaf's Wedding Dance" (first time), Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz's overture "Roman Carnival."

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date [illegible] State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck and the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next week. On Thursday evening Sibelius's first symphony (new to New York) will be played. It was performed first in Berlin in July, 1900. Olga Samaroff will be soloist in the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor. On Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" will begin the programme, and, as it lasts fifty minutes without a pause, there would better be no latecomers, unless they care to stand. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist in Brahms's second piano concerto.

[146]

HEARST'S BOSTON AMERICAN—
FEBRUARY 17, 1907.

STRAUSS PICTURES HIS FAMILY LIFE IN SYMPHONY

Boston's Orchestra Plays with Powerful Effect Sensational Work of Composer of "Salome."

By Kent Perkins.

New York had its Richard Strauss "Salome" jamboree and the Gothamites of tender moral sensibilities called in the police. Boston last night, with the aid of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra, had its Richard Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" racket. "A Day in the Strauss Family," and there were times when one wanted to call the Hub police, not as protectors of public morals, but to take the whole verdamter Strauss family to the station house.

This wish was roused, when in the realistic bedlam of the music Herr Strauss was beating the baby, the young Strauss was yelling with all his titanic power and Frau Strauss was stridently arguing with Herr Doctor, while she rapped out a tattoo on his head with the stove lifter to emphasize her points.

Strauss's "Domestic Symphony" has attracted almost as much attention as "Salome" and roused nearly as much controversy. The first performance "on any stage" was in New York in March, 1904. Since then it has been heard in several European capitals and has been the subject of miles of discussion, both praise and condemnation. Last night brought its first hearing in Boston and Symphony Hall was jammed full by patrons eager to hear the piece.

Was Splendidly Produced.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra had given the work long and strenuous study and rehearsal, and it was played with magnificent power, splendid tonal effect and an intelligent artistry that made known all its beauties and all its garish realism.

The people were warned to be in their seats promptly on time, as it meant a wait of over three-quarters of an hour in the lobby for those who were late. There were a few dilatory ones, however, and they peered anxiously through the glass doors at the various crisis in the Strauss family, as if wondering what terrific tragedy was going on inside. At the close of the piece the great audience gave the orchestra and its conductor tremendous outbursts of applause and cheers, and they deserved generous reward, both for their artistic and their physical labors.

Work Is Colossal.

For the "Domestic Symphony" is truly colossal in length, breadth and thickness, and makes terrific demands on the skill as well as the endurance of its performers. It is too big and too varied, too full of contradictions, beauties, blemishes and problems for detailed discussion in an article of moderate length or after a single hearing, consequently only a brief, general idea of it can be given here.

Strauss in the work has frankly attempted to give a musical picture of a day in his own family. It is built on three chief themes that represent himself, his young son when a baby, and his wife, with incidental thematic reference to aunts and uncles. Strauss professes to abhor programs for his music, yet he took care before this piece was first produced in New York to give a detailed analysis of it to a clever newspaper man who put it all in the paper.

It opens with the father in a calm and meditative mood. This gives way to more lively and strenuous thoughts, possibly roused by reflections of what will happen when Frau Strauss comes in. She does come in and there is "something doing" promptly. The baby is introduced by a lovely and tender melody played on the obor d' Amour, an obsolete instrument that has been occasionally revived in recent years. There is argument over the baby and all the varying possibilities of the situation are voiced by the orchestra. The aunts and uncles appear and according to a note in Strauss's score, the aunts of the baby say: "Just like papa," while the uncles chirp: "Just like mamma."

Baby Put to Bed.

Things calm down in the house of Struss. The child is put to bed with an exquisite cradle song and you know just what time it is, for the clock strikes seven. There is a long forceful and beautiful intermezzo and then Papa and Mamma Struss either have a lot of bad dreams or there is a hot curtain lecture in which the man of the house holds up his end with vigor. The dove of peace settles down again and there is some exquisite and pjassionate love misic, as a relief from the Strauss squabbling.

The clock strikes seven again, this time in the morning. The baby cries and the household starts in again. There are those who can see the baby have his bath and go through all the little details of child life in the morning—and there is variety enough in the music to warrant any deduction. Apparently, after Baby Strauss begins his play, he falls and bumps his head and the worst trouble of all starts in between the father and mother. It developes in a regular Donnybrook fair, and one wonders that such awful scenes are possible in a sedate and respectable German family.

One of Richard's Dreams.

The "husband theme" finally dominates and rules the music as the symphony comes to an end, but those who profess to know the Strauss family in actual life say that this is a dream of Herr Richard's and not pure realism.

Granting what is perfectly true, that there are many beauties in tht "Domestic Symphony," what is the use of such "music"? There is art in it, but this comes in small homeopathic doses, amid oceans of trash. There are bits of entrancing loveliness and fine, strong sentiment, but why should people have to sit nearly an hour to pick out these morsels from a vast conglomeration—of what? Hodge-podge!

Richard Strauss is a composer of great talent, but he has a passion that is greater than that for art. It is money. And he knows the value of advertising. He descended to Oscar Wilde's "Salome" and tricked that detestable story out in his opera for huge royalties. He saw the skyscrapers of New York and forthwith was ready to write a symphonic form on them. He turns with ease from "Salome," portrays the intimacies of his own family life and gets $9,000 for the alone from his publisher.

He returned home once from conducting on a great musical occasion in a nearby city and his hopeful heir portrayed in the "Domestic Symphony" ran out to meet him crying:

"Oh, papa did they pay you your fee."

And the proud father replied:

"You dear child! You will grow up to be just like your father!"

No art or talent can overcome such a handicap and be true or free.

The other numbers on last night programme w— Brahms's piano concerto No. two, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist and the same composer's "Academic overture."

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date [illegible] State N Y

Strings, Wood Winds and Brasses

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23. These will bring, on Thursday night, a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and, on Saturday afternoon, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has grown greatly in her art and is now ranked among our foremost women pianists. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number of the programme will be Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play

SUNDAY HERALD—
FEBRUARY 17, 1907.

DR. MUCK IN CHICAGO.

The Saturday Evening Herald and the Four Hundred of Chicago of Feb. 9 published the following pen portrait of Dr. Muck on the stage of the Auditorium in Chicago:

"The personnel of Dr. Karl Muck—golly, what a paradoxical symphony conductorial cognomen—was secondary in interest only to the wizardic maestro's marvellous skill and stick. He is of ordinary build, slender, trim and graceful, dignified and assertive and yet absolutely devoid of affectation or contortion mannerisms. His baton has the gentleness of a fawn or a June zephyr and frequently alternates with mekest waves of the reticent left hand, but my—what wonderful possibilities and results accrue! The magic was invisible but overwhelming. Dr. Muck has a suggestively Punch-like profile and abets it with a cuff-collar over which his war vessel stem chin projects in sharp outline, and if his nose was a steel one he could sell it fabulously to J. J. Hill for a Northwest snow-plough or to the Manitoban farmers for breaking their state wheat fields. Dr. Karl materialized with his accustomed dignity and royally refrained from even so much as a smile throughout the first two numbers and applause. Chicago, as usual, demonstrated its exuberant provincialism in expecting and attempting to swipe an encore or several—and this, too, of the holy Boston Symphony princes—what monstrous preposterousness! but Herr Muck was game—and so was Ganz. Fortified behind the uplifted grand piano top, however, Dr. Muck later disclosed to the front siders that he is neither steel nor stone. When Herr Ganz came on for the Tschaikowsky kaleidoscope the hitherto baton sphinx received him with an affinity smile that broke his face well-nigh from ear to ear, and frequently throughout the marvellous quintetto concerto irrepressibly revealed his ivories to the wonder pianist and the concertmeisters."

This sprightly weekly informs us that "Chicago society was somewhat staggered as to how to dress for a grand orchestra concert in grand opera environment. In Berlin, Boston and New York—possibly in Pittsburg—full dress at these stately functions is de rigueur, but Chicago as yet takes no chances. Of full-dress suits, tuxedos and snowy horseshoe fronts there were thousands in the mighty Auditorium assemblage, but not a solitary decollete bare even in the gilded boxes, where even some of our spoilt social men of the period were content to appear in their store and office toggery. The visiting orchestra and soloists were in complete evening dress, although Mr. Ganz still surprisingly remembers and divides his claw-hammers before sitting down."

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

Paper Globe
City New York
FEB 16 1907 State N. Y.

[illegible] baritone, and Felix Lamond[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the programme will comprise Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, and Sibelius's first symphony (first time in New York). The soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff. On Saturday the programme will comprise Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's second piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitch.

...ADVERTISER
...RUARY 17, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. Sinfonia Domestica.
Brahms. Piano Concerto in B-flat. Soloist, Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitch.
Brahms. Academic Festival Overture.

There was a discussion in the home of the O'Rafferty's. Husband had put a heavy strain upon the English language in addressing Mrs. O'Rafferty. Wife had given some airy persiflage with a rolling-pin. Baby made some remarks in "altissimo." Husband had hurled a flatiron, which missed Mrs. O'Rafferty, but smashed the "God Bless Our Home" over the mantel. There were moments when these things were well-portrayed in Strauss's new symphony.

The subject is outside the realms of Art. One may quote many great idealizations of the commonplace Burns' poem about the Haggis, Dibdin's song about the sailor's tobacco box, Carey's "Sally in Our Alley," and Beethoven's village band in the Pastoral Symphony, but to spend many measures in depicting baby's bath, or his going to bed at 7 p.m. and waking up at 7 a.m. his crying, his stubbing his toe, etc., is as puerile as if the composer had gone further into his domestic affairs and given a "fried-potato motive" at half-past 7, or pictured the cook giving notice with a warning-motive on menacing trombones. And, by the way, no American housewife will have faith in a "Domestic Symphony" which altogether omits the domestic!

And when one hears the mightiest orchestra of modern times picturing the nursery events (a few details excepted) in the life of the composer's baby, one dreads to think of what might have happened if he had had twins. "On peut on etre mieux qu'au sein de sa Famille?" does not apply to composers in search of a symphonic subject.

It has been said that no man is a hero to his valet; one can supplement this by saying that some modern composers seem to be heroes to themselves. Wagner set the fashion in his "Mastersingers of Nuremburg," but Strauss returns to his favorite topic more than once. Not content with picturing his own greatness in his "Heldenleben," he shows us, in this work, that he is easy-going, fiery, thoughtful and also masterful. His tonal self praise is certainly not an ideal art topic.

There is a rather cheap method in this madness. No one can blame Strauss that he receives far more for this work than Beethoven did for his entire nine symphonies, but that he should sweep at once from the exaggerated simplicity of this topic to the still more exaggerated lasciviousness of "Salome" shows that he is a shrewd merchant who knows how to advertise his wares and attract the public. There is strong commercial instinct mingled with Strauss's great genius.

Is it wrong to jest at the work of a genius? Not when he is using his great powers to betray his own Art. Wagner had a noble ideal constantly before him; amid all the defects, even crimes, of his career, one can never find him tampering even in the slightest degree with what he conceived to be the highest mission of Music. He craved money as intensely as ever a Richard Strauss did; but no amount of pecuniary reward could deflect him one iota from his highest artistic ideal. We may allow the public to judge whether the composer of the "Domestic Symphony" and "Salome," a man who can achieve as noble a work as "Death and Transfiguration," is dealing uprightly with his great gifts.

Regarded as a bit of musical humor, this symphony falls far below "Till Eulenspiegel," while judged as absolute music, utterly apart from the tales which Strauss has allowed to be connected with it, it is not to be compared with "Death and Transfiguration" or the above-mentioned scherzo. Weingartner justly says that the two last-named works would stand as absolute music, without any story or "programme" being attached, but that Strauss's later works lean very heavily upon their pictorial resources. Strauss is speedily settling the question as to whether he is the successor and rival of Wagner, and settling it in the negative.

One may also impeach the growing difficulties of music less to the composer, who may now break all harmonic and contrapuntal rules, than to the conductor and orchestral musician. The task of these men has more than doubled in difficulty in this generation. Add but a little more to the burden and music will be, for them, a path to the insane asylum. The auditor, too, has a heavier task than ever before.

Yet Genius remains Genius, even when pursuing a bad path. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is a revelation of the powers of modern orchestration. We can recall no such sumptuous color scheme in the entire repertoire of music. It is a new contribution to Art and, were it united with Wagner's wonderful figure invention, Brahms's unity, and Schubert's power of melody, it might place Music where it has never been before. The great work is not ugly at any time, and it is often wonderfully euphonious. It makes a profound impression, even upon one who disagrees with its scheme, its subject and its carrying out.

Its best part is that picturing the family at rest, which takes the place of the symphonic slow movement. Here there is something of a sustained character and of poetry, too.

In too many other parts the jugglery with figures (figures of no pregnancy of meaning) is scrappy and of short breath, a dire fault in so long a movement, and the entire attraction lies in the marvelous orchestration. Many are the new touches, from high clarinettes (Berlioz has used them in orchestra, however) to oboe d'amore. The latter instrument represented the baby, and was excellently played by Mr. Lenom. Its tone is not unlike that of the English horn with a dash of clarinette quality added. The orchestra was much augmented to give this picture of a quiet home, even two harps being present.

The contrapuntal skill of the composer, far behind that of Brahms, was shown in the double fugue, in which husband and wife are evidently at loggerheads, but the husband ends by having his way. "Charbonnier est maitre chez lui," and why should not an eminent composer be! All the orchestra played with great conscientiousness. At the close Dr. Muck was recalled twice, and the whole orchestra also rose and bowed. The public seemed greatly interested in the work. We can only say, while hailing Strauss as the greatest orchestral colorist of the world, that we consider the symphony misleading, the tendency wrong, the art influence doubtful. We think this work and "Heldenleben," too, only a temporary phase in music. But the iridescence of the modern tone coloring has come to stay.

Its glare and splendor told heavily against the pure style of the Brahms concerto; Johannisberger does not taste well after Arrack Punch. Nevertheless, the musician could not help noticing that here the figures were united in a homogeneous whole; there was no patchwork. At first Gabrilowitch kept his instrument too much in the foreground. There was not that perfect abnegation to ensemble that Joseffy or Baermann have given the work and which it requires of the soloist. But in the andante this fault was not in evidence, and this was the most beautiful part of the concerto.

The violoncello solo, too, demands praise here, for it was given with much nobility. We found this movement more truly musical than anything in the preceding domestic picture. It was exactly the opposite in character, for Brahms is clumsy where Strauss is great—in orchestral scoring, and Brahms is great where Strauss is awkward—in thematic invention and development.

Perhaps Dr. Muck slyly wished to have people contrast the two schools and vote for common sense in music; if so, his plan failed, for people simply went home. As in the Scriptures, Exodus came before Revelation. Yet Mr. Gabrilowitch was recalled three times, and, excepting the fault chronicled above, deserved the applause. He proved himself more than a virtuoso in this concert—he was a true musician.

The faithful few, the rearguard who stood firm amidst the retreat, heard a simply exquisite reading of the "Academic Overture." Dr. Muck brought out every detail of the symmetrical, well-developed and humorous work. We are of the opinion that this overture will last longer than the "Domestic Symphony."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N. Y.

Inasmuch as Dr. Muck is to conduct Strauss's Domestic Symphony in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, his opinions on that composer as given to a representative of the Chicago Inter Ocean are of interest:

"Salome" is the sensation of the moment, like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His "Feuersnot," for example, was a sensation when first produced. It has not proved a lasting success. That "Salome" will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche," "Tod und Verklaerung," and "Don Juan." And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His "Also Sprach Zarathustra" reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and "Heldenleben" is a curious instance of the evils of a technique one might almost call too great.

Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, "short breathed," and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In "Also Sprach Zarathustra" he begins nobly. In the first eight measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 16 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at [illegible] next Thursday evening includes the first symphony of Sibelius, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, and the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff). On Saturday afternoon Mr. Grabrilowitch will be the soloist (Brahms concerto), and the chief orchestral number the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Strauss. The Brooklyn programme of the Boston orchestra on Friday evening will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Betrothed of the Czar," the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff), and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N Y

Concerts will take place in Carnegie hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23, under Dr. Carl Muck's direction. These will bring—on Thursday night—a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and—on Saturday afternoon—Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which had its initial hearing in Carnegie hall three years ago, under the direction of the composer.

The Sibelius symphony had its first performance in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, and in Dresden and London in 1903.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was warmly discussed at its first performance. It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklarung" and parts of the "Zarashustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January, two years ago, and with the Philadelphia orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has been very successful. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's humorous "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another admired pianist, who will play Brahms's E-flat major concerto.

Particular note should be taken on the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes and latecomers will not be seated during its performance.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N. Y.

Strauss at the Berlin Royal Opera [illegible] teresting if not convincing when [illegible] his doubts of the most famous living composer. Last spring when he took a one-year engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Muck told C. A. Eilis, the manager, that he would produce, among other things, the second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica" of Strauss, the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not partial to it. He had not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the matinée programme next Saturday afternoon. Fifty minutes long, it leads the matinée programme. The Sibelius symphony will be presented at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night. The soloists, both at piano, are Samaroff in the evening concert and Gabrilowitsch at the matinée.

Mme. Samaroff is soloist also at the Brooklyn concert on Friday, when Dr. Muck will present a Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar"; the Tschaikowsky piano concerto No. 1, and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 15 1907 State N Y

PHOTO OTTO SARONY CO

OLGA SAMAROFF SOLOIST (BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 15 1907 State N Y

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date FEB 17 1907 State N Y

OLGA SAMAROFF.
Pianist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C

Boston Symphony Quartet

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the room of the New Willard on next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The concert will bring to Washington as soloist the artist Rudolf Ganz. Mr. Ganz is a Swiss by birth, and has been a resident of this country for several years, having been brought to Chicago to be the principal teacher of piano in one of the great schools in that city. The first number on the program is Tschaikowsky's quartet, op. 11, No. 1. The quartet, as its opus number indicates, is one of the early works of the Russian master, and it is the first work which gained him solid recognition. When it was first played in Moscow, nearly forty years ago, it had an immediate success. The second number will be a suite for piano and violin, played by Mr. Ganz and Mr. Willy Hess, by Edward Schuett. The closing number will be Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings. The concert will begin at 4 o'clock precisely.

Paper Union Blade
City Toledo Brooklyn
Date FEB 16 1907 State N.Y.

[illegible] view of Dr. Carl Muck's [illegible] formance in Boston the other day [illegible] Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general. [illegible] they were given to a reporter of the Chicago "Inter Ocean" recently. The conversation began with "Salome." "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only [illegible] that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first produced. It has not proved a lasting success. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche,' 'Tod und Verklaerung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technique one might almost call too great.

Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first eight measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications.

[147]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
FEBRUARY 18, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. Sinfonia Domestica.
Brahms. Piano Concerto in B-flat. Soloist, Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitch.
Brahms. Academic Festival Overture.

There was a discussion in the home of the O'Raffertys. Husband had put a heavy strain upon the English language in addressing Mrs. O'Rafferty. Wife had given some airy persiflage with a rolling-pin. Baby made some remarks in "altissimo." Husband had hurled a flatiron, which missed Mrs. O'Rafferty, but smashed the "God Bless Our Home" over the mantel. There were moments when these things were well-portrayed in Strauss's new symphony.

The subject is outside the realms of Art. One may quote many great idealizations of the commonplace Burns' poem about the Haggis, Dibdin's song about the sailor's tobacco box, Carey's "Sally in Our Alley," and Beethoven's village band in the Pastoral Symphony, but to spend many measures in depicting baby's bath, or his going to bed at 7 p.m. and waking up at 7 a.m., his crying, his stubbing his toe, etc., is as puerile as if the composer had gone further into his domestic affairs and given a "fried-potato motive" at half-past 7, or pictured the cook giving notice with a warning-motive on menacing trombones. And, by the way, no American housewife will have faith in a "Domestic Symphony" which altogether omits the domestic!

And when one hears the mightiest orchestra of modern times picturing the nursery events (a few details excepted) in the life of the composer's baby, one dreads to think of what might have happened if he had had twins. "Ou peut on etre mieux qu'au sein de sa Famille?" does not apply to composers in search of a symphonic subject.

It has been said that no man is a hero to his valet; one can supplement this by saying that some modern composers seem to be heroes to themselves. Wagner set the fashion in his "Mastersingers of Nuremburg," but Strauss returns to his favorite topic more than once. Not content with picturing his own greatness in his "Heldenleben," he shows us, in this work, that he is easy-going, fiery, thoughtful and also masterful. His tonal self praise is certainly not an ideal art topic.

There is a rather cheap method in this madness. No one can blame Strauss that he receives far more for this work than Beethoven did for his entire nine symphonies, but that he should sweep at once from the exaggerated simplicity of this topic to the still more exaggerated lasciviousness of "Salome" shows that he is a shrewd merchant who knows how to advertise his wares and attract the public. There is strong commercial instinct mingled with Strauss's great genius.

Is it wrong to jest at the work of a genius? Not when he is using his great powers to betray his own Art. Wagner had a noble ideal constantly before him; amid all the defects, even crimes, of his career, one can never find him tampering even in the slightest degree with what he conceived to be the highest mission of Music. He craved money as intensely as ever a Richard Strauss did; but no amount of pecuniary reward could deflect him one iota from his highest artistic ideal. We may allow the public to judge whether the composer of the "Domestic Symphony" and "Salome," a man who can achieve as noble a work as "Death and Transfiguration," is dealing uprightly with his great gifts.

Regarded as a bit of musical humor, this symphony falls far below "Till Eulenspiegel," while judged as absolute music, utterly apart from the tales which Strauss has allowed to be connected with it, it is not to be compared with "Death and Transfiguration" or the above-mentioned scherzo. Weingartner justly says that the two last-named works would stand as absolute music, without any story or "programme" being attached, but that Strauss's later works lean very heavily upon their pictorial resources. Strauss is speedily settling the question as to whether he is the successor and rival of Wagner, and settling it in the negative.

One may also impeach the growing difficulties of music less to the composer, who may now break all harmonic and contrapuntal rules, than to the conductor and orchestral musician. The task of these men has more than doubled in difficulty in this generation. Add but a little more to the burden and music will be, for them, a path to the insane asylum. The auditor, too, has a heavier task than ever before.

Yet Genius remains Genius, even when pursuing a bad path. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is a revelation of the powers of modern orchestration. We can recall no such sumptuous color scheme in the entire repertoire of music. It is a new contribution to Art and, were it united with Wagner's wonderful figure invention, Brahms's unity, and Schubert's power of melody, it might place Music where it has never been before. The great work is not ugly at any time, and it is often wonderfully euphonious. It makes a profound impression, even upon one who disagrees with its scheme, its subject and its carrying out.

Its best part is that picturing the family at rest, which takes the place of the symphonic slow movement. Here there is something of a sustained character and of poetry, too.

In too many other parts the jugglery with figures (figures of no pregnancy of meaning) is scrappy and of short breath, a dire fault in so long a movement, and the entire attraction lies in the marvelous orchestration. Many are the new touches, from high clarinettes (Berlioz has used them in orchestra, however) to oboe d'amore. The latter instrument represented the baby, and was excellently played by Mr. Lenom. Its tone is not unlike that of the English horn with a dash of clarinette quality added. The orchestra was much augmented to give this picture of a quiet home, even two harps being present.

The contrapuntal skill of the composer, far behind that of Brahms, was shown in the double fugue, in which husband and wife are evidently at loggerheads, but the husband ends by having his way. "Charbonnier est maitre chez lui," and why should not an eminent composer be! All the orchestra played with great conscientiousness. At the close Dr. Muck was recalled twice, and the whole orchestra also rose and bowed. The public seemed greatly interested in the work. We can only say, while hailing Strauss as the greatest orchestral colorist of the world, that we consider the symphony misleading, the tendency wrong, the art influence doubtful. We think this work and "Heldenleben," too, only a temporary phase in music. But the iridescence of the modern tone coloring has come to stay.

Its glare and splendor told heavily against the pure style of the Brahms concerto; Johannisberger does not taste well after Arrack Punch. Nevertheless, the musician could not help noticing that here the figures were united in a homogeneous whole; there was no patchwork. At first Gabrilowitch kept his instrument too much in the foreground. There was not that perfect abnegation to ensemble that Joseffy or Baermann have given the work and which it requires of the soloist. But in the andante this fault was not in evidence, and this was the most beautiful part of the concerto.

The violoncello solo, too, demands praise here, for it was given with much nobility. We found this movement more truly musical than anything in the preceding domestic picture. It was exactly the opposite in character, for Brahms is clumsy where Strauss is great—in orchestral scoring, and Brahms is great where Strauss is awkward—in thematic invention and development.

Perhaps Dr. Muck slyly wished to have people contrast the two schools and vote for common sense in music; if so, his plan failed, for people simply went home. As in the Scriptures, Exodus came before Revelation. Yet Mr. Gabrilowitch was recalled three times, and, excepting the fault chronicled above, deserved the applause. He proved himself more than a virtuoso in this concert—he was a true musician.

The faithful few, the rearguard who stood firm amidst the retreat, heard a simply exquisite reading of the "Academic Overture." Dr. Muck brought out every detail of the symmetrical, well-developed and humorous work. We are of the opinion that this overture will last longer than the "Domestic Symphony."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

Inasmuch as Dr. Muck is to conduct Strauss's Domestic Symphony in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, his opinions on that composer as given to a representative of the Chicago Inter Ocean are of interest:

"Salome" is the sensation of the moment, like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His "Feuersnot," for example, was a sensation when first produced. It has not proved a lasting success. That "Salome" will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche," "Tod und Verklaerung," and "Don Juan." And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His "Also Sprach Zarathustra" reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and "Heldenleben" is a curious instance of the evils of a technique one might almost call too great.

Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, "short breathed," and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In "Also Sprach Zarathustra" he begins nobly. In the first eight measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening includes the first symphony of Sibelius, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, and the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff). On Saturday afternoon Mr. Grabrilowitch will be the soloist (Brahms concerto), and the chief orchestral number the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Strauss. The Brooklyn programme of the Boston orchestra on Friday evening will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Betrothed of the Czar," the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff), and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N Y

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23, under Dr. Carl Muck's direction. These will bring—on Thursday night—a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and—on Saturday afternoon—Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which had its initial hearing in Carnegie hall three years ago, under the direction of the composer.

The Sibelius symphony had its first performance in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, and in Dresden and London in 1903.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was warmly discussed at its first performance. It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklarung" and parts of the "Zarashustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January, two years ago, and with the Philadelphia orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has been very successful. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's humorous "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another admired pianist, who will play Brahms's E-flat major concerto.

Particular note should be taken on the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes and latecomers will not be seated during its performance.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N Y

PHOTO OTTO SARONY CO

OLGA SAMAROFF SOLOIST (BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 10 1907 State N. Y.

Strauss at the Berlin Royal Opera is interesting if not convincing when he declares his doubts of the most famous living composer. Last spring when he took a one-year engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Muck told C. A. Ellis, the manager, that he would produce, among other things, the second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica" of Strauss, the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not partial to it. He had not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the matinée programme next Saturday afternoon. Fifty minutes long, it leads the matinée programme. The Sibelius symphony will be presented at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night. The soloists, both at piano, are Samaroff in the evening concert and Gabrilowitsch at the matinée.

Mme. Samaroff is soloist also at the Brooklyn concert on Friday, when Dr. Muck will present a Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar"; the Tschaikowsky piano concerto No. 1, and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy."

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

OLGA SAMAROFF.
Pianist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C

Boston Symphony Quartet

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ball room of the New Willard on next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The concert will bring to Washington as the assisting artist Rudolf Ganz. Mr. Ganz is a Swiss by birth, and has been a resident of this country for several years, having been brought to Chicago to be the principal teacher of piano in one of the great schools in that city. The first number on the program is Tschaikowsky's quartet, op. 11, No. 1. The quartet, as its opus number indicates, is one of the early works of the Russian master, and it is the first work which gained him solid recognition. When it was first played in Moscow, nearly forty years ago, it had an immediate success. The second number will be a suite for piano and violin, played by Mr. Ganz and Prof. Willy Hess, by Edward Schuett. The closing number will be Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings. The concert will begin at 4 o'clock precisely.

Paper Union Bible
City Brooklyn Toledo
Date FEB 16 1907 State N.Y.

In view of Dr. Carl Muck's performance in Boston the other day of Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general as they were given to a reporter on the Chicago "Inter Ocean" recently. The conversation began with "Salome." "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting success. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction."

[147]

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 1 7 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on Jan. 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. It was composed in 1899, published in 1902, and first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on Nov. 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London under Henry J. Wood, Oct. 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maud Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last Spring, when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do, among other things this second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly, and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another pianist, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Daily Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 1 6 1907 State Conn.

Two orchestral concerts will come near jostling each other in Brooklyn next week. On Friday will come the fourth concert in the regular series by the Boston Symphony players, and on the night before Mme. Sembrich and members of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert, which will be quite as much a song recital as anything else. The juxtaposition of the two affairs seems to be rather unfortunate, inasmuch as each appeals to the same class of patrons.

The soloist at the Friday night concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been claiming attention elsewhere as a foremost artist. She has been playing with the leading orchestras and was to have played here with the Boston Orchestra earlier in the season, which was prevented by a disarrangement of plans. On Friday night, she will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for piano in B Flat Minor, No. 1. This is what has been termed with its monumental opening, "one of the most brilliant works in the literature for piano and orchestra," and has always been a favorite with pianists. Interesting enough is the fact that this work had its first performance in public in Boston in the '70s, when Hans Von Bulow was touring this country. It has all the melodious qualities which mark the great Russian's work, and is brilliant enough technically to test a pianist's ability to its utmost. The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and Mr. Emile [illegible], the principal viola of the Orchestra, will play the solo viola. The first [illegible] will be [illegible]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date FEB 1 8 1907 State N Y

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and was published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on November 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London, under Henry J. Wood, on October 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maude Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last spring when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do, among other things, this symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it. It was not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the next matinee programme.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago, and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Express Tribune
City Rochester New York
Date FEB 1 7 1907 State N Y

Here is something for the quiet consumption of people who accept everything written by Richard Strauss as part of the gospel of music. It is part of a communication from Dr. Muck, published in the Chicago "Inter Ocean."

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," says Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that a composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least, according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures, he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

Paper
City Rochester New York
Date JAN 1 6 1907 State N Y

WHAT BOSTON PAYS FOR MUSIC

Premiums Are Paid for Seats at Symphony Concerts.

THE GENUS DEADHEAD UNKNOWN

The Hub Is Musical as Far Down as the Depths of Its Pocket—Yet Boston Symphony Does Not Pay.

If a New Yorker, happening to be in Boston some Friday or Saturday during the winter, should decide that he would go and hear the Symphony Orchestra upon its native platform he would receive a surprise amounting to a shock.

If it happened to be Friday afternoon he would in all probability not be able to get a seat for love or money.

Symphony Hall contains something more than 2,500 seats. When the announcement of the season's concerts is published it contains the following paragraph: "Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $18 and $10, according to location." Of course even the New Yorker understands that the concerts are on Saturday nights and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

But what he does not understand is that the price of the tickets is by no means $18 and $10, according to location. The price is whatever a seat will bring more than $18 and $10, those figures representing the minimum price at which two divisions of seats will be sold.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals are sold at auction at Symphony Hall on October 1st; the $10 seats for rehearsals are sold in the same way on October 2d; the $18 and the $10 seats for the concerts are auctioned off on October 4th and 5th. Seats are sold only in the regular order and no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

There is perhaps no more reasonable way of adjusting a scale of prices than by letting the people do it themselves. If certain persons, for the good of the cause, —and the glory of themselves—are willing to pay premiums of from $75 to $300, as on one occasion, who shall say them nay? Even after all these contributors to gain and to glory have been accommodated there are plenty of seats to be had at prices which will average from $1 to $1.50 for each of the twenty-four performances.

There is only one sort of person who is left in a very bad way. This is the one who, like the stray New Yorker, wants to enjoy a single concert.

Suppose he goes to the box office and with cheerful assurance asks for a seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsal. He is told that there are no seats for sale. A box? There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. Well meekly, can he have standing room? No one is allowed to stand.

It is all true. Every reserved seat in the building is sold for the entire season. Standees are not admitted.

At a ticket broker's downtown there is now and then a seat to be had, some one sending in a season ticket to be, as it were, sublet for the occasion. But so far as the Friday rehearsals are concerned this does not often happen.

Yet, though the man in the box office may neglect to mention it, there are seats to be had, even in fact only at the last moment. They are good seats, too, and dirt cheap.

But one does pay for them all right enough. If not with money, yet with time and strength. Exactly 505 seats, the entire capacity of the second balcony, are reserved for sale as so-called rush seats.

These seats cannot be bought in advance. Those who wish them must be in line when the doors are opened. Each person must have in his or her hand a silver quarter. Nothing else will be accepted. A half dollar for two, or a dollar for four, or two dimes and a nickel for one—none of these will be received. Each person pays for himself and pays with a quarter.

One man holds a bag, into which the quarters are dropped. Another man stands by with a counter, which he presses, click-click, for every person admitted.

When his counter shows that 505 persons have passed in, the bar falls and not another soul—or at least not another body can pass. The 505 already in rush pell mell up the stairs, tripping on their skirts, panting and puffing and finally scrambling madly into their seats, which as a matter of fact are quite as good as those in the balcony below them.

It is very seldom indeed that all the 505 rush seats are not sold out. Sometimes when there is to be a famous soloist, there would be several hundred more persons in line than there are seats, if it were not that the management sends out somebody to count up and to warn the excess that there is no hope for them. This is a matter of no more than common humanity, since the rush seaters have to wait outside in the cold, not being allowed even in the lobby until they are to be admitted to the hall.

Many women wait in line thus for two or three hours in order to have the advantage of these 25-cent seats. They bring their camp stools and books, wear their warmest clothes and, more than likely, their most [illegible] scientific principles [illegible] weather and [illegible]

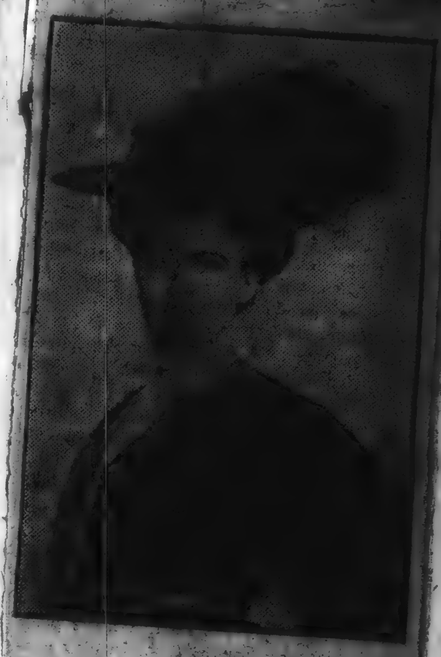
[illegible] is practically [illegible] the Symphony concerts. These consist of two free seats in the entire house. These are known as guests' seats, and are usually given to the soloist for the use of his or her friends.

There have been instances of distinguished dramatic or musical stars visiting Boston and, very naturally, expecting to receive reciprocal courtesies from the Symphony people. When these personages were offered the two seats and were informed that they could have no more they have sometimes taken offense at what seemed to them a stingy spirit. Yet these two seats are the only ones, except the 25-cent rush seats, not sold in advance for the entire season.

In spite of which record, the orchestra does not begin to pay expenses.—New York "Sun."

Paper Daily Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 1 6 1907 State Conn.

At the concerts he has conducted in Brooklyn Dr. Karl Muck has given the impression that he is not only an uncommonly fine conductor, but that he is a musician of high ideals, governed by an eminently sane conception of musical art.



MME. SAMAROFF,
Soloist at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, Next Friday.

This impression is confirmed by an interview given recently to a representative of the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that a composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are: 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short-breathed' and not worthy of the marvelous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

It is likely that the Strauss bubble will soon burst if it has not already, and this will be helped along by his grasping greed, which has most recently shown itself in the attempt to collect royalty in this country from those who sing his songs.

[149]

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on Jan. 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. It was composed in 1899, published in 1902, and first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on Nov. 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London under Henry J. Wood, Oct. 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maud Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last Spring, when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do among other things this second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly, and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Tschalkowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another pianist, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Daily Times Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 16 1907 State Conn.

Two orchestral concerts will come near jostling each other in Brooklyn next week. On Friday will come the fourth concert in the regular series by the Boston Symphony players, and on the night before Mme. Sembrich and members of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert, which will be quite as much a song recital as anything else. The juxtaposition of the two affairs seems to be rather unfortunate, inasmuch as each appeals to the same class of patrons.

The soloist at the Friday night concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been claiming attention elsewhere as a foremost artist. She has been playing with the leading orchestras and was to have played here with the Boston Orchestra earlier in the season, which was prevented by a disarrangement of plans. On Friday night, she will play Tschalkowsky's Concerto for piano in B Flat Minor, No. 1. This is what has been termed with its monumental opening, "one of the most brilliant works in the literature for piano and orchestra," and has always been a favorite with pianists. Interesting enough is the fact that this work had its first performance in public in Boston in the '70s, when Hans Von Bulow was touring this country. It has all the melodious qualities which mark the great Russian's work, and is brilliant enough technically to test a pianist's ability to its utmost. The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and Mr. Emile Ferir, the principal viola of the Orchestra, will play the solo viola. The first number on the programme will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betroth-al of the [illegible]

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and was published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on November 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London, under Henry J. Wood, on October 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maude Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last spring when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do, among other things, this symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it. It was not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the next matinee programme.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago, and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. She will play Tschalkowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

Here is something for the quiet consumption of people who accept everything written by Richard Strauss as part of the gospel of music. It is part of a communication from Dr. Muck, published in the Chicago "Inter Ocean."

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," says Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least, according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures, he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

***

City Rochester New York
Date FEB 16 1907 State N Y

WHAT BOSTON PAYS FOR MUSIC

Premiums Are Paid for Seats at Symphony Concerts.

THE GENUS DEADHEAD UNKNOWN

The Hub Is Musical as Far Down as the Depths of Its Pocket—Yet Boston Symphony Does Not Pay.

If a New Yorker, happening to be in Boston some Friday or Saturday during the winter, should decide that he would go and hear the Symphony Orchestra upon its native platform he would receive a surprise amounting to a shock.

If it happened to be Friday afternoon he would in all probability not be able to get a seat for love or money.

Symphony Hall contains something more than 2,500 seats. When the announcement of the season's concerts is published it contains the following paragraph: "Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $18 and $10, according to location." Of course even the New Yorker understands that the concerts are on Saturday nights and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

But what he does not understand is that the price of the tickets is by no means $18 and $10, according to location. The price is whatever a seat will bring more than $18 and $10, those figures representing the minimum price at which two divisions of seats will be sold.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals are sold at auction at Symphony Hall on October 1st; the $10 seats for rehearsals are sold in the same way on October 2d; the $18 and the $10 seats for the concerts are auctioned off on October 4th and 5th. Seats are sold only in the regular order and no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

There is perhaps no more reasonable way of adjusting a scale of prices than by letting the people do it themselves. If certain persons, for the good of the cause, —and the glory of themselves—are willing to pay premiums of from $75 to $300, as on one occasion, who shall say them nay? Even after all these contributors to gain and to glory have been accommodated there are plenty of seats to be had at prices which will average from $1 to $1.50 for each of the twenty-four performances.

There is only one sort of person who is left in a very bad way. This is the one who, like the stray New Yorker, wants to enjoy a single concert.

Suppose he goes to the box office and with cheerful assurance asks for a seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsal. He is told that there are no seats for sale. A box? There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. Well meekly, can he have standing room? No one is allowed to stand.

It is all true. Every reserved seat in the building is sold for the entire season. Standees are not admitted.

At a ticket broker's downtown there is now and then a seat to be had, some one sending in a season ticket to be, as it were, sublet for the occasion. But so far as the Friday rehearsals are concerned this does not often happen.

Yet, though the man in the box office may neglect to mention it, there are seats to be had, even in fact only at the last moment. They are good seats, too, and dirt cheap.

But one does pay for them all right enough. If not with money, yet with time and strength. Exactly 505 seats, the entire capacity of the second balcony, are reserved for sale as so-called rush seats.

These seats cannot be bought in advance. Those who wish them must be in line when the doors are opened. Each person must have in his or her hand a silver quarter. Nothing else will be accepted. A half dollar for two, or a dollar for four, or two dimes and a nickel for one—none of these will be received. Each person pays for himself and pays with a quarter.

One man holds a bag, into which the quarters are dropped. Another man stands by with a counter, which he presses, click-click, for every person admitted.

When his counter shows that 505 persons have passed in, the bar falls and not another soul—or at least not another body can pass. The 505 already in rush pell mell up the stairs, tripping on their skirts, panting and puffing and finally scrambling madly into their seats, which as a matter of fact are quite as good as those in the balcony below them.

It is very seldom indeed that all the 505 rush seats are not sold out. Sometimes when there is to be a famous soloist, there would be several hundred more persons in line than there are seats, if it were not that the management sends out somebody to count up and to warn the excess that there is no hope for them. This is a matter of no more than common humanity, since the rush seaters have to wait outside in the cold, not being allowed even in the lobby until they are to be admitted to the hall.

Many women wait in line thus for two or three hours in order to have the advantage of these 25-cent seats. They bring their camp stools and books, wear their warmest clothes and, more than likely, their most Christian scientific principles and stick it out, if fair weather and foul, the whole season through.

The rush seat is a feature peculiar to the Friday afternoon rehearsal. All of the seats for the Saturday night concerts are included in the auction sales at the opening of the season.

The deadhead is practically unknown at the Symphony concerts. There are only two free seats in the entire house. These are known as guests' seats, and are generally given to the soloist for the use of his or her friends.

There have been instances of distinguished dramatic or musical stars visiting Boston and, very naturally, expecting to receive reciprocal courtesies from the Symphony people. When these personages were offered the two seats and were informed that they could have no more they have sometimes taken offense at what seemed to them a stingy spirit. Yet these two seats are the only ones, except the 25-cent rush seats, not sold in advance for the entire season.

In spite of which record, the orchestra does not begin to pay expenses.—New York "Sun."

Paper Daily Times Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 16 1907 State Conn.

At the concerts he has conducted in Brooklyn Dr. Karl Muck has given the impression that he is not only an uncommonly fine conductor, but that he is a musician of high ideals, governed by an eminently sane conception of musical art.

MME. SAMAROFF,
Soloist at Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, Next Friday.

This impression is confirmed by an interview given recently to a representative of the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are: 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short-breathed' and not worthy of the marvelous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

It is likely that the Strauss bubble will soon burst if it has not already, and this will be helped along by his grasping greed, which has most recently shown itself in the attempt to collect royalty in this country from those who sing his songs.

[148]

Paper Eagle Journal
City Atlanta
Date FEB 16 State Ga

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SEMBRICH CONCERT

Will Be the Important Musical Events in Brooklyn Next Week.

PIANIST WITH THE ORCHESTRA

Operatic Duel in Manhattan Brings "Parsifal" on Washington's Birthday.

The last but one of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, February 22, and what is almost of equal importance, this is in all probability the last but one appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Karl Muck, who has had such a brilliant success in this city. Negotiations have been in progress for some time to have him released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, but it is more than doubtful that this much desired end will be attained and the chances are now very great that he will make his final appearance in Brooklyn on March 22, and that next year another conductor will be in his place. The soloist on this occasion will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who created last year a genuine sensation here when she played with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Madame Samaroff's career has been quite meteoric in its rapid rise, and the end is not yet. She has now been a public performer for two years and in that time has become recognized as one of the foremost pianists. On this trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra she is playing with it in New York, Brooklyn and Washington. Here she will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for piano in B flat minor, No. 1. This is what has been termed with its monumental opening, "one of the most brilliant works in the literature for piano and orchestra," and has always been a favorite with pianists. This work had its first performance in public in Boston in the 70s, when Hans von Bulow was touring this country. It has the melodious qualities which mark the great Russian's work and is brilliant enough technically to test a pianist's ability to its utmost.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date FEB 17 1907 State N Y

Its fourth pair of concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts bring forward two very interesting compositions. The first of these is a symphony new to New York, by Jan Sibelius, in E minor, which will have its hearing on Thursday night, and Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. Dr. Carl Muck, in bringing it forward on Saturday afternoon will, as he did in Boston last week, present it in one movement, the work lasting about fifty minutes. Note should be taken of this fact, since the symphony heads the Saturday afternoon list and late comers will not be seated until it has been finished.

On Thursday night the solo artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, who will play Tschaikowsky's well worn concerto in B flat minor. On saturday afternoon Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will play Brahms' second concerto.

N. Y. Ev. Sun
Feb. 16/07

Strauss at the Berlin Royal Opera, is interesting if not convincing when he declares his doubts of the most famous living composer. Last spring when he took a one-year engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Muck told C. A. Ellis, the manager, that he would produce, among other things, the second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica" of Strauss, the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not partial to it. He had not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the matinée programme for Saturday afternoon. Fifty minutes [illegible] the matinée programme. The symphony will be presented at [illegible] on Thursday night. The [illegible] are Samaroff in the [illegible] Gabrilowitsch at the

Paper Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 16 1907 State Conn.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SEMBRICH IN SAME WEEK

Samaroff to Play With Symphony at Baptist Temple.

MANHATTAN OPERA BILL.

"Dinorah" to Have Its First Production at New Opera House—Mr. Watters' Programme.

Last but one of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, February 22, and what is almost of equal importance, this is in all probability the last but one appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Karl Muck, who has had such a brilliant success in this city. Negotiations have been in progress for some time to have him released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, but it is more than doubtful that this much-desired end will be attained and the chances are now very great that he will make his final appearance in Brooklyn on March 22 and that next year another conductor will be in his place. Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto for Pianoforte, No. I, in B flat minor, Op. 23, at this concert. Russian music will predominate at this fourth concert of the season, for Dr. Karl Muck has chosen the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, for its opening number. The symphony is also of the modern school as it is Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," (Op. 16), which though somewhat "programme music" like in that it tells a story very inaccurately, is yet a fine example of Berlioz' style. The viola solo will be played by F. Ferir. The story told in the four movements is as follows:

Harold in the Mountains, scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; March of Pilgrims singing their Evening Hymn; Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress; Orgy of Brigands; Recellections of the preceding scenes.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date FEB 17 1907 State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last but one of the series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, February 19, at 4:30 o'clock. It will also, in all probability, be the last but one appearance of Dr. Karl Muck in this city, for it becomes more than ever doubtful that his services will be secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another season. The soloist of the concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who last year played here with the Philadelphia Orchestra. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B-flat minor, No. 1. This work had its first performance in public in Boston in the seventies, when Hans von Bulelow was touring this country.

The first number on the program will be a work by Paul Dukas, who is one of the younger Frenchmen and contemporary of Claude Debussy. It is called a scherzo, its title being "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A-major.

Paper Press
City Philadelphia New York
Date FEB 17 State N Y Pa

In view of Dr. Karl Muck's performance in Boston the other day of Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which he does not admire, by the way, it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general. "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss'. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meager. His themes are fragmentary, 'short-breathed' and not worthy of the marvelous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse [illegible] It is buried in the mass of technical complications."

MADAME MELBA

THE programme for the Boston Symphony concert tomorrow night resolves itself, so far as the orchestral numbers are concerned, into a Byron celebration. The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," will be given. The latter work is programme music in its most pronounced form, its story, the scenes witnessed during the Italian wanderings of Byron's "Childe Harold." The Harold motif, given always to the viola throughout the symphony, typifies the hero, its introduction marking the presence of Harold in the mountains in the first movement, among the pilgrims in the second, listening to the serenade of a mountaineer, and, in the final movement, among the brigands. This viola theme ranks almost with solo importance, the name of the viola player tomorrow being in consequence specially announced—Emile Ferir.

The engagement of Madame Melba as soloist has previously been mentioned as the only appearance of this famous singer this season. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the aria "Ah! fors e lui" from "Traviata."

The term of Doctor Muck's engagement draws toward its end. While efforts are still being made to secure his release from his contract with the Berlin Opera, a favorable answer to the petition which has been sent to the German Emperor is very unlikely, so that, including this concert, Philadelphia will probably have but two more opportunities to hear the work of this distinguished musician.

N. Y. Herald
Feb. 17/07

Its fourth pair of concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts bring forward two very interesting compositions. The first of these is a symphony new to New York, by Jan Sibelius, in E minor, which will have its hearing on Thursday night, and Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. Dr. Carl Muck, in bringing it forward on Saturday afternoon will, as he did in Boston last week, present it in one movement, the work lasting about fifty minutes. Note should be taken of this fact, since the symphony heads the Saturday afternoon list and late comers will not be seated until it has been finished.

On Thursday night the solo artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, who will play Tschaikowsky's well worn concerto in B flat minor. On saturday afternoon Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will play Brahms' second concerto.

Paper Sat Ev. Globe Herald
City Chicago New York
Date FEB 9 1907 State N. Y.

The concert given by The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium last Wednesday evening was one of the gala events of the season. Every seat in the place was sold, and many would-be-purchasers were sent empty away. Dr. Muck proved to be as gravely intellectual as had been forecasted, and with a most charming personality as well. Perfect control of the splendid orchestra has come into his hands very rapidly and his confidence in them is so great that he permitted them to play a movement entirely without direction, and so admirable is the ensemble that this task was accomplished easily and perfectly. The program was neither new or novel. The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was played in place of those we hear so often and an Overture of Wagner, which until heard in the glowing colors laid on by this Band has been usually considered one of the lesser works of the great Richard. The Strauss number was given a conventional reading, but the Tschaikowski piano-forte Concerto, in which Rudolph Ganz played the solo piano part was given a reading which has but seldom been equalled.

N. Y. Sun
Feb. 17/07

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor, No. 1. This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the same composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composers. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing [illegible] kowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. [illegible] Gabrilowitsch will be [illegible] noon, playing Brahms's

[149]

Paper Eagle Journal
City Brooklyn Atlanta
Date State Ga

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SEMBRICH CONCERT

Will Be the Important Musical Events in Brooklyn Next Week.

PIANIST WITH THE ORCHESTRA

Operatic Duel in Manhattan Brings "Parsifal" on Washington's Birthday.

The last but one of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, February 22, and what is almost of equal importance, this is in all probability the last but one appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Karl Muck, who has had such a brilliant success in this city. Negotiations have been in progress for some time to have him released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, but it is more than doubtful that this much desired end will be attained and the chances are now very great that he will make his final appearance in Brooklyn on March 22, and that next year another conductor will be in his place. The soloist on this occasion will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who created last year a genuine sensation here when she played with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Madame Samaroff's career has been quite meteoric in its rapid rise, and the end is not yet. She has now been a public performer for two years and in that time has become recognized as one of the foremost pianists. On this trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra she is playing with it in New York, Brooklyn and Washington. Here she will play Tschaikowsky's Concerto for piano in B flat minor, No. 1. This is what has been termed with its monumental opening, "one of the most brilliant works in the literature for piano and orchestra," and has always been a favorite with pianists. This work had its first performance in public in Boston in the 70s, when Hans von Bulow was touring this country. It has the melodious qualities which mark the great Russian's work and is brilliant enough technically to test a pianist's ability to its utmost.

Paper Register
City New Haven
Date FEB 16 1907 State Conn.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND SEMBRICH IN SAME WEEK

Samaroff to Play With Symphony at Baptist Temple.

MANHATTAN OPERA BILL.

"Dinorah" to Have Its First Production at New Opera House—Mr. Watters' Programme.

Last but one of the season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, February 22, and what is almost of equal importance, this is in all probability the last but one appearance in Brooklyn of Dr. Karl Muck, who has had such a brilliant success in this city. Negotiations have been in progress for some time to have him released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, but it is more than doubtful that this much-desired end will be attained and the chances are now very great that he will make his final appearance in Brooklyn on March 22 and that next year another conductor will be in his place. Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto for Pianoforte, No. I, in B flat minor, Op. 23, at this concert. Russian music will predominate at this fourth concert of the season, for Dr. Karl Muck has chosen the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, for its opening number. The symphony is also of the modern school as it is Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," (Op. 16), which though somewhat "programme music' like in that it tells a story very inaccurately, is yet a fine example of Berlioz' style. The viola solo will be played by F. Ferir. The story told in the four movements is as follows:

Harold in the Mountains, scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; March of Pilgrims singing their Evening Hymn; Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress; Orgy of Brigands; Recellections of the preceding scenes.

Paper Ledger Post
City Philadelphia Denver
Date State Col.

MADAME MELBA

Paper Herald
City New York
Date FEB 17 1907 State N.Y.

Its fourth pair of concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts bring forward two very interesting compositions. The first of these is a symphony new to New York, by Jan Sibelius, in E minor, which will have its hearing on Thursday night, and Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. Dr. Carl Muck, in bringing it forward on Saturday afternoon will, as he did in Boston last week, present it in one movement, the work lasting about fifty minutes. Note should be taken of this fact, since the symphony heads the Saturday afternoon list and late comers will not be seated until it has been finished.

On Thursday night the solo artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, who will play Tschaikowsky's well worn concerto in B flat minor. On saturday afternoon Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will play Brahms' second concerto.

The People's Choral Union [illegible]

Paper Star
City Washington
Date FEB 17 1907 State D C

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last but one of the series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, February 19, at 4:30 o'clock. It will also, in all probability, be the last but one appearance of Dr. Karl Muck in this city, for it becomes more than ever doubtful that his services will be secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another season. The soloist of the concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who last year played here with the Philadelphia Orchestra. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B-flat minor, No. 1. This work had its first performance in public in Boston in the seventies, when Hans von Bulelow was touring this country.

The first number on the program will be a work by Paul Dukas, who is one of the younger Frenchmen and contemporary of Claude Debussy. It is called a scherzo, its title being "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A-major.

Paper Globe
City Chicago New York
Date FEB 9 1907 State N. Y.

The concert given by The Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium last Wednesday evening was one of the gala events of the season. Every seat in the place was sold, and many would-be-purchasers were sent empty away. Dr. Muck proved to be as gravely intellectual as had been forecasted, and with a most charming personality as well. Perfect control of the splendid orchestra has come into his hands very rapidly and his confidence in them is so great that he permitted them to play a movement entirely without direction, and so admirable is the ensemble that this task was accomplished easily and perfectly. The program was neither new or novel. The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was played in place of those we hear so often and an Overture of Wagner, which until heard in the glowing colors laid on by this Band has been usually considered one of the lesser works of the great Richard. The Strauss number was given a conventional reading, but the Tschaikowski piano-forte Concerto, in which Rudolph Ganz played the solo piano part was given a reading which has but seldom been equalled.

N. Y. Ev. Sun
Feb. 16/07

Strauss at the Berlin Royal Opera, is interesting if not convincing when he declares his doubts of the most famous living composer. Last spring when he took a one-year engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Muck told C. A. Ellis, the manager, that he would produce, among other things, the second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica" of Strauss, the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not partial to it. He had not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the matinée programme next Saturday afternoon. Fifty minutes long, it leads the matinée programme. The Sibelius symphony will be presented at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night. The soloists, both at piano, are Samaroff in the evening concert and Gabrilowitsch at the

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N.Y. Pa

In view of Dr. Karl Muck's performance in Boston the other day of Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which he does not admire, by the way, it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general. "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss'. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meager. His themes are fragmentary, 'short-breathed' and not worthy of the marvelous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

THE programme for the Boston Symphony concert tomorrow night resolves itself, so far as the orchestral numbers are concerned, into a Byron celebration. The Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," will be given. The latter work is programme music in its most pronounced form, its story, the scenes witnessed during the Italian wanderings of Byron's "Childe Harold." The Harold motif, given always to the viola throughout the symphony, typifies the hero, its introduction marking the presence of Harold in the mountains in the first movement, among the pilgrims in the second, listening to the serenade of a mountaineer, and, in the final movement, among the brigands. This viola theme ranks almost with solo importance, the name of the viola player tomorrow being in consequence specially announced—Emile Ferir.

The engagement of Madame Melba as soloist has previously been mentioned as the only appearance of this famous singer this season. She will sing the "Sweet Bird" from Handel's "Il Penseroso" and the aria "Ah! fors e lui" from "Traviata."

The term of Doctor Muck's engagement draws toward its end. While efforts are still being made to secure his release from his contract with the Berlin Opera, a favorable answer to the petition which has been sent to the German Emperor is very unlikely, so that, including this concert, Philadelphia will probably have but two more opportunities to hear the work of this distinguished musician.

* * *

N. Y. Herald
Feb. 17/07

Its fourth pair of concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts bring forward two very interesting compositions. The first of these is a symphony new to New York, by Jan Sibelius, in E minor, which will have its hearing on Thursday night, and Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. Dr. Carl Muck, in bringing it forward on Saturday afternoon will, as he did in Boston last week, present it in one movement, the work lasting about fifty minutes. Note should be taken of this fact, since the symphony heads the Saturday afternoon list and late comers will not be seated until it has been finished.

On Thursday night the solo artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, who will play Tschaikowsky's well worn concerto in B flat minor. On saturday afternoon Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, will play Brahms' second concerto.

N. Y. Sun
Feb. 17/07

Two important works, one of which is entirely new to New York, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, February 21, the symphony will be Sibelius's in E minor, No. 1. This work when played in Boston created a most profound impression and was regarded as being in every respect more important than the same composer's second symphony in D major, which is better known. On Saturday afternoon the first number on the programme will be Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played in New York but once, three years ago, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the direction of its composers. Mme. Samaroff will be the soloist on Thursday evening, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B flat minor. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, playing Brahms's concerto in E flat major, No. 2.

[149]

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N.Y.

In view of Dr. Karl Muck's Boston performance of Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general, as recently given to a reporter on the Chicago Inter-Ocean. The conversation began with "Salome."

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are: 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra,' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace, but it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

N. Y. Post
Feb. 16/07

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening includes the first symphony of Sibelius, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas and the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff). On Saturday afternoon Mr. Grabrilowitch will be the soloist (Brahms concerto), and the chief orchestral number the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Strauss. The Brooklyn programme of the Boston orchestra on Friday evening will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Betrothed of the Czar," the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff), and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Walter Damrosch will conduct the musical festival to be held in the spring at Louisville, Ky., Syracuse, N. Y., and Spartanburg, S. C. Mme. Sembrich will be the principal singer, and among the works to be performed will be Bach's cantata "Sleepers Wake," Verdi's "Requiem," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalilah."

Mme. Sembrich will give a song recital at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn in the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, aided by the strings and wood winds of the Russian Symphony Society, on Thursday evening. She will be heard in songs of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Bizet, Arditi, and other composers.

On Thursday evening, at Mendelssohn Hall, will occur the third concert of the Adele Margulies Trio, with Sam Franko assisting. The programme will consist of Dvorák's "Dumky," Op. 90; Rubinstein's Sonata in B minor for piano and violin, Op. and Brahms's Quartet in G minor, Op.

The People's Choral Union, under the direction of Frank Damrosch, will perform Haydn's "Creation" at the Hippodrome on Sunday night. There will be a chorus of 4,000 voices, assisted by Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mr. Daniel Beddoe, Mr. Frank Ormsbee, and the New York Symphony Orchestra.

"The White Hen" will be sung at the Casino to-night for the first time in this city. It was produced ten days ago out of town under the name of "The Girl from Vienna," but has since been materially changed and the cast strengthened. The book is by Mr. R. C. Penfield, and the music by Mr. Gustave Kerker. In the company are Messrs. Louis Mann, R. C. Herz, and Misses Louise Gunning, Lotta Faust, and Carrie Perkins.

N. Y. Times
Feb. 17-07

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on Jan. 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. It was composed in 1899, published in 1902, and first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on Nov. 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London under Henry J. Wood, Oct. 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maud Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last Spring, when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do among other things this second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly, and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another pianist, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

N. Y. Tribune
Feb. 17/07

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and was published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra, in Dresden on November 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London, under Henry J. Wood, on October 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maude Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last spring when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do, among other things, this symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it. It was not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the next matinee programme.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago, and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

N.Y. Mail
Feb. 16/07

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23, under Dr. Carl Muck's direction. These will bring—on Thursday night—a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and—on Saturday afternoon—Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which had its initial hearing in Carnegie hall three years ago, under the direction of the composer.

The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, and in Dresden and London in 1903.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was warmly discussed at its first performance. It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklarung" and parts of the "Zarashustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January, two years ago, and with the Philadelphia orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has been very successful. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's humorous "The Sorcerer's Appreatice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another admired pianist, who will play Brahms's E-flat major concerto.

Particular note should be taken on the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes and late-comers will not be seated during its

N. Y. Staats Zeitung
February 17-07

Die vierte Serie der Konzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters findet nächsten Donnerstag und Freitag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Das erste der erwähnten Konzerte bringt als Hauptnummer die erste Symphonie von Sibelius in E-moll, das zweite die "Sinfonia Domestica" von Ri[illegible]

Paper Journal
City Providence
Date FEB 1[illegible] State R I

DR. KARL MUCK'S VIEW OF SALOME.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Declares That the Opera Will Not Live.— Handel as a Musical Kleptomaniac.— Local Music Notes.

IN view of the stir created by the recent production of Richard Strauss's "Salome" at the Metropolitan Opera House, the verdict of a prominent conductor on that particular work, and on Strauss's compositions in general is not without interest. Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done as much as any living conductor to give the music of Strauss a chance to be heard by the people, and he is not at all afraid of the latest developments in the art, as illustrated by Strauss and his compeers.

The Boston conductor is conceded to be a man who can speak with authority. Recently he was induced to give his views for publication. "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure, all of them early works. They are 'Til Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklärung' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nëitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measure he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he [illegible] that case one can only regret [illegible] emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried [illegible]

Paper Herald
City New York Rochester
Date State N.Y
FEB 20 1907

The printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, are premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

***

[illegible] the opera of Henry Labouch[illegible]

N. Y. Globe
Feb. 16/07

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the programme will comprise Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, and Sibelius's first symphony (first time in New York). The soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff. On Saturday the programme will comprise Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's second piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitch.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C
[illegible] 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Olga Samaroff's Success in Tschaikowsky's Concerto.

The fourth of this season's series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was notable yesterday afternoon at the National Theater for the fact that every seat was occupied and many stood during the entire performance, for the brilliancy of the audience and for the excellence of the program presented. There were only three numbers offered, the first being a Scherzo, "The Socerer's Apprentice," a modern composition of the French school by Dukas, followed by Tschaikowsky's piano forte concerto in B flat minor, and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The Dukas work was the novelty, and it was the first of its school that has been heard here this season. It was played with that precision and effect that characterize all the work of this excellent orchestra.

The soloist was Mme. Olga Samaroff, who was heard here last season with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and she was greeted with hearty applause upon her entrance. The Tschaikowsky concerto for piano and orchestra, which she selected as her number yesterday, is the same one that the Russian composer was so mercilessly scored for by Rubinstein on its first hearing. Afterward he [illegible] this piano concerto [illegible] programs, but the name Rubinstein was erased from the dedication [illegible] von Bulow substituted.

It was skillfully played by Mme. Samaroff, all its technical difficulties being surmounted with apparent ease and grace. She was loudly applauded at the end of each movement and at the conclusion she was again and again recalled to bow her acknowledgments. Notwithstanding her name, Mme. Samaroff is not a Russian, but was born in Texas of German-Russian parents, but she has studied her art abroad. She has great temperament and plays with a feeling that imparts itself to her audience and makes them feel with her. She received splendid support from the orchestra.

The Beethoven Symphony with which the program ended was played with that skill and accuracy for which this orchestra is noted and was well applauded at its close.

[150]

Paper Press
City New York
Date State N.Y.

In view of Dr. Karl Muck's Boston performance of Richard Strauss' 'Sinfonia Domestica," it is interesting to know his views on Strauss' music in general, as recently given to a reporter on the Chicago Inter Ocean. The conversation began with "Salome."

"'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss' later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are: "Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklarung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra,' he begins nobly. In the first measures he builds a glorious tonal palace, but it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

N.Y. Mail

Feb. 16/07

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie hall on next Thursday evening, February 21, and Saturday afternoon, February 23, under Dr. Carl Muck's direction. These will bring—on Thursday night—a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first, in E minor, and—on Saturday afternoon—Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which had its initial hearing in Carnegie hall three years ago, under the direction of the composer.

The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, and in Dresden and London in 1903.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was warmly discussed at its first performance. It is interesting to note that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklarung" and parts of the "Zarashustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January, two years ago, and with the Philadelphia orchestra last season. Mme. Samaroff has been very successful. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's humorous "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another admired pianist, who will play Brahms's E-flat major concerto.

Particular note should be taken on the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes and latecomers will not be seated during its performance.

N. Y. Staats Zeitung

February 17-07

Die vierte Serie der Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet nächsten Donnerstag und Freitag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Das erste der erwähnten Konzerte bringt als Hauptnummer die erste Symphonie von Sibelius in E-moll, das zweite die „Sinfonia domestica" von Richard Strauß. Die Konzerte finden unter Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck statt. Als Solisten fungiren im ersten Konzert [illegible] im zweiten Herr

N. Y. Post

Feb. 16/07

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programme at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening includes the first symphony of Sibelius, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, and the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff). On Saturday afternoon Mr. Grabrilowitch will be the soloist (Brahms concerto), and the chief orchestral number the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Strauss. The Brooklyn programme of the Boston orchestra on Friday evening will include Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Betrothed of the Czar," the first Tchaikovsky concerto (Mme. Samaroff), and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Walter Damrosch will conduct the musical festival to be held in the spring at Louisville, Ky., Syracuse, N. Y., and Spartanburg, S. C. Mme. Sembrich will be the principal singer, and among the works to be performed will be Bach's cantata "Sleepers Wake," Verdi's "Requiem," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Delilah."

Mme. Sembrich will give a song recital at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn in the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, aided by the strings and wood winds of the Russian Symphony Society, on Thursday evening. She will be heard in songs of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Bizet, Arditi, and other composers.

On Thursday evening, at Mendelssohn Hall, will occur the third concert of the Adele Margulies Trio, with Sam Franko assisting. The programme will consist of Dvorák's Trio, Dumky, Op. 90; Rubinstein's Sonata in B minor for piano and violin, Op. and Brahms's Quartet in G minor, Op.

The People's Choral Union, under the direction of Frank Damrosch, will perform Haydn's "Creation" at the Hippodrome on Sunday night. There will be a chorus of 0 voices, assisted by Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mr. Daniel Beddoe, Mr. Frank Ixton, and the New York Symphony Orchestra.

"The White Hen" will be sung at the Casino to-night for the first time in this city. It was produced ten days ago out of town under the name of "The Girl from Vienna," but has since been materially changed and the cast strengthened. The book is by Mr. R. C. Penfield, and the music by Mr. Gustave Kerker. In the company are Messrs. Louis Mann, R. C. Herz, and Misses Louise Gunning, Lotta Faust, and Carrie Perkins.

Paper Journal
City Providence
Date FEB 1 State R I

DR. KARL MUCK'S VIEW OF SALOME

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Declares That the Opera Will Not Live.— Handel as a Musical Kleptomaniac.— Local Music Notes.

IN view of the stir created by the recent production of Richard Strauss's "Salome" at the Metropolitan Opera House, the verdict of a prominent conductor on that particular work, and on Strauss's compositions in general is not without interest. Dr. Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done as much as any living conductor to give the music of Strauss a chance to be heard by the people, and he is not at all afraid of the latest developments in the art, as illustrated by Strauss and his compeers.

The Boston conductor is conceded to be a man who can speak with authority. Recently he was induced to give his views for publication. "'Salome' is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction.

"Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure, all of them early works. They are 'Til Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklärung' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Neitzsche's philosophy, at least according to my views on that interesting subject, and his 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here at least one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed' and not worthy of the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measure he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

N. Y. Times

Feb. 17-07

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, and then under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on Jan. 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. It was composed in 1899, published in 1902, and first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on Nov. 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London under Henry J. Wood, Oct. 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maud Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last Spring, when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do among other things this second symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly, and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Duka's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another pianist, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N.Y
FEB 9 - 1907

The printed reports that Dr. Muck has been re-engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, are premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to Berlin by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German Emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately very doubtful that this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the very difficult task of replacing him next season.

***

"Truth," the organ of Henry Labouchere,

N. Y. Globe

Feb. 16/07

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts Thursday evening, Feb. 21, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the programme will comprise Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, and Sibelius's first symphony (first time in New York). The soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff. On Saturday the programme will comprise Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's second piano concerto, and Brahms's "Academic Overture." The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitch.

N. Y. Tribune

Feb. 17/07

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will bring on Thursday night a symphony new to New York, Sibelius's first in E minor, and on Saturday afternoon Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which has been played here but once, three years ago, under the direction of the composer. The Sibelius symphony had its first performances in America at the Boston concerts of the orchestra on January 4 and 5, and since then has been played by the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Few novelties of recent years have had such success in these cities. The symphony was composed in 1899 and was published in 1902. It was first performed in Berlin in July, 1900, at a concert of Finnish music, under the direction of the Finnish composer Kejanus. It was played by the Royal Orchestra in Dresden on November 17, 1903, and had its first performance in London, under Henry J. Wood, on October 13, 1903. Sibelius has been brought into prominence in New York this season by his new concerto for the violin which Maude Powell played at a recent Philharmonic concert.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" was so thoroughly discussed at the time of its first performance three years ago that no description of it is necessary. It is interesting to note, however, that Dr. Muck has confessed that he is not particularly sympathetic to Strauss's later orchestral works. He admires greatly the "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" and parts of the "Zarathustra," but most of the music in "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and the "Domestica" is alien to his taste. Last spring when he accepted the engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he told Mr. Ellis, the manager, that he would do, among other things, this symphony of Sibelius and the "Domestica," the first because he admired it greatly and the second because Boston had never heard it, and he regarded it as his duty to present a work of this magnitude and importance, even if he himself was not particularly sympathetic to it. It was not originally planned to do the "Domestica" in New York, but there seemed to be a very real demand for it, wherefore it has been placed on the next matinee programme.

The solo artist on Thursday night will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has been heard with orchestra in this city only at her own concert, when she began her professional career in January two years ago, and with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season. She will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. The first number on the programme will be Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The solo artist on Saturday afternoon will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Brahms's second concerto for the piano. The other number of the Saturday programme will be Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Particular note should be taken of the fact that on Saturday the "Domestica" will be first on the programme. This work lasts about fifty minutes, and late comers will not be seated during its performance, which is without pause. Therefore, the patrons of the concert are urged to be in their seats promptly.

Paper Star
City Washington
Date State D C

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Olga Samaroff's Success in Tschaikowsky's Concerto.

The fourth of this season's series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was notable yesterday afternoon at the National Theater for the fact that every seat was occupied and many stood during the entire performance, for the brilliancy of the audience and for the excellence of the program presented. There were only three numbers offered, the first being a Scherzo, "The Socerer's Apprentice," a modern composition of the French school by Dukas, followed by Tschaikowsky's piano forte concerto in B flat minor, and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The Dukas work was the novelty, and it was the first of its school that has been heard here this season. It was played with that precision and effect that characterize all the work of this excellent orchestra.

The soloist was Mme. Olga Samaroff, who was heard here last season with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and she was greeted with hearty applause upon her entrance. The Tschaikowsky concerto for piano and orchestra, which she selected as her number yesterday, is the same one that the Russian composer was so mercilessly scored for by Rubinstein on its first hearing. Afterward he wrote [illegible] it the place of honor on his programs, but the name Rubinstein was erased from the dedication and that of Hans von Bulow substituted.

It was skillfully played by Mme. Samaroff, all its technical difficulties being surmounted with apparent ease and grace. She was loudly applauded at the end of each movement and at the conclusion she was again and again recalled to bow her acknowledgments. Notwithstanding her name, Mme. Samaroff is not a Russian, but was born in Texas of German-Russian parents, but she has studied her art abroad. She has great temperament and plays with a feeling that imparts itself to her audience and makes them feel with her. She received splendid support from the orchestra.

The Beethoven Symphony with which the program ended was played with that skill and accuracy for which this orchestra is noted and was well applauded at its close.

[150]

THE SUN.
FEBRUARY 22, 19

BOSTONIAN ORCHESTR

MUSIC FROM FINLAND PROVES PLEASING.

The E Minor Symphony of Jean Sibelius Heard—A Composer Not Afraid to Write Good Tunes—Mme. Olga Samaroff and Tschaikowsky's B Flat Concerto.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Paul Dukas's delightful humoresque, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Tschaikowsky's much performed B flat concerto for piano and orchestra, with Olga Samaroff as the soloist, and Jean Sibelius's first symphony. It was one of those concerts which give much joy to the lover of good music and send the typical concert goer home wondering whether he ought to like it or not.

Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, is not an old acquaintance of local music lovers, and they are not quite sure yet whether he is to be approved or condemned. His "Lemmenkainen Journeys Homeward" was made known to us by the Philharmonic Society so lately as February, 1902, and that was the beginning of our knowledge of his art. His first symphony, which is in the popular key of E minor, though composed in 1899, was unfamiliar. It will probably not remain unfamiliar, for it ought to be repeated.

Possibly sticklers for the conventional disposition of themes in the first movement and the inevitable repeat of the exposition part will hold that this composition is not a symphony at all, but just an orchestral color piece. The truth is, however, that while the antique pattern is ignored, the established fundamentals of symphonic form are not. The first movement sets forth its leading themes together with some subsidiary matter in perfect clearness, and while the development begins after the manner of many moderns as soon as the topics are announced, it is none the less a discussion of the themes along lines laid down by the fathers.

Sibelius's respectability being thus demonstrated he may claim our calm consideration, for he has music in his blood and he is not afraid to publish it. He sings in a broad, virile, fresh aired style that is altogether invigorating. The music of this symphony is not the product of profound scholarship and the midnight oil, but of the winds and waves of the writer's native land. It was conceived in the sunlight and born under the open sky.

It is musical music, not pedagogic demonstrations of contrapuntal theorems based on the contemporaneous axiom that all chords which are ugly are good for the soul. Human beings can listen to this sort of symphonic composition and be glad that they do not have to wag their ears and assume a demeanor of owlish wisdom.

The melodies, born of the soil and nursed of the people, are frank and unaffected. The rhythms are clean and piquant. The harmonies are rich and sufficiently intricate. The instrumental color is solid and varied.

The principal theme of the first movement is one of great pregnancy and the entire movement is eloquent. But the ideas of the last movement are quite bewildering till they gradually marshal themselves to orderly array and sing out their summary in a most satisfying finish. The elegiac slow movement is captivating, while the scherzo is a piece of invigorating originality. The symphony was exquisitely played and it takes a deal of playing, too, as the English say. It bristles with instrumental difficulties, and a rude performance would rob it of half its charm. It lost nothing last night in the hands of Dr. Muck and his men.

Mme. Samaroff has improved vastly since this public first heard her in a misguided concert in Carnegie Hall. She is now accepted as one of the interesting players of this country. Her performance of the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto last night was distinguished by great beauty of tone, delicate and judiciously graded nuancing, exquisite daintiness of enunciation in the florid passages, and poetic treatment of the cantilena.

She fell short of the highest accomplishment by reason of her want of the power to impart the necessary splendor, the bolder proclamations of the composer. She was conversant with all that was elegantly little, but not with all that was awfully vast. To point out such a shortcoming in the face of an interpretation so lovely in most of its aspects may seem ungracious, but after all Tschaikowsky makes some rather heavy demands in this concerto.

Paper Press
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State NY

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Sibelius Symphony by Boston Men.

After a longer absence than had been agreeable to their New York friends, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to town last night with a programme full of music that interested, moved and delighted. They also brought Mme. Olga Samaroff (an American despite her name, and a charming one, too), whose hands had not graced a piano this season in New York. Carnegie Hall was crowded. Enthusiasm did not run riot. Boston Symphony audiences are too well mannered and well dressed to let their feelings and clothes be ruffled by strenuous demonstrations of approval. But it was evident the listeners were keenly appreciative of the good things offered and the perfection in which they had been prepared.

The programme comprised Dukas's now familiar scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor, opus 23, and the symphony No. 1, in E minor, by the Finnish composer Sibelius. Naturally much interest was felt in the symphony, for Sibelius's music is comparatively unfamiliar in New York, and this particular work never had been heard here before. But Dukas's clever and effective composition pleased anew, particularly as it was given with that blending of fine musicianship, emotional fervor, poetic insight and technical proficiency which characterize the performances of the Boston musicians since Dr. Muck has taken them in hand.

Not so satisfying was the Tschaikowsky concerto, which has been dished up to New York audiences altogether too frequently this season. True, it served as a suitable vehicle for displaying Mme. Samaroff's beautiful technique to advantage—a technique that in litheness, pliancy and grace, as well as energy, endurance and zest, hardly is surpassed among women pianists. But the pianist failed to convey the emotional meaning. Perhaps she felt the composer's sentiment as he felt it, but chose to hold herself in check, to suppress any tendency toward tenderness and pathos.

It is difficult to form an opinion of so peculiar a composition as Sibelius's symphony at first hearing, particularly when the aid of written notes has to be foregone. Local purveyors of music somehow had not taken pains to have the orchestral score in stock, nor was any piano arrangement available. However, one can say with little hesitation that the symphony has musical ideas of vital strength and individuality and was written under inspiration.

There is atmosphere, there is heart-pulse, there is life in this music. The melancholy of the Finnish race broods over it. The melodic ideas are expressive, characteristic, national in their suggestion. A Russian infusion is apparent. One is reminded of Tschaikowsky, for instance, in the almost sentimental opening theme of the Andante. One may find suggestions of other composers, including Liszt and the inevitable Wagner. But not one passage was heard which one could assert was imitative. The tempestuous finale, a finely robust piece of work, left the most decided impression. The Scherzo, too, delighted.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night afforded at once novelty and satisfy in its short, though varied programme. From desolate Finland came quite the best new symphony that has been played here in many a musical day, that No. 1 in E minor by Sibelius, a work of remarkable charm by reason of its native freshness. In it the characteristic marked rhythm and weird melody of the Northern folk songs were more than hinted at. The descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," should serve to set some American composers to writing a similar work based on the witchcraft legends of our own literature. Would a "Sleepy Hollow" set to music be any less suggestive than this Frenchman's humoresque? Long since have this year's local concertgoers had enough of Tchaikowsky's first piano forte concerto, which Mme. Samaroff played with orchestra last night. The formality of the applause which followed the number conveyed its own message to programme makers, but was no reflection on the pianist, for she played the concerto interestingly and well.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra go to Brooklyn to-night to play the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," preceded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar," and again Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 for Mme. Samaroff.

Early matinée-goers to-morrow at Carnegie Hall will hear the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss. As it leads the bill and is fifty minutes long, those who don't arrive promptly at 2:30 o'clock will hear it standing. The later numbers are Brahms's "Academic Overture" and the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 for Gabrilowitsch.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State NY

NEW SYMPHONY BY A FINLANDER

Boston Orchestra Brings Out a Striking Work by Sibelius—Tschaikowsky Played by Mme. Samaroff.

A new symphony, composed as absolute music, music not based on a story or programme, is rare enough nowadays, and when it is as sincere and eloquent as that of Jean Sibelius in E minor, which the Boston Symphony orchestra made known last night at Carnegie hall, it is doubly welcome.

It is strange that this symphony has had to wait, even for the five years since it was published and the eight since it was written, for a New York performance—strange, because conductors have sought diligently to bring out the music of this gifted Finlander, in the past few seasons, and several of his less important works have been given, while this of real magnitude has been overlooked. Sibelius is something more than the native voice of Finland, schooled to symphonic expression. He is a composer of positive creative force and personality, a thinker in terms of music that is intensely national, but also infused with the spirit of the universal.

Folk tunes, those musical epitomes of the life of any race, have helped to give form to some of Sibelius's themes in this symphony, especially to the lovely melody of its second movement, but the ideas themselves are said by the composer to be entirely his own; he has followed with the songs of his own people the example of Dvorak (in the "New World" symphony) with American negro tunes.

But matters like these sound academic when one hears the symphony itself. The deep impression Sibelius's work made last evening was due to its undoubted sincerity. Music like this comes straight from the heart. It is self-expression, in the best sense.

A fine audience listened with close attention to this new symphony and applauded it heartily, the tribute being obviously meant for the music itself as well as for the spirited and sympathetic performance of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston orchestra.

There were other occasions for enthusiasm. The delightfully humorous orchestral scherzo of Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which Mr. Gericke had introduced here, was played with gusto and brilliancy, and the Tschaikowsky piano concerto, with Mme. Olga Samaroff as soloist, was set forth with splendid power and fine distinction by both pianist and orchestra.

Mme. Samaroff, who is a young American woman of Russian and German ancestry, made a favorable impression here two years ago at her orchestral concert debut, and a much less fortunate appearance in recital soon afterward. Last evening she reinforced the good opinions formed at her debut. Her strength of arm and finger, her power of attaining extreme delicacy as well as a fine sonority, were employed in furtherance of the music's true interpretation. She made the piano sing, and sing intelligently.

At Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony programme the first number will be Richard Strauss's much discussed and very long "Sinfonia Domestica."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N. Y.

SIBELIUS the Finn is rare among the moderns. He is not afraid to write a tune, and a good one. In his E minor symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced to New York at Carnegie Hall last night, there is a wealth of fluent and expressive melody. It is not exactly ear-tickling melody—Sibelius writes music of the north, music which tells of a grim and storm-swept land—but it holds the attention and haunts the memory. The symphony was superbly played.

The concert opened with Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which is becoming a stock piece with the band from Boston. Between it and the symphony Mme Samaroff played Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto. This concerto is allowed no rest at all this season. Mr. Lhévinne, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Charles Anthony, and now Mme Samaroff have exploited its treasures. Mme Samaroff played the second movement exquisitely, and throughout she played with spirit and verve. At times she lacked [illegible] but [illegible] the [illegible]

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State NY

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MODERN WORKS

Sibelius and Dukas Represented on the Programme Last Evening.

MME. SAMAROFF PLAYS

Dr. Muck Shows Enthusiasm in His Interpretation of the Symphonies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now making its fifth visit to New York, and its first concert was given in Carnegie Hall last evening. Dr. Muck, as if in answer to some criticisms that the conservative character of his first programmes in this country called forth, is turning largely in these concerts to modern works by contemporary composers. In last evening's programme he had two of these—Paul Dukas's brilliant and amusing "Scherzo," as it is called, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the first symphony of the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. The former had been played here by M. d'Indy last season, when he came to spread a knowledge of the modern French music, and by Mr. Gericke before that; the symphony was heard for the first time. Between them came Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto that had already been played twice here this season, and was this time played by Mme. Olga Samaroff.

Sibelius's symphony is one of the most interesting and impressive orchestral works performed here for some time. The composer's ideas are independent and original, his appreciation of orchestral values sound. Although he has been chiefly represented on New York programmes so far by works of a distinctly "programmatic" class this symphony has no suggestion in it of anything but absolute music, the expression of a musical temperament native to the work and affected by the gloom and melancholy of northern forests and northern desolation. However Sibelius's melodic invention may be influenced by the character of the Finnish folk song it is evident that he has not attempted to make this symphony an embodiment specifically of that folk song or of a national spirit; the nearest approach to it is in the andante.

His thematic invention is robust and free, and he has in his first movement two themes of strong and plastic outline, the first of which reappears later in the finale. He works freely within the symphonic form, and has not closely fettered himself with it. Thus his last movement is marked "like a fantasia," and in it he has, after the fashion of modern symphonists since Schumann's time, introduced themes from previous movements. The prevailing mood of this music is one of gloom, of lamentation, except in the somewhat bizarre and fantastical allegro, the third movement. The music is written with a strong imaginative flow, and the composer has treated his themes with skill and with a sense of spaciousness, of large proportions, and of rich expression. In short, while this symphony may not be one of profoundest depth or of lasting power, it is music that is good to listen to, and that strongly engages the listener's sympathies.

It was played with enthusiasm and with a clear understanding of its spirit on Dr. Muck's part, and it was evidently appreciated by the audience. The humorous and picturesque qualities of Dukas's scherzo were likewise brought strongly to the fore. But did the orchestra in this, or in the Symphony, play with all the perfection and finish of style to which in years past it [illegible] accustomed us?

Mme. Samaroff's interpretation of Tschaikowsky's concerto was brilliant and fluent rather than powerful or grandoise in conception. She seemed in certain passages not to have quite the physical power necessary; not all the warmth and poignancy of expression; nor was there the overpowering sweep of the first movement. But Mme. Samaroff has means for interpreting many of the finer and subtler moments of the beautiful and poetical work; and in clarity, rhythmic pulse, and tonal beauty there was much to admire in her playing. The audience gave full expression to its admiration.

N. Y. Herald,
Feb. 22-07

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Few recent symphonic novelties have seemed so clearly stamped with the hall marks of genius as the symphony of Jean Sibelius, a Finnish composer, which Dr. Karl Muck made known in Carnegie Hall last night as the important feature of the Boston Orchestra's fourth concert. The work not only won critical approval but stirred popular interest, and its splendid interpretation won hearty applause, a tribute at once to the composer and the conductor.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, as the soloist of the occasion, reappeared for the first time this season, and by a remarkably brilliant performance of the familiar B flat minor concerto of Tschaikowsky gave evidences of decided artistic growth. Duka's impressionistic scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," opened the programme and ushered in an evening of enjoyment.

---

[151]

THE SUN.
FEBRUARY 22, 19

THE BOSTONIAN ORCHESTR.

MUSIC FROM FINLAND PROVES PLEASING.

The E Minor Symphony of Jean Sibelius Heard—A Composer Not Afraid to Write Good Tunes—Mme. Olga Samaroff and Tschaikowsky's B Flat Concerto.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Paul Dukas's delightful humoresque, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Tschaikowsky's much performed B flat concerto for piano and orchestra, with Olga Samaroff as the soloist, and Jean Sibelius's first symphony. It was one of those concerts which give much joy to the lover of good music and send the typical concert goer home wondering whether he ought to like it or not.

Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, is not an old acquaintance of local music lovers, and they are not quite sure yet whether he is to be approved or condemned. His "Lemmenkainen Journeys Homeward" was made known to us by the Philharmonic Society so lately as February, 1902, and that was the beginning of our knowledge of his art. His first symphony, which is in the popular key of E minor, though composed in 1899, was unfamiliar. It will probably not remain unfamiliar, for it ought to be repeated.

Possibly sticklers for the conventional disposition of themes in the first movement and the inevitable repeat of the exposition part will hold that this composition is not a symphony at all, but just an orchestral color piece. The truth is, however, that while the antique pattern is ignored, the established fundamentals of symphonic form are not. The first movement sets forth its leading themes together with some subsidiary matter in perfect clearness, and while the development begins after the manner of many moderns as soon as the topics are announced, it is none the less a discussion of the themes along lines laid down by the fathers.

Sibelius's respectability being thus demonstrated he may claim our calm consideration, for he has music in his blood and he is not afraid to publish it. He sings in a broad, virile, fresh aired style that is altogether invigorating. The music of this symphony is not the product of profound scholarship and the midnight oil, but of the winds and waves of the writer's native land. It was conceived in the sunlight and born under the open sky.

It is musical music, not pedagogic demonstrations of contrapuntal theorems based on the contemporaneous axiom that all chords which are ugly are good for the soul. Human beings can listen to this sort of symphonic composition and be glad that they do not have to wag their ears and assume a demeanor of owlish wisdom.

The melodies, born of the soil and nursed of the people, are frank and unaffected. The rhythms are clean and piquant. The harmonies are rich and sufficiently intricate. The instrumental color is solid and varied.

The principal theme of the first movement is one of great pregnancy and the entire movement is eloquent. But the riches of the last movement are quite bewildering till they gradually marshal themselves to orderly array and sing out their summary in a most satisfying finish.

The elegiac slow movement is captivating, while the scherzo is a piece of invigorating originality. The symphony was exquisitely played and it takes a deal of playing, too, as the English say. It bristles with instrumental difficulties, and a rude performance would rob it of half its charm. It lost nothing last night in the hands of Dr. Muck and his men.

Mme. Samaroff has improved vastly since this public first heard her in a misguided concert in Carnegie Hall. She is now accepted as one of the interesting players of this country. Her performance of the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto last night was distinguished by grea beauty of tone, delicate and judiciously graded nuancing, exquisite daintiness of enunciation in the florid passages, and poetic treatment of the cantilena.

She fell short of the highest accomplishment by reason of her want of the power to impart the necessary splendor, the bolder proclamations of the composer. She was conversant with all that was elegantly little, but not with all that was awfully vast. To point out such a shortcoming in the face of an interpretation so lovely in most of its aspects may seem ungracious, but after all Tschaikowsky makes some rather heavy demands in this concerto.

Paper World
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Sibelius Symphony by Boston Men.

After a longer absence than had been agreeable to their New York friends, Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to town last night with a programme full of music that interested, moved and delighted. They also brought Mme. Olga Samaroff (an American despite her name, and a charming one, too), whose hands had not graced a piano this season in New York. Carnegie Hall was crowded. Enthusiasm did not run riot. Boston Symphony audiences are too well mannered and well dressed to let their feelings and clothes be ruffled by strenuous demonstrations of approval. But it was evident the listeners were keenly appreciative of the good things offered and the perfection in which they had been prepared.

The programme comprised Dukas's now familiar scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor, opus 23, and the symphony No. 1, in E minor, by the Finnish composer Sibelius. Naturally much interest was felt in the symphony, for Sibelius's music is comparatively unfamiliar in New York, and this particular work never had been heard here before. But Dukas's clever and effective composition pleased anew, particularly as it was given with that blending of fine musicianship, emotional fervor, poetic insight and technical proficiency which characterize the performances of the Boston musicians since Dr. Muck has taken them in hand.

Not so satisfying was the Tschaikowsky concerto, which has been dished up to New York audiences altogether too frequently this season. True, it served as a suitable vehicle for displaying Mme. Samaroff's beautiful technique to advantage—a technique that in litheness, pliancy and grace, as well as energy, endurance and zest, hardly is surpassed among women pianists. But the pianist failed to convey the emotional meaning. Perhaps she felt the composer's sentiment as he felt it, but chose to hold herself in check, to suppress any tendency toward tenderness and pathos.

It is difficult to form an opinion of so peculiar a composition as Sibelius's symphony at first hearing, particularly when the aid of written notes has to be foregone. Local purveyors of music somehow had not taken pains to have the orchestral score in stock, nor was any piano arrangement available. However, one can say with little hesitation that the symphony has musical ideas of vital strength and individuality and was written under inspiration.

There is atmosphere, there is heart-pulse, there is life in this music. The melancholy of the Finnish race broods over it. The melodic ideas are expressive, characteristic, national in their suggestion. A Russian infusion is apparent. One is reminded of Tschaikowsky, for instance, in the almost sentimental opening theme of the Andante. One may find suggestions of other composers, including Liszt and the inevitable Wagner. But not one passage was heard which one could assert was imitative. The tempestuous finale, a finely robust piece of work, left the most decided impression. The Scherzo, too, delighted.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB [illegible] 07 State N Y

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night afforded at once novelty and satiety in its short, though varied programme. From desolate Finland came quite the best new symphony that has been played here in many a musical day, that No. 1 in E minor by Sibelius, a work of remarkable charm by reason of its native freshness. In it the characteristic marked rhythm and weird melody of the Northern folk songs were more than hinted at. The descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," should serve to set some American composers to writing a similar work based on the witchcraft legends of our own literature. Would a "Sleepy Hollow" set to music be any less suggestive than this Frenchman's humoresque? Long since have this year's local concertgoers had enough of Tchaikowsky's first piano forte concerto, which Mme. Samaroff played with orchestra last night. The formality of the applause which followed the number conveyed its own message to programme makers, but was no reflection on the pianist, for she played the concerto interestingly and well.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra go to Brooklyn to-night to play the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," preceded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar," and again Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 for Mme. Samaroff.

Early matinée-goers to-morrow at Carnegie Hall will hear the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss. As it leads the bill and is fifty minutes long, those who don't arrive promptly at 2:30 o'clock will hear it standing. The later numbers are Brahms's "Academic Overture" and the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 for Gabrilowitsch.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

NEW SYMPHONY BY A FINLANDER

Boston Orchestra Brings Out a Striking Work by Sibelius—Tschaikowsky Played by Mme. Samaroff.

A new symphony, composed as absolute music, music not based on a story or programme, is rare enough nowadays, and when it is as sincere and eloquent as that of Jean Sibelius in E minor, which the Boston Symphony orchestra made known last night at Carnegie hall, it is doubly welcome.

It is strange that this symphony has had to wait, even for the five years since it was published and the eight since it was written, for a New York performance—strange, because conductors have sought diligently to bring out the music of this gifted Finlander, in the past few seasons, and several of his less important works have been given, while this of real magnitude has been overlooked. Sibelius is something more than the native voice of Finland, schooled to symphonic expression. He is a composer of positive creative force and personality, a thinker in terms of music that is intensely national, but also infused with the spirit of the universal.

Folk tunes, those musical epitomes of the life of any race, have helped to give form to some of Sibelius's themes in this symphony, especially to the lovely melody of its second movement, but the ideas themselves are said by the composer to be entirely his own; he has followed with the songs of his own people the example of Dvorak (in the "New World" symphony) with American negro tunes.

But matters like these sound academic when one hears the symphony itself. The deep impression Sibelius's work made last evening was due to its undoubted sincerity. Music like this comes straight from the heart. It is self-expression, in the best sense.

A fine audience listened with close attention to this new symphony and applauded it heartily, the tribute being obviously meant for the music itself as well as for the spirited and sympathetic performance of Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston orchestra.

There were other occasions for enthusiasm. The delightfully humorous orchestral scherzo of Paul Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which Mr. Gericke had introduced here, was played with gusto and brilliancy, and the Tschaikowsky piano concerto, with Mme. Olga Samaroff as soloist, was set forth with splendid power and fine distinction by both pianist and orchestra.

Mme. Samaroff, who is a young American woman of Russian and German ancestry, made a favorable impression here two years ago at her orchestral concert debut, and a much less fortunate appearance in recital soon afterward. Last evening she reinforced the good opinions formed at her debut. Her strength of arm and finger, her power of attaining extreme delicacy as well as a fine sonority, were employed in furtherance of the music's true interpretation. She made the piano sing, and sing intelligently.

At Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony programme the first number will be Richard Strauss's much discussed and very long "Sinfonia Domestica."

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N. Y.

SIBELIUS the Finn is rare among the moderns. He is not afraid to write a tune, and a good one. In his E minor symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced to New York at Carnegie Hall last night, there is a wealth of fluent and expressive melody. It is not exactly ear-tickling melody—Sibelius writes music of the north, music which tells of a grim and storm-swept land—but it holds the attention and haunts the memory. The symphony was superbly played.

The concert opened with Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which is becoming a stock piece with the band from Boston. Between it and the symphony Mme Samaroff played Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto. This concerto is allowed no rest at all this season. Mr. Lhévinne, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Charles Anthony, and now Mme Samaroff have exploited its treasures. Mme Samaroff played the second movement exquisitely, and throughout she played with spirit and verve. At times she lacked something of commanding power, but in the introduction she caught well the [illegible]

[151]

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MODERN WORKS

Sibelius and Dukas Represented on the Programme Last Evening.

MME. SAMAROFF PLAYS

Dr. Muck Shows Enthusiasm in His Interpretation of the Symphonies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now making its fifth visit to New York, and its first concert was given in Carnegie Hall last evening. Dr. Muck, as if in answer to some criticisms that the conservative character of his first programmes in this country called forth, is turning largely in these concerts to modern works by contemporary composers. In last evening's programme he had two of these—Paul Dukas's brilliant and amusing "Scherzo," as it is called, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the first symphony of the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. The former had been played here by M. d'Indy last season, when he came to spread a knowledge of the modern French music, and by Mr. Gericke before that; the symphony was heard for the first time. Between them came Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto that had already been played twice here this season, and was this time played by Mme. Olga Samaroff.

Sibelius's symphony is one of the most interesting and impressive orchestral works performed here for some time. The composer's ideas are independent and original, his appreciation of orchestral values sound. Although he has been chiefly represented on New York programmes so far by works of a distinctly "programmatic" class this symphony has no suggestion in it of anything but absolute music, the expression of a musical temperament native to the work and affected by the gloom and melancholy of northern forests and northern desolation. However Sibelius's melodic invention may be influenced by the character of the Finnish folk song it is evident that he has not attempted to make this symphony an embodiment specifically of that folk song or of a national spirit; the nearest approach to it is in the andante.

His thematic invention is robust and free, and he has in his first movement two themes of strong and plastic outline, the first of which reappears later in the finale. He works freely within the symphonic form, and has not closely fettered himself with it. Thus his last movement is marked "like a fantasia," and in it he has, after the fashion of modern symphonists since Schumann's time, introduced themes from previous movements. The prevailing mood of this music is one of gloom, of lamentation, except in the somewhat bizarre and fantastical allegro, the third movement. The music is written with a strong imaginative flow, and the composer has treated his themes with skill and with a sense of spaciousness, of large proportions, and of rich expression. In short, while this symphony may not be one of profoundest depth or of lasting power, it is music that is good to listen to, and that strongly engages the listener's sympathies.

It was played with enthusiasm and with a clear understanding of its spirit on Dr. Muck's part, and it was evidently appreciated by the audience. The humorous and picturesque qualities of Dukas's scherzo were likewise brought strongly to the fore. But did the orchestra in this, or in the symphony, play with all the perfection and finish of style to which in years past it has accustomed us?

Mme. Samaroff's interpretation of Tschaikowsky's concerto was brilliant and fluent rather than powerful or grandoise in conception. She seemed in certain passages not to have quite the physical power necessary; not all the warmth and poignancy of expression; nor was there the overpowering sweep of the first movement. But Mme. Samaroff has means for interpreting many of the finer and subtler moments of the beautiful and poetical work; and in clarity, rhythmic pulse, and tonal beauty there was much to admire in her playing. The audience gave full expression to its admiration.

N. Y. Herald,
Feb. 22—07

Boston Orchestra Concert.

Few recent symphonic novelties have seemed so clearly stamped with the hall marks of genius as the symphony by Jean Sibelius, a Finnish composer, which Dr. Karl Muck made known in Carnegie Hall last night as the important feature of the Boston Orchestra's fourth concert. The work not only won critical approval but stirred popular interest, and its splendid interpretation won hearty applause, a tribute at once to the composer and the conductor [illegible]

Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste, as the soloist of the occasion, reappeared for the first time this season, and by a remarkably brilliant performance of the familiar B flat minor concerto of Tschaikowsky gave evidences of decided artistic growth. Duka's impressionistic scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," opened the programme and ushered in an evening of enjoyment.

Staats Zeitung,
Feb. 22-07

...e stets willkommenen symphonischen Gäste aus Boston, diese musikalischen Freudenspender par excellence, sind wieder da. Auch gestern Abend ergossen sich die Massen in den weiten Raum von Carnegie Hall, welcher in allen seinen Theilen dicht gefüllt war.

„Der Zauberlehrling" (nach der bekannten Goethe'schen Ballade) von Paul Dukas, eröffnete das Concert. Dieser neufranzösische „Zauberlehrling" ist ein überaus geistreich und virtuos gearbeiteter musikalischer Scherz, ein Werk, das wir zu den gelungensten und erfreulichsten Erzeugnissen der neufranzösischen Schule rechnen.

Man kennt den Lehrstoff des „alten Hexenmeisters", der „die Geister, die er rief, nicht mehr los wurde", bis der Meister sie durch sein Machtwort zum Stillstand brachte. Als echter Gallier faßt Dukas sein Subjekt von der witzigen Seite auf. Ein drolliges, breitaktig rhythmisirtes Fagott-Thema mit grotestem Terzenintervall durchzieht das ganze Werk, das durch barocke Klangkombinationen glänzt, allerdings auch Dissonanzen enthält, welche jedoch meist in der Situation begründet sind. Wasser bricht von allen Seiten hervor, aus allen Instrumenten wogt und gurgelt es, das ganze Orchester ist zu einer Art musikalischer Fontaine geworden. Die Instrumentation erweist die raffinirteste Technik, und die Kürze des Scherzes ist ein Reiz mehr. Dr. Muck dirigirte das Stück mit der ihm eigenen liebevollen Sorgfalt und Genauigkeit, die er allen seinen Darbietungen entgegenbringt, und die Bostoner spielten es mit jener unnachahmlichen Bravour und Delikatesse, welche wir an ihnen nicht hoch genug schätzen können.

Ein ganz gewaltiger Erfolg war hierauf der bekannten Pianistin Frau Olga Samaroff in Tschaikowsky's 1. Klavier-Concert op. 23 beschieden, einer Leistung, zu deren Preis man tief in die Saiten greifen mag. Das effektvolle Werk krankt an zwei Uebelständen, der gewöhnlich wenig noblen Erfindung und der übermäßig schwerfälligen Behandlung des Klavierparts, namentlich im ersten Satz. Die interessante Künstlerin meisterte dieses an die physische Ausdauer und Technik die größten Anforderungen stellende Concert in bewunderungswürdiger Weise, und bei allem Nachdruck und Kraftgefühl wohnte ihrer Leistung doch stets eine gewisse weibliche Grazie inne.

Die wirkungsvollen Doppelgriffe und Ottavengänge des ersten Satzes gestaltete sie mit Kraft und Brillanz und beseelte sie zugleich durch selbständig erdachte, überaus reizvolle Anschlagsschattirungen. In den lieblichen Klavierpassagen des zweiten Satzes, welche uns das banale Walzerthema verzeihen lassen müssen, entfaltete sie Poesie und köstlich sangbare Eigenschaften der Tongebung, und das feurige Finale mit dem deutlich ausgesprochenen slavischen Grundcharakter führte sie ausnehmend temperamentvoll und eindringlich durch. Ganz besonders hervorragend ist ihre rythmische Energie. Sie wurde nach jedem Satz enthusiastisch gefeiert und zum Schluß achtmal gerufen. Eine erfreuliche Künstlerin!

Die letzte Programmnummer, die selten gehörte 1. Symphonie von Jean Sibelius in E-Moll, brachte uns einen wahren Genuß, den wir zum großen Theil auch dem Dirigenten schulden. Sibelius erweist sich in diesem Werk als gedankentiefer Symphoniker mit überaus prägnanter Themengestaltung. Der erste Satz des durchaus bedeutenden Werks, dessen Instrumentation eine virtuose ist, beginnt mit einer kurzen Einleitung, welche jedoch erst im Finale zur Geltung gelangt. Dem ersten Satz liegt offenbar wilde Kraft und trotziges Ringen zu Grunde. In dem langsamen zweiten Satz, der aus einem marschartigen Thema entspringt, entwickelt der Komponist bedeutende Kunst der Kontrapunktik. Der dritte Satz ist ein lebhaft rythmisirtes Scherzo von erlesener melodischer Delikatesse, das großangelegte Finale beginnt keck und wagehalsig, um später einer berauschend sehnsüchtig klingenden, breiten Phrase der Streicher Platz zu machen. Das Werk klingt in eine imponirende Steigerung aus.

Dr. Muck brachte das Werk mit seiner bescheidenen Unterordnung zu Gehör, die doch so viel Raum für das Geniale und Eigenartige läßt. Vom Orchester kann man nur sagen, daß es auf seiner gewohnten Höhe stand. Das sagt Alles.

H.

N. Y. Tribune,
Feb. 22/07

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The need of a musical clearing house was suggested again at the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Why were local concertgoers obliged to hear Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto again? Was it the fifth or the fifteenth time that it was played in public this season? It is too great a weariness to count up the performances. Is there nothing else attractive in this field? Lhévinne twice, Gabrilowitsch twice, Anthony once and now Madame Samaroff. Is it not enough that the composers impress upon us that this is the age of mere virtuosity and that therefore invention is dead except in the department of technique? Must the virtuosi also force upon our notice that they are specializing on a few things that happen just now to be in harmony with popular taste? It was interesting to hear Madame Samaroff [illegible] seems to be a Russian theatre name [illegible] to be in tune with the time) play the concerto simply because she was in such delightful rhythmical sympathy with Dr. Muck and his men, and because, between them, they gave the music such splendid propulsive force; but the fact that the audience has grown weary of the work seemed indicated by the comparative indifference with which it was received. "Thank you for a very admirable but too familiar something"—that seemed to be the sense of the handclappings which called the artists back to the stage after the performance. Under other circumstances so excellent a performance in respect of collaboration, at least, ought to have invoked much greater enthusiasm, for it deserved it.

Dr. Muck had but three numbers on his programme—the descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which Mr. Gericke made much of; the pianoforte concerto by Tschaikowsky and a symphony in E minor by Sibelius. The ingenious bit of musical humor by Dukas ought to have given a hint to American composers long ago; they have a companion subject, but are far more suggestive in the old tale by Hawthorne from the days of witchcraft—"Dickon, another coal for my pipe!" Sibelius's symphony was a delightful offering to the believers in music qua music. Is the old form dead? Is nothing more to be done with mere melody and expressive harmony? Sibelius seems only to have reached into the air of his native Finland and gathered musical material which fascinates by its own power with a fascination to which it is a happiness to yield. It scarcely needs to be said that all the music was brilliantly played.

H. E. K.

N. Y. Ev. Sun
Feb. 22/07

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night afforded at once novelty and satiety in its short, though varied programme. From desolate Finland came quite the best new symphony that has been played here in many a musical day, that No. 1 in E minor by Sibelius, a work of remarkable charm by reason of its native freshness. In it the characteristic marked rhythm and weird melody of the Northern folk songs were more than hinted at. The descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," should serve to set some American composers to writing a similar work based on the witchcraft legends of our own literature. Would a "Sleepy Hollow" set to music be any less suggestive than this Frenchman's humoresque? Long since have this year's local concertgoers had enough of Tchaikowsky's first piano forte concerto, which Mme. Samaroff played with orchestra last night. The formality of the applause which followed the number conveyed its own message to programme makers, but was no reflection on the pianist, for she played the concerto interestingly and well.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra go to Brooklyn to-night to play the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," preceded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar," and again Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 for Mme. Samaroff.

Early matinée-goers to-morrow at Carnegie Hall will hear the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss. As it leads the bill and is fifty minutes long, those who don't arrive promptly at 2:30 o'clock will hear it standing. The later numbers are Brahms's "Academic Overture" and the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 for Gabrilowitsch.

New York World
Feb. 22/07

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last night in Carnegie Hall to an audience that filled the hall. Again was this virtuosi orchestra heard at its best. Such playing is all too rare and too seldom heard, and there are on this hemisphere far too few conductors of the artistic stature of Dr. Karl Muck. He was master again last night and his men played as though they respected him first and loved him always. It was another remarkable exhibition of the finished possibilities of orchestral playing and of the mastery of conduc-

THE SYMPHONY QUA...

Mr. Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has been compelled to make a change in the announced program for the fifth concert of the quartet, which will be given in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The original announcement contained a quartet by Jaques Dalcreze, a sonata for piano and violin by Gabriel Faure and a quartet by Debussy, with Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the assisting artist. Owing to the large number of rehearsals needed to prepare the Sinfonia Domestica the quartet found it impossible to prepare the Dalcreze work, and that, therefore, will it put off until one of the later concerts. The program as finally arranged is as follows: Quartet in G minor, op. 10, by Debussy; sonata for piano and violin in A major, op. 13, by Gabriel Faure, and a trio for piano, violin and violoncello in F major, op. 80, by Schumann, Gabrilowitsch will assist.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

In the next Symphony program which will be played on Friday afternoon, March 1, and Saturday evening, March 2, Dr. Muck will offer two works new to Boston, both of which are said to be of more than ordinary importance. The first number on the program are three symphonic poems, entitled "The Sea," by the Frenchman, Claude Debussy. Debussy, who is the most conspicuous figure in French music today, has been represented on our Symphony programs by but one work, his "The Afternoon of a Faun," which has been played twice by Mr. Gericke. The second work on the program is entitled "Olaf's Wedding Dance," a symphonic waltz by Alexander Ritter, whose name appears on the Symphony program for the first time. Ritter was a native of Russia, having been born in Narva on June 27, 1833, and he died in Munich on April 12, 1896. He was a violinist of note and at different times was leader of violin in the Meiningen, Weimer, Stettin and Wurzburg orchestra. While in Wurzburg he established a music printing house. In this country he is best known by the number of fine songs he has written. The other two works are Liszt's familiar "Mephisto Waltz" and Berolz's "Roman Cardinal" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
FEBRUARY 23, 1907

Mr. Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony quartet, has been compelled to make a change in the announced programme for the fifth concert of the quartet which will be given in Chickering hall Monday evening. The programme as finally arranged is: Quartet in G minor, opus 10, by Debussy; Sonata for piano and violin in A major, opus 13, by Gabriel Faure, and a trio for piano, violin and violoncello in F major, opus 80 by Schumann.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will be the assisting artist.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date [illegible] 1907 State N Y

STRAUSS SYMPHONY BY BOSTON PLAYERS

"Symphonia Domestica" Given in a Masterly Manner by Orchestra from the Hub.

Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica was the central point of interest in yesterday's matinee concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck opened his programme with this ponderous composition, purporting to describe a day in the domestic life of "Papa, Mama and Baby" which the composer himself made known with Mr. Wetzler's orchestra three years ago. Presented yesterday in one movement, fifty minutes were consumed in the symphony's performance, and during this time none of the late comers were allowed by the ushers to proceed to their seats.

In the Symphonia Domestica under Dr. Muck's baton the Boston players did some of their finest playing in New York. It is not too musical to say also that the musical results amounted to a far clearer exposition of the symphony's contents than that given by the composer himself here.

Demands are made upon each of the instruments in the huge orchestra required which only an aggregation of virtuosos can meet. The Boston men are all virtuosos, and it speedily became apparent that Dr. Muck had worked them hard and long to master the difficulties of the work.

As a result, music which had seemed to be of an abstract, opaque sort was made, so to speak, as transparent as glass, and in the process all of its inherent beauties and its defects as well were exhibited with the utmost clearness. The audience was roused to prolonged applause at the work's close, which continued until the men of the orchestra had risen to share the conductor's honors.

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist of the afternoon, played with taste and distinction Brahms' B flat major pianoforte concerto, a work which, after the Strauss instrumental heroics, sounded as naive as a Haydn symphony. The concert was effectively closed by Brahms' Academic Festival Overture.

Paper Press Eagle
City New York
FEB 23 1907 State N Y

Whoever it was that led [illegible] of Dr. Muck that he was an [illegible] was again found to be wrong wh[illegible] night, the doctor gave us his fourth [illegible] gramme for the season and [illegible] omitted the classics. Yet this may [illegible] by no more than that the leader [illegible] Boston band realizes that his offerings [illegible] day will be classics to-morrow. [illegible] contented himself and his audience [illegible] the Baptist Temple, with music that was known but advanced: Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Bride of the Czar," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto and Berloiz's "Harold in Italy;" and when a man of training in the music of the masters gives so much of his thought to music of the unaccepted, it is significant of change, and the change is in [illegible] than music; it betokens an unrest [illegible] pervades faiths, philosophies and governments.

These Russians, for example, whose spring songs are dirges, and whose dirges are wailings from the pit, these Slavs, Finns, Huns and Bulgars, with their fierce melancholy and belligerent disregard of the conventions, are to be reckoned with, and shortly. Wagner's "Music of the Future" is already a music of the past. His dicta have been accepted; but here comes the new school, the Borodins, Napravniks, Rachmaninoffs, Cuis and Arenskys, with something distinctive to say, and a compelling way of saying it, and the world is listening. Recognition has been shown, as always, even in Russia, for in that country, as in ours, the majority prefers the worst in the arts to the best, but the older forms show tokens of exhaustion and the infusion of a new, even though a savage life, is needful to perpetuate this most divine of human expressions and revelations. At first hearing the Slav repels by his lawlessness, his grotesquerie, his disregard of form, though at his wildest he is outdone by Strauss; he is at a far remove from the lighter moving, brighter thinking races, and the sadness of his serfdom continues with him; yet his work has the unspeakable gain and lasting profit of honesty and that will be the ruin of all the labored artifice and clever imitation that sticklers for the proprieties are to furnish for the next three decades. We have been afraid of Slavic art in the past, as we have been afraid of the Slav, but the time is come when we must adopt it and regenerate our failing schools with its abounding life.

And this vitality of the Slav is magnificent. He shares it, to be sure, with all other races of the north, who grow strong through ceaseless battle with the adversities of nature, but he has this esthetic advantage, that whereas the other races have fought their way to liberty, he suffers under political severities endured by no others, and the true expression of his grief, despair and hope, denied in other forms, takes shape in music. We heard this unappeasable sadness in Rimsky-Korsakoff last night, but in his vigorous, martial rhythms we heard also the tramp of hosts bringing about the revolution. His "Bride of the Czar" is a dreadful tale of wizardry, intrigue, jealousy and murder, but the music tells none of this; indeed, it has its moods of joy and confidence.

Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Russian naval officer who has also written symphonies—which no Japanese admiral has done, as yet—and it is natural to expect of him a freer, bolder declaration of the national spirit than we should have from the musician; yet the Tschaikowsky concerto is assuredly more positive, even more martial. It has moments of the perfunctory and cheap, and none of that splendor of despair that we hear in his "Pathetic" symphony, but it has its moments of tenderness, no less, and the tenderness of the strong is beautiful. The piano part in this concerto was played by Olga Samaroff, a Russian pianist of German parentage, born in Texas and schooled in France. Her style is excellently fitted for the music. One imagines her as being rather excellently equipped to avoid Chopin, but this masculine work of Tschaikowsky she plays in a masculine fashion, the queer, measured pounding of the first measures suggesting, under her hands, the swinging tread of troops. She is facile, confident, brilliant—qualities indicating a certain hardness—but plays the more spiritual divisions of the concerto with sympathy and understanding, if not, as yet, with the grace and feeling and sweetness of which they are capable and which would be imparted to them by Joseffy, Paderewski or Pachmann. One such division, the andantino—a shepherd's piping, rhymed to the surges of the sea—lacked these elements, but the artist is young and there is hope. Tschaikowsky eagerly sought advice as to the revision of his concerto, when he had finished it, and the advice having been contributed, he altered never a note. So, his interpreter may persist in the strong, the showy and the playful, and this is a healthy reaction against sentimentality of which there has been a bit too much.

"Harold in Italy" was played correctly and with charm, yet, it must be owned, with less of interest and fervor than Dr. Muck shows in his reading of the Russians, albeit Berlioz had much in common with them. He dislikes the formal, he is melancholy and fantastic but he lacks their ferocity. He has, none the less, some delightful and characteristic work in this "Harold," and the conceit of illustrating it with a solo voice in all four of the movements is his own. This solo, for viola—least buoyant of the fiddle family—was played last night by Mr. Ferir, of the orchestra, rather calmly, it is true, though it is hard to have it otherwise, but he gave charm to the harmonics that sound above the heavy plodding of the pilgrims' feet, ending with a serene note so high, so soft, so clear, it was like the star lighting the coming night.

The audience was large and temperately enthusiastic. On March 23 the fifth and last concert of the Brooklyn season will be given by the Boston Symphony [illegible]

[152]

Staats Zeitung,

Feb. 22-07

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die stets willkommenen symphonischen Gäste aus Boston, diese musikalischen Freudenspender par excellence, sind wieder da. Auch gestern Abend ergossen sich die Massen in den weiten Raum von Carnegie Hall, welcher in allen seinen Theilen dicht gefüllt war.

„Der Zauberlehrling" (nach der bekannten Goethe'schen Ballade) von Paul Dukas, eröffnete das Concert. Dieser neufranzösische „Zauberlehrling" ist ein überaus geistreich und virtuos gearbeiteter musikalischer Scherz, ein Werk, das wir zu den gelungensten und erfreulichsten Erzeugnissen der neufranzösischen Schule rechnen.

Man kennt den Lehrsatz des „alten Hexenmeisters", der „die Geister, die er rief, nicht mehr los wurde", bis der Meister sie durch sein Machtwort zum Stillstand brachte. Als echter Gallier faßt Dukas sein Subjekt von der witzigen Seite auf. Ein drolliges, dreitaktig rythmisirtes Fagott-Thema mit grotesktem Terzenintervall durchzieht das ganze Werk, das durch barocke Klangkombinationen glänzt, allerdings auch Dissonanzen enthält, welche jedoch meist in der Situation begründet sind. Wasser bricht von allen Seiten hervor, aus allen Instrumenten wogt und gurgelt es, das ganze Orchester ist zu einer Art musikalischer Fontaine geworden. Die Instrumentation erweist die raffinirteste Technik, und die Kürze des Scherzes ist ein Reiz mehr. Dr. Muck dirigirte das Stück mit der ihm eigenen liebevollen Sorgfalt und Genauigkeit, die er allen seinen Darbietungen entgegenbringt, und die Bostoner spielten es mit jener unnachahmlichen Bravour und Delikatesse, welche wir an ihnen nicht hoch genug schätzen können.

Ein ganz gewaltiger Erfolg war hierauf der bekannten Pianistin Frau Olga Samaroff in Tschaikowsky's 1. Klavier-Concert op. 23 beschieden, einer Leistung, zu deren Preis man tief in die Saiten greifen mag. Das effektvolle Werk krankt an zwei Uebelständen, der gewöhnlich wenig noblen Erfindung und der übermäßig schwerfälligen Behandlung des Klavierparts, namentlich im ersten Satz. Die interessante Künstlerin meisterte dieses an die physische Ausdauer und Technik die größten Anforderungen stellende Concert in bewunderungswürdiger Weise, und bei allem Nachdruck und Kraftgefühl wohnte ihrer Leistung doch stets eine gewisse weibliche Grazie inne.

Die wirkungsvollen Doppelgriffe und Oktavengänge des ersten Satzes gestaltete sie mit Kraft und Brillanz und beseelte sie zugleich durch selbständig erdachte, überaus reizvolle Anschlagsschattirungen. In den lieblichen Klavierpassagen des zweiten Satzes, welche uns das banale Walzerthema verzeihen lassen müssen, entfaltete sie Poesie und köstlich sangbare Eigenschaften der Tongebung, und das feurige Finale mit dem deutlich ausgesprochenen slavischen Grundcharakter führte sie ausnehmend temperamentvoll und eindringlich durch. Ganz besonders hervorragend ist ihre rythmische Energie. Sie wurde nach jedem Satz enthusiastisch gefeiert und zum Schluß achtmal gerufen. Eine erfreuliche Künstlerin!

Die letzte Programmnummer, die selten gehörte 1. Symphonie von Jean Sibelius in E-Moll, brachte uns einen wahren Genuß, den wir zum großen Theil auch dem Dirigenten schulden. Sibelius erweist sich in diesem Werk als gedankentiefer Symphoniker mit überaus prägnanter Themengestaltung. Der erste Satz des durchaus bedeutenden Werks, dessen Instrumentation eine virtuose ist, beginnt mit einer kurzen Einleitung, welche jedoch erst im Finale zur Geltung gelangt. Dem ersten Satz liegt offenbar wilde Kraft und trotziges Ringen zu Grunde. In dem langsamen zweiten Satz, der aus einem marschartigen Thema entspringt, entwickelt der Komponist bedeutende Kunst der Kontrapunktik. Der dritte Satz ist ein lebhaft rythmisirtes Scherzo von erlesener melodischer Delikatesse, das großangelegte Finale beginnt keck und wagelustig, um später einer berauschend sehnsüchtig klingenden, breiten Phrase der Streicher Platz zu machen. Das Werk klingt in eine imponirende Steigerung aus.

Dr. Muck brachte das Werk mit seiner bescheidenen Unterordnung zu Gehör, die doch so viel Raum für das Geniale und Eigenartige läßt. Vom Orchester kann man nur sagen, daß es auf seiner gewohnten Höhe stand. Das sagt Alles.

H.

N. Y. Tribune,

Feb. 22/07

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The need of a musical clearing house was suggested again at the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Why were local concertgoers obliged to hear Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto again? Was it the fifth or the fifteenth time that it was played in public this season? It is too great a weariness to count up the performances. Is there nothing else attractive in this field? Lhévinne twice, Gabrilowitsch twice, Anthony once and now Madame Samaroff. Is it not enough that the composers impress upon us that this is the age of mere virtuosity and that therefore invention is dead except in the department of technique? Must the virtuosi also force upon our notice that they are specializing on a few things that happen just now to be in harmony with popular taste? It was interesting to hear Madame Samaroff [illegible] Russian theatre pan[illegible] be in tune with the time) play the concerto simply because she was in such delightful rhythmical sympathy with Dr. Muck and his men, and because, between them, they gave the music such splendid propulsive force; but the fact that the audience has grown weary of the work seemed indicated by the comparative indifference with which it was received. "Thank you for a very admirable but too familiar something"—that seemed to be the sense of the handclappings which called the artists back to the stage after the performance. Under other circumstances so excellent a performance in respect of collaboration, at least, ought to have invoked much greater enthusiasm, for it deserved it.

Dr. Muck had but three numbers on his programme—the descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which Mr. Gericke made much of; the pianoforte concerto by Tschaikowsky and a symphony in E minor by Sibelius. The ingenious bit of musical humor by Dukas ought to have given a hint to American composers long ago; they have a companion subject, but are far more suggestive in the old tale by Hawthorne from the days of witchcraft—"Dickon, another coal for my pipe!" Sibelius's symphony was a delightful offering to the believers in music qua music. Is the old form dead? Is nothing more to be done with mere melody and expressive harmony? Sibelius seems only to have reached into the air of his native Finland and gathered musical material which fascinates by its own power with a fascination to which it is a happiness to yield. It scarcely needs to be said that all the music was brilliantly played.

H. E. K.

N. Y. Ev. Sun

Feb. 22/07

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night afforded at once novelty and satiety in its short, though varied programme. From desolate Finland came quite the best new symphony that has been played here in many a musical day, that No. 1 in E minor by Sibelius, a work of remarkable charm by reason of its native freshness. In it the characteristic marked rhythm and weird melody of the Northern folk songs were more than hinted at. The descriptive scherzo by Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," should serve to set some American composers to writing a similar work based on the witchcraft legends of our own literature. Would a "Sleepy Hollow" set to music be any less suggestive than this Frenchman's humoresque? Long since have this year's local concertgoers had enough of Tchaikowsky's first piano forte concerto, which Mme. Samaroff played with orchestra last night. The formality of the applause which followed the number conveyed its own message to programme makers, but was no reflection on the pianist, for she played the concerto interestingly and well.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra go to Brooklyn to-night to play the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," preceded by the Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, "Betrothed of the Czar," and again Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 for Mme. Samaroff.

Early matinée-goers to-morrow at Carnegie Hall will hear the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss. As it leads the bill and is fifty minutes long, those who don't arrive promptly at 2:30 o'clock will hear it standing. The later numbers are Brahms's "Academic Overture" and the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 for Gabrilowitsch.

New York World

Feb. 22/07

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last night in Carnegie Hall to an audience that filled the hall. Again was this virtuosi orchestra heard at its best. Such playing is all too rare and too seldom heard, and there are on this hemisphere far too few conductors of the artistic stature of Dr. Karl Muck. He was master again last night, and his men played as though they respected him first and loved him always. It was another remarkable exhibition of the finished possibilities of orchestral playing and of the mastery of conductorship.

BOSTON JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 23, 1907.

THE SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Mr. Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has been compelled to make a change in the announced program for the fifth concert of the quartet, which will be given in Chickering Hall Monday evening. The original announcement contained a quartet by Jaques Dalcreze, a sonata for piano and violin by Gabriel Faure and a quartet by Debussy, with Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the assisting artist. Owing to the large number of rehearsals needed to prepare the Sinfonia Domestica the quartet found it impossible to prepare the Dalcreze work, and that, therefore, will it put off until one of the later concerts. The program as finally arranged is as follows: Quartet in G minor, op. 10, by Debussy; sonata for piano and violin in A major, op. 13, by Gabriel Faure, and a trio for piano, violin and violoncello in F major, op. 80, by Schumann. Gabrilowitsch will assist.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

In the next Symphony program which will be played on Friday afternoon, March 1, and Saturday evening, March 2, Dr. Muck will offer two works new to Boston, both of which are said to be of more than ordinary importance. The first number on the program are three symphonic poems, entitled "The Sea," by the Frenchman, Claude Debussy. Debussy, who is the most conspicuous figure in French music today, has been represented on our Symphony programs by but one work, his "The Afternoon of a Faun," which has been played twice by Mr. Gericke. The second work on the program is entitled "Olaf's Wedding Dance," a symphonic waltz by Alexander Ritter, whose name appears on the Symphony program for the first time. Ritter was a native of Russia, having been born in Narva on June 27, 1833, and he died in Munich on April 12, 1896. He was a violinist of note and at different times was leader of violin in the Meiningen, Weimer, Stettin and Wurzburg orchestra. While in Wurzburg he established a music printing house. In this country he is best known by the number of fine songs he has written. The other two works are Liszt's familiar "Mephisto Waltz" and Beroliz's "Roman Cardinal" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

FEBRUARY 23, 1907

Mr. Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony quartet, has been compelled to make a change in the announced programme for the fifth concert of the quartet which will be given in Chickering hall Monday evening. The programme as finally arranged is: Quartet in G minor, opus 10, by Debussy; Sonata for piano and violin in A major, opus 13, by Gabriel Faure, and a trio for piano, violin and violoncello in F major, opus 80 by Schumann.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will be the assisting artist.

Paper Herald

City New York

Date State N Y

STRAUSS SYMPHONY BY BOSTON PLAYERS

"Symphonia Domestica" Given in a Masterly Manner by Orchestra from the Hub.

Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica was the central point of interest in yesterday's matinee concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck opened his programme with this ponderous composition, purporting to describe a day in the domestic life of "Papa, Mama and Baby" which the composer himself made known with Mr. Wetzler's orchestra three years ago. Presented yesterday in one movement, fifty minutes were consumed in the symphony's performance, and during this time none of the late comers were allowed by the ushers to proceed to their seats.

In the Symphonia Domestica under Dr. Muck's baton the Boston players did some of their finest playing in New York. It is not too musical to say also that the musical results amounted to a far clearer exposition of the symphony's contents than that given by the composer himself here.

Demands are made upon each of the instruments in the huge orchestra required which only an aggregation of virtuosos can meet. The Boston men are all virtuosos, and it speedily became apparent that Dr. Muck had worked them hard and long to master the difficulties of the work.

As a result, music which had seemed to be of an abstract, opaque sort was made, so to speak, as transparent as glass, and in the process all of its inherent beauties and its defects as well were exhibited with the utmost clearness. The audience was roused to prolonged applause at the work's close, which continued until the men of the orchestra had risen to share the conductor's honors.

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the soloist of the afternoon, played with taste and distinction Brahms' B flat major pianoforte concerto, a work which, after the Strauss instrumental heroics, sounded as naïve as a Haydn symphony. The concert was effectively closed by Brahms' Academic Festival Overture.

Paper Press

City New York Brooklyn

Date FEB 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Whoever it was that led us to believe of Dr. Muck that he was an academician was again found to be wrong when, last night, the doctor gave us his fourth programme for the season and studiously omitted the classics. Yet this may signify no more than that the leader of the Boston band realizes that his offerings of to-day will be classics to-morrow. He contented himself and his audience, at the Baptist Temple, with music that was known but advanced: Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Bride of the Czar," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, and Berloiz's "Harold in Italy;" and when a man of training in the music of the masters gives so much of his thought to the music of the unaccepted, it is significant of change, and the change is in more than music; it betokens an unrest that pervades faiths, philosophies and governments.

These Russians, for example, whose spring songs are dirges, and whose dirges are wailings from the pit, these Slavs, Finns, Huns and Bulgars, with their fierce melancholy and belligerent disregard of the conventions, are to be reckoned with, and shortly. Wagner's "Music of the Future" is already a music of the past. His dicta have been accepted; but here comes the new school, the Borodins, Napravniks, Rachmaninoffs, Cuis and Arenskys, with something distinctive to say, and a compelling way of saying it, and the world is listening. Recognition has been shown, as always, even in Russia, for in that country, as in ours, the majority prefers the worst in the arts to the best, but the older forms show tokens of exhaustion, and the infusion of a new, even though a savage life, is needful to perpetuate this most divine of human expressions and revelations. At first hearing the Slav repels by his lawlessness, his grotesquerie, his disregard of form, though at his wildest he is outdone by Strauss; he is at a far remove from the lighter moving, brighter thinking races, and the sadness of his serfdom continues with him; yet his work has the unspeakable gain and lasting profit of honesty and that will be the ruin of all the labored artifice and clever imitation that sticklers for the proprieties are to furnish for the next three decades. We have been afraid of Slavic art in the past, as we have been afraid of the Slav, but the time is come when we must adopt it and regenerate our failing schools with its abounding life.

And this vitality of the Slav is magnificent. He shares it, to be sure, with all other races of the north, who grow strong through ceaseless battle with the adversities of nature, but he has this esthetic advantage, that whereas the other races have fought their way to liberty, he suffers under political severities endured by no others, and the true expression of his grief, despair and hope, denied in other forms, takes shape in music. We heard this unappeasable sadness in Rimsky-Korsakoff last night, but in his vigorous, martial rhythms we heard also the tramp of hosts bringing about the revolution. His "Bride of the Czar" is a dreadful tale of wizardry, intrigue, jealousy and murder, but the music tells none of this; indeed, it has its moods of joy and confidence.

Rimsky-Korsakoff is a Russian naval officer who has also written symphonies—which no Japanese admiral has done, as yet—and it is natural to expect of him a freer, bolder declaration of the national spirit than we should have from the musician; yet the Tschaikowsky concerto is assuredly more positive, even more martial. It has moments of the perfunctory and cheap, and none of that splendor of despair that we hear in his "Pathetic" symphony, but it has its moments of tenderness, no less, and the tenderness of the strong is beautiful. The piano part in this concerto was played by Olga Samaroff, a Russian pianist of German parentage, born in Texas and schooled in France. Her style is excellently fitted for the music. One imagines her as being rather excellently equipped to avoid Chopin, but this masculine work of Tschaikowsky she plays in a masculine fashion, the queer, measured pounding of the first measures suggesting, under her hands, the swinging tread of troops. She is facile, confident, brilliant—qualities indicating a certain hardness—but plays the more spiritual divisions of the concerto with sympathy and understanding, if not, as yet, with the grace and feeling and sweetness of which they are capable and which would be imparted to them by Joseffy, Paderewski or Pachmann. One such division, the andantino—a shepherd's piping, rhymed to the surges of the sea—lacked these elements, but the artist is young and there is hope. Tschaikowsky eagerly sought advice as to the revision of his concerto, when he had finished it, and the advice having been contributed, he altered never a note. So, his interpreter may persist in the strong, the showy and the playful, and this is a healthy reaction against sentimentality of which there has been a bit too much.

"Harold in Italy" was played correctly and with charm, yet, it must be owned, with less of interest and fervor than Dr. Muck shows in his reading of the Russians, albeit Berlioz had much in common with them. He dislikes the formal, he is melancholy and fantastic but he lacks their ferocity. He has, none the less, some delightful and characteristic work in this "Harold," and the conceit of illustrating it with a solo voice in all four of the movements is his own. This solo, for viola—least buoyant of the fiddle family—was played last night by Mr. Ferir, of the orchestra, rather calmly, it is true, though it is hard to have it otherwise, but he gave charm to the harmonics that sound above the heavy plodding of the pilgrims' feet, ending with a serene note, so high, so soft, so clear, it was like the star lighting the coming night.

The audience was large and temperately enthusiastic. On March 22 the fifth and last concert of the Brooklyn season will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

X

[152]

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius's First Symphony

Olga Samaroff Gives Her Exposition of Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto.

SIBELIUS'S first symphony was the principal number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The mournful melody with which the first movement begins seizes upon the imagination and holds it through all its variations. The second movement is full of charm. In the scherzo, if something is lacking of the original fascination, the oddity of its construction makes amends. The finale is a broad and passionate development of the original theme, reaching a fine climax. The composition, in the light of Dr. Karl Muck's illuminative reading, got a splendid performance last night, the master musicians of this splendid band playing at their best.

Olga Samaroff was the soloist in Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor. This beautiful composition has been made familiar this season. In turn, Rosenthal, Lhevinne and Gabrilowitsch has played it, each with power and skill and individual charm. The American girl with the Russian name maintained the standard of excellence, winning much applause for her interpretation and execution. But isn't there anything else worth doing?

Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe), with all its odd conceits, got a fine exposition. There was the usual large and brilliant audience that now is the rule at these concerts, and the applause was generous.

Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will begin the second of this pair of concerts to-morrow afternoon. It has only one movement, lasting fifty minutes. With the usual rule enforcing standing upon late comers until the movement ends, everybody would be prompt. SYLVESTER RAWLING.

OLGA SAMAROFF

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony and Mme. Olga Samaroff at Carnegie Hall

THE Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B flat minor has been played here at least twice this season, but that did not prevent the able Herr Muck, of the Boston Symphony, from trying his hand at it, or rather his baton, and making it in fact the piece de resistance of the fourth evening concert of the season. Mme. Olga Samaroff was his soloist, and a very able choice for this concerto, for it is one of her best performances and a composition that evidently gives her more than usual pleasure to interpret.

That the orchestral part of the concerto was given with rare finish, that the accompanying of the band was in the highest degree sympathetic, need hardly be said. However, there seemed last night a special entente between the soloist and the players and the result was a really splendid presentation of the Russian master's magnificent work.

First of all Mme. Samaroff impresses by her ease. Many pianists have technique in plenty, but few have the power that Mme. Samaroff possesses of using it to conceal it, and of gliding through tremendous digital feats in such a smooth, effortless way that only the music and none of the mechanics remains. Mme. Samaroff's playing has force that is never in danger of being "poundy" and breadth that is broad enough to cope with the entire intellectual content of the composition, yet keeps what it should have—a feminine quality of sentiment and allurement. It is almost bromidic to say that she gave a feminine version of the concerto, but that is true, and those who know how large a share of femininity went to make up Tschaikowsky's character will appreciate that an interpretation highly feminine is an artistic and correct one. Just a word of praise should be added for the crystalline clearness of Mme. Samaroff's runs and trills and the warmth of her tone. Her success was evident, and she was awarded four genuine recalls after the first movement.

The first number on the programme was the scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas, a tone transcription of the incidents set forth by Goethe in his ballad "Der Zauberlehrling." It received very descriptive handling from the orchestra, and in spots really created shivers.

To add to the flood of sombre northern music—Russian, Polish, Scandinavian—we get compositions from even remoter northern shores. Dr. Muck contributed a piece from Finland, Symphony No. 1 in E minor, by Jean Sibelius. It was tragic from the opening bar to the final cadence; steeped in minors and rare and plaintive intervals. But it possessed a freshness, a real musical cleverness and a sincere emotional content that won it deserved appreciation.

Paper World
City New York
Date FEB 22 1907 State N Y

STRAUSS' SYMPHONY SUPERBLY PLAYED.

The Boston Orchestra Renders "Sinfonia Domestica" in Masterly Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a remarkable concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme began with Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," and in the performance of this work the Boston players gave an exhibition of virtuosity that has seldom if ever been equalled here. The work presents difficulties that are well-nigh impossible technically, and yet this orchestra of virtuosi played the score with a finish and a fire that can come only from enthusiasm and interest, and in the conducting of it Dr. Muck gave another exhibition of his greatness. He has said frankly recently that he does not love the later compositions of Richard Strauss, and yet he conducted this remarkable symphony as though he were devoted to it. He gave a reading that was as clear as crystal. He elucidated the details with superb mastery, and he contrived to knit the several episodes or movements into a logical whole. It was marvellous conducting of an orchestra of wonderful players.

Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" has been heard here once before, several years ago, when the conductor was the composer, and when the work had its first hearing anywhere. Since that time it has travelled across the line of Continental concert platforms and has enjoyed as much popularity as is readily given everything written by this genius, Strauss. But it is by no means one of his greatest works; in fact, of his bigger compositions this is probably the weakest.

Its programme is that of a day in the family life of the composer, and its three thematic subjects are meant to represent "papa, mamma and the baby." Also are the various episodes supposed to paint incidents in the family life. This has provoked humorous and silly imaginary programmes, some acute-eared persons having heard the onion pattern of the china, puctuated by baby's bath and what not. Strauss has asserted that he wishes the work to be judged sheerly as music and not as a bit of programme writing. As music it is comparatively weak in themes and is sentimental to a point of triviality. But in instrumentation it is nothing short of wonderful. What is missing from the work is the spontaneity of themes, and this lack brings in its wake the suggestion that this music is, in comparison to some of his tremendous writings, insincere.

The other orchestral number on the programme was Brahms's "Academic Overture," which was beautifully played. The soloist was the Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who played Brahms's Second Concerto admirably. The audience was an enormous one, and it applauded the Strauss work as though it had given it intelligent appreciation—and the work lasts uninterruptedly for fifty minutes.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

PAPA, MAMMA AND THE BABY.

STRAUSS'S "SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA" REPEATED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Clear the Music, but Not the Programme —Strauss's Description of a Day at Home Still a Double Fugue to Many Hearers.

When the late Antonin Dvorak desired to do honor to these United States he composed a symphony, which he entitled "From the New World." In it he endeavored to set forth in tones the spirit of a young people as he discerned it. When Richard Strauss wished to celebrate cisatlantic musicdom he conducted in New York on March 21, 1904, the first performance anywhere of his "Symphonia Domestica," a composition intended to picture a day in his own family life, with a climax at the sacred hour when R. Strauss sat him down to create tone poetry. Dvorak worshipped the splendor of a great country, but Mr Strauss, like the ape Bimi in Kipling's tale, had "too much ego in his cosmos."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [redacted] the wise guidance of [redacted] Muck, performed the "Symphonia Domestica" yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. A large assembly of music lovers sat in solemn silence and hearkened to the diary of Mr. Strauss, enlivened by revelations of the notable doings around his domestic hearth and wondered what all the details meant.

Ernest Newman, an English commentator, who is outspoken and capable of forming independent opinions, commented caustically on the humbuggery of Mr. Strauss's pretence that no one ought to know the scheme of this elaborate piece of programme music. The composer was quite unable to keep it to himself when he was here, and it was published in one of the newspapers. It is a most important programme and it discloses to us the fact that this composition is all about papa, mamma and the baby.

It takes the composer fifty minutes to tell his fireside tale, and he comes to his conclusion with a double dyed fugue which would have made Albrechtsberger gasp and stare. The thematic material of the work is commonplace in the extreme, as most of Strauss's thematic material is. The technical skill shown in building the matter up in instrumental tone pictures is great. The music is good to hear, provided you do not know what it is about and do not care.

But there's the rub. If you do not know you are likely to imagine that the passage representing the crying of the baby when he has hurt himself at play is a dramatization of a cat fight in the Straussian back yard. Furthermore, you may fall into grievous error about the Mrs. Strauss theme and feel certain that some of its developments represent her feelings on receiving a week's notice from the cook.

Possibly there is one passage about which, more than any other, you may be misled. That part of the composition which depicts Mr. Strauss in the act of penning deathless "Heldenlebens" might easily be mistaken for a tonal account of a Sunday afternoon in Peapack, N. J., or an author's reading of the latest story of Henry James.

Following this remarkable description of "Thinking and Doing" (as it is called) we have a love scene and then "Dreams and Cares." Here the music becomes what Byron called the Troad, "a fine field for conjecture." The awakening, when the clock strikes 7 in harp harmonics and glockenspiel, is delightful, for there are few families that can wake up in the cheerful morn to fry a double fugue on both sides for breakfast.

But let us not pursue these papa, mamma and baby themes further. The truth is that the portentous message of this work strikes a serious mind as nearly silly and the composition itself appears to be a cumbersome Straussian joke. It meanders through its fifty minutes in a specious yet aimless sort of fashion and after it is ended every one wonders why it did end or why it ever began.

It was performed yesterday superbly. The clarity and tonal beauty of the playing was something to be remembered. Dr. Muck is an authority on Strauss. It is well that we have heard this page of a composer's life once more, but every thinking music lover will wish that Dr. Strauss had not revealed his programme, or even hinted at the baby.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, was the solo performer of the concert. He played the B flat concerto of Brahms with splendid spirit and warm appreciation. The same composer's "Academic Overture" brought the entertainment to an end.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius's First Symphony

Olga Samaroff Gives Her Exposition of Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto.

SIBELIUS'S first symphony was the principal number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert at Carnegie Hall last night. The mournful melody with which the first movement begins seizes upon the imagination and holds it through all its variations. The second movement is full of charm. In the scherzo, if something is lacking of the original fascination, the oddity of its construction makes amends. The finale is a broad and passionate development of the original theme, reaching a fine climax. The composition, in the light of Dr. Karl Muck's illuminative reading, got a splendid performance last night, the master musicians of this splendid band playing at their best.

Olga Samaroff was the soloist in Tschaikowsky's piano concerto in B flat minor. This beautiful composition has been made familiar this season. In turn, Rosenthal, Lhevinne and Gabrilowitsch has played it, each with power and skill and individual charm. The American girl with the Russian name maintained the standard of excellence, winning much applause for her interpretation and execution. But isn't there anything else worth doing?

Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a ballad by Goethe), with all its odd conceits, got a fine exposition. There was the usual large and brilliant audience that now is the rule at these concerts, and the applause was generous.

Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will begin the second of this pair of concerts to-morrow afternoon. It has only one movement, lasting fifty minutes. With the usual rule enforcing standing upon late comers until the movement ends, everybody would be prompt. SYLVESTER RAWLING.

OLGA SAMAROFF

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony and Mme. Olga Samaroff at Carnegie Hall

THE Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B flat minor has been played here at least twice this season, but that did not prevent the able Herr Muck, of the Boston Symphony, from trying his hand at it, or rather his baton, and making it in fact the piece de resistance of the fourth evening concert of the season. Mme. Olga Samaroff was his soloist, and a very able choice for this concerto, for it is one of her best performances and a composition that evidently gives her more than usual pleasure to interpret.

That the orchestral part of the concerto was given with rare finish, that the accompanying of the band was in the highest degree sympathetic, need hardly be said. However, there seemed last night a special entente between the soloist and the players and the result was a really splendid presentation of the Russian master's magnificent work.

First of all Mme. Samaroff impresses by her ease. Many pianists have technique in plenty, but few have the power that Mme. Samaroff possesses of using it to conceal it, and of gliding through tremendous digital feats in such a smooth, effortless way that only the music and none of the mechanics remains. Mme. Samaroff's playing has force that is never in danger of being "poundy" and breadth that is broad enough to cope with the entire intellectual content of the composition, yet keeps what it should have—a feminine quality of sentiment and allurement. It is almost bromidic to say that she gave a feminine version of the concerto, but that is true, and those who know how large a share of femininity went to make up Tschaikowsky's character will appreciate that an interpretation highly feminine is an artistic and correct one. Just a word of praise should be added for the crystalline clearness of Mme. Samaroff's runs and trills and the warmth of her tone. Her success was evident, and she was awarded four genuine recalls after the first movement.

The first number on the programme was the scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas, a tone transcription of the incidents set forth by Goethe in his ballad "Der Zauberlehrling." It received very descriptive handling from the orchestra, and in spots really created shivers.

To add to the flood of sombre northern music—Russian, Polish, Scandinavian—we get compositions from even remoter northern shores. Dr. Muck contributed a piece from Finland. Symphony No. 1 in E minor, by Jean Sibelius. It was tragic from the opening bar to the final cadence; steeped in minors and rare and plaintive intervals. But it possessed a freshness, a real musical cleverness and a sincere emotional content that won it deserved appreciation.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y

STRAUSS' SYMPHONY SUPERBLY PLAYED.

The Boston Orchestra Renders "Sinfonia Domestica" in Masterly Style.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a remarkable concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme began with Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," and in the performance of this work the Boston players gave an exhibition of virtuosity that has seldom if ever been equalled here. The work presents difficulties that are well-nigh impossible technically, and yet this orchestra of virtuosi played the score with a finish and a fire that can come only from enthusiasm and interest, and in the conducting of it Dr. Muck gave another exhibition of his greatness. He has said frankly recently that he does not love the later compositions of Richard Strauss, and yet he conducted this remarkable symphony as though he were devoted to it. He gave a reading that was as clear as crystal. He elucidated the details with superb mastery, and he contrived to knit the several episodes or movements into a logical whole. It was marvellous conducting of an orchestra of wonderful players.

Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" has been heard here once before, several years ago, when the conductor was the composer, and when the work had its first hearing anywhere. Since that time it has travelled across the line of Continental concert platforms and has enjoyed as much popularity as is readily given everything written by this genius, Strauss. But it is by no means one of his greatest works; in fact, of his bigger compositions this is probably the weakest.

Its programme is that of a day in the family life of the composer, and its three thematic subjects are meant to represent "papa, mamma and the baby." Also are the various episodes supposed to paint incidents in the family life. This has provoked humorous and silly imaginary programmes, some acute-eared persons having heard the onion pattern of the china, punctuated by baby's bath and what not. Strauss has asserted that he wishes the work to be judged sheerly as music and not as a bit of programme writing. As music it is comparatively weak in themes and is sentimental to a point of triviality. But in instrumentation it is nothing short of wonderful. What is missing from the work is the spontaneity of themes, and this lack brings in its wake the suggestion that this music is, in comparison to some of his tremendous writings, insincere.

The other orchestral number on the programme was Brahms's "Academic Overture," which was beautifully played. The soloist was the Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who played Brahms's Second Concerto admirably. The audience was an enormous one, and it applauded the Strauss work as though it had given it intelligent appreciation—and the work lasts uninterruptedly for fifty minutes.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

PAPA, MAMMA AND THE BABY.

STRAUSS'S "SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA" REPEATED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Clear the Music, but Not the Programme —Strauss's Description of a Day at Home Still a Double Fugue to Many Hearers.

When the late Antonin Dvorak desired to do honor to these United States he composed a symphony, which he entitled "From the New World." In it he endeavored to set forth in tones the spirit of a young people as he discerned it. When Richard Strauss wished to celebrate cisatlantic musicdom he conducted in New York on March 21, 1904, the first performance anywhere of his "Symphonia Domestica," a composition intended to picture a day in his own family life, with a climax at the sacred hour when R. Strauss sat him down to create tone poetry. Dvorak worshipped the splendor of a great country, but Mr Strauss, like the ape Bimi in Kipling's tale, had "too much ego in his cosmos."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the wise [redacted] Muck, performed the "Symphonia Domestica" yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. A large assembly of music lovers sat in solemn silence and hearkened to the diary of Mr. Strauss, enlivened by revelations of the notable doings around his domestic hearth and wondered what all the details meant.

Ernest Newman, an English commentator, who is outspoken and capable of forming independent opinions, commented caustically on the humbuggery of Mr. Strauss's pretence that no one ought to know the scheme of this elaborate piece of programme music. The composer was quite unable to keep it to himself when he was here, and it was published in one of the newspapers. It is a most important programme and it discloses to us the fact that this composition is all about papa, mamma and the baby.

It takes the composer fifty minutes to tell his fireside tale, and he comes to his conclusion with a double dyed fugue which would have made Albrechtsberger gasp and stare. The thematic material of the work is commonplace in the extreme, as most of Strauss's thematic material is. The technical skill shown in building the matter up in instrumental tone pictures is great. The music is good to hear, provided you do not know what it is about and do not care.

But there's the rub. If you do not know you are likely to imagine that the passage representing the crying of the baby when he has hurt himself at play is a dramatization of a cat fight in the Straussian back yard. Furthermore, you may fall into grievous error about the Mrs. Strauss theme and feel certain that some of its developments represent her feelings on receiving a week's notice from the cook.

Possibly there is one passage about which, more than any other, you may be misled. That part of the composition which depicts Mr. Strauss in the act of penning deathless "Heldenlebens" might easily be mistaken for a tonal account of a Sunday afternoon in Peapack, N. J., or an author's reading of the latest story of Henry James.

Following this remarkable description of "Thinking and Doing" (as it is called) we have a love scene and then "Dreams and Cares." Here the music becomes what Byron called the Troad, "a fine field for conjecture." The awakening, when the clock strikes 7 in harp harmonics and glockenspiel, is delightful, for there are few families that can wake up in the cheerful morn to fry a double fugue on both sides for breakfast.

But let us not pursue these papa, mamma and baby themes further. The truth is that the portentous message of this work strikes a serious mind as nearly silly and the composition itself appears to be a cumbersome Straussian joke. It meanders through its fifty minutes in a specious yet aimless sort of fashion and after it is ended every one wonders why it did end or why it ever began.

It was performed yesterday superbly. The clarity and tonal beauty of the playing was something to be remembered. Dr. Muck is an authority on Strauss. It is well that we have heard this page of a composer's life once more, but every thinking music lover will wish that Dr. Strauss had not revealed his programme, or even hinted at the baby.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, was the solo performer of the concert. He played the B flat concerto of Brahms with splendid spirit and warm appreciation. The same composer's "Academic Overture" brought the entertainment to an end.

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State NY

STRAUSS' SYMPHONY, DR. MUCK, DIRECTOR

Superb Performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TONE POEM OF UGLINESS

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Brahms's Second Piano Concerto Finely.

Dr. Muck fulfilled what he considered a duty toward the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by playing at his afternoon concert yesterday Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." He himself is understood to be only a qualified admirer of his colleague's musical compositions, and to end his regard for his works before "Ein Heldenleben," which was the last of his series of programmatic tone poems before the "Symphonia Domestica." But this last-named achievement had been heard only once in this country, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the composer's direction, in Carnegie Hall on March 21, 1904. Dr. Muck gave it for the benefit of the unenlightened Boston public, and it was a natural ambition to include what must have been a most laborious and carefully prepared performance in his New York concerts.

And it should be said at once that this performance was a most remarkable one; a wonderful achievement for any orchestra, and one that surpassed in precision and certainty and in the reproduction of all the effects aimed at by the composer the one that he himself conducted here after innumerable rehearsals. It was listened to with close and intelligent attention by an audience that, having been frequently warned to be prompt, was almost entirely seated before the concert began. The performance was very properly warmly applauded; but it was pretty evident that the applause was not intended to extend much beyond the performance to the music itself.

But, although it was set before the audience in this admirable manner, the "Symphonia Domestica" sounded more ugly, more useless, more impossible to accept as music than ever. There never was music more artificial, more entirely manufactured than this. As the latest product of Strauss's progress in programmatic music, it denotes a drying up of the sources from which flowed the real beauties of his earlier works of the same sort. The progressive tendency in his later compositions to make pure calculation, purely intellectual processes, take the place of emotion, passion, a sense of beauty, has here reached a limit. It is entirely "cerebral," this celebration of a day in the composer's family life. That there are passages of beauty and euphony in it will not be denied. That he has at times used his enormous orchestral technique and the enormous orchestral apparatus he demands to produce combinations that subserve the real function of music is unquestionably true. It would be amazing indeed if he had not.

But in most of his score he is exclusively engaged in making a mosaic of his themes, in wholes and in fragments, by which those arbitrary and for the most part dry and musically inert symbols shall piece out a representation of extraneous ideas that the composer had in his mind as the incidents of a day's life in his family. They have the ingenuity of a Chinese puzzle and the emotional significance of one. The only portion that as a whole can fix the wearied attention of the listener is the adagio, in which there are portions of serene flow and of sustained melodic development. Here, too, are most of the beautiful passages of instrumental coloring; but they are all too brief.

Much of the instrumentation has more of that perfect recklessness and indifference to the material limitations of the several instruments of the orchestra than Strauss has ever shown elsewhere. The same sort of indifference is shown in the thematic combinations—the sort of thing that used to be called counterpoint. But counterpoint is the art of making thematic combination sound well, and this art Strauss has completely thrown overboard in the "Symphonia Domestica." He cares not at all how two, three, or any other number of his themes and thematic fragments sound together so long as he gets them together, in the fashion he has decided upon to "represent" something. The result is long stretches of page upon page of hideous cacophony crackled by instruments often strained completely out of their natural utterance, with heartbreaking difficulty to the player.

Strauss's themes themselves in this piece have little physiognomy of their own; little suggestive character, little beauty. They have a certain sort of plasticity that enables him to manipulate them, but not much besides. It results from all this that the music has less characterization, less that touches the imagination, than anything else that he has ever written. In most of his other compositions there is that which grows upon the listener by repeated hearing; that which sounds harsh or strained is resolved by understanding into something strongly expressive, and that which is confused and disheveled is brought to a focus of interest.

This is not at all the case with the "Symphonia Domestica." Heard a second time, in the superb performance that was given it yesterday, it took no firmer root than before in the listener's imagination. It sounded poorer, more impotent than [illegible] It is the stillborn child [illegible] whose genius has [illegible] course of modern [illegible] and orchestral one, that only [illegible] weary of attending; it makes [illegible] demands not only upon the physical equipment, but also upon the intellectual. But him who can master its content and its form it richly rewards; and so Mr. Gabrilowitsch was rewarded yesterday. He played it with breadth and power, with a fine intelligence and poetic feeling that reached their summit in the gravely beautiful andante. It was a pity that beauty of tone could not be added to the other excellences of his performance. The concert was closed with a brilliant performance of Brahms's academic overture.

N. Y. Tribune
Feb. 24-07

MUSIC.

Strauss and His Domestic Symphony.

The precious boon of a second hearing of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia domestica" was vouchsafed to New York by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon. In the vicinage of Boston, it is said, it was felt that a solemn obligation to Art demanded the performance of this masterwork, since the olfactories of New York had been found too delicate for the odors of "Salome." Why that obligation should have extended to New York is not clear. Monsieur, madame et bébé had their day in court here some three years ago under circumstances that looked impressive to the outer world, for then it was that the composer himself first presented his mavellous offspring. It had long been heralded in the most approved style commanded by the modern musical mountebank, but it made so little impression that the backers of the Strauss festival, of which it was the chief illumination, after announcing a repetition of the work, beat an inglorious retreat on learning that the thrifty composer, having taken their money, had sold himself to a department store which dealt in pianofortes of another brand. Memory fails to recall that the musical public of New York wept because of the deprivation.

Boston might have heard the composition then had Dr. Strauss not estimated his services as conductor of a concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund at a figure which threatened, if added to the royalty demanded for the privilege of performing the work, to swallow up all the receipts. The world has been officially told that Dr. Muck declines to give his approval to the latter-day compositions of his colleague at the Royal Opera House in Berlin. This fact, taken in connection with those already rehearsed, might well leave the popular mind in a state of bewilderment touching the reason for placing the symphony on a New York programme. Of course, it is not to be thought of for a moment that it was mercenary. The Boston orchestra enjoys such a measure of favor in New York that it needs no appeal to sensationalism to increase it. Besides, there were tangible evidences in the box office of the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall that New York has had enough of both "Salome" and the "Symphonia domestica."

One purpose the concert of last Saturday could serve, and that it did; it emphasized again the superb virtuosoship of Dr. Muck and his men. The performance of the symphony was a splendid technical feat, and because it was that it brought to convincing notice the hollowness and impotency of the music. Compared with the original performance under the baton of the composer, it was like that of "Don Quixote" under Mr. Gericke by the same organization and the "festival" performance which followed on its heels by Mr. Wetzler's orchestra, conducted by Dr. Strauss.

On the one hand, beautiful finish, wonderful clarity, and an effort to produce as much euphony as possible; the other, little else than crudeness and crassness of effects. The double figures at the end of the symphony, which the composer told his friends here was designed to depict a controversy between papa and mamma concerning baby's bath, sounded like a cosmic cataclysm under Strauss, but was gentle and almost agreeable under Muck. The performance was keenly appreciated, and Dr. Muck stood with the orchestra to acknowledge the applause which it called forth. And then the conductor, who is honest in his dislike of Strauss's latest compositions, including "Salome," provided an antidote in the shape of two compositions by Brahms—the pianoforte concerto in B flat, of which Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the solo part with fine intelligence and feeling, and the "Academic" overture. He had followed the same plan a week before in Boston.

H. E. K.

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 25 1907 State NY

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It cannot be said that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon was a delight. It began with Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which may be described as forty-six minutes of unmusical dulness, relieved by an occasional glimpse of musical beauty. This bandying about, for three-quarters of an hour, of a few insignificant themelets, inspires just two emotions—wrath and ennui. When Richard Strauss himself conducted this work here there was one redeeming feature: at the end he built up a splendid tonal climax. Even that was missing on Saturday. The rest of the programme was devoted to Brahms—his splendid "Academic Overture" and his tiresome and unpianistic second concerto for piano which Mr. Gabrilowitch played to the best of his ability.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State NY

RICHARD STRAUSS BY DR. CARL MUCK

"Symphonia Domestica" Played by Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

VIRILITY IN COMPOSITION

Strong Presentation of Home Life in Music Illustrated in Yesterday's Interpretation.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

A large and studious audience gathered yesterday at Carnegie Hall to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of Richard Strauss' "Domestic Symphony," a work which, as its title indicates, seeks to express, by means of symphonic music, the feelings and impressions of a few hours of family life.

It was not the first time that this remarkable and fascinating work has been given in New York. It was produced some three years ago in the same concert room under the direction of, but not under orchestral auspices so favorable as those bestowed by the brilliant musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But at time the lurid and blazing light of the suppressed "Salome" had not beat fiercely upon Richard Strauss and caused his name to be the household word it has now become.

Furthermore, the mere fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had undertaken to play the work attracted all those who desired to hear a lucid, intelligent and logical interpretation of the work. With Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to render the work, the question as to whether it was adequately and clearsightedly performed could not vex the higher question as to whether or not it was good art, the output of an indubitable inspiration and the annunciation of a new era in music.

Two Classes of Opponents.

The opponents of Strauss are divided into two classes—those who object to his music and those who object to his making money. We belong to neither. If after the music of "Salome" it seemed possible to remain incredulous of the genius of Richard Strauss, surely the "Symphonia Domestica" should undermine such unbelief and win the waverer. One thing, however, I hold as almost axiomatic: Like the poetry of Browning, like the "Rosmersholm" and "The Wild Duck" of Ibsen, Strauss' music is written for young men. It is written in the future, and not in the Aorist tense. Nor is the reason of this far to seek. The would-be successors of Beethoven and Brahms have hitherto been but as shadows, as men who wrote things and were not. But behind the music of the "Symphonia Domestica," as behind the pictures of Whistler and the dramas of Wagner, there is a restless, imperious, super-energetic personality—a man of musical fiber and muscle so powerfully knit, of mental web so curious and distinct, that even those who struggle against yielding to the persuasiveness of his art have reluctantly to admit the indomitable energy of the man.

Then again, Strauss says new things in a new way. He has also said old things in a new way, a fault to which creative genius has at all times been prone. All this shows why Strauss' music in all kinds has given rise to such unending argument. But, as is nearly always the case in heated discussion, the subject of the argument is the victor in the argument.

The mistake about "The Domestic Symphony" is to have affixed to it a prolonged explanation—to have said that this element in it is father, and that this is auntie, while this other is baby angrily taking his bath.

Title Tells It All.

All the explanation of this marvelous work that is required is its title, "The Domestic Symphony." Surely a symphony that would undertake to describe twelve hours of family life such as this undertakes to do would naturally and automatically suggest to its hearers masculine fatigue, impatience and passion, feminine tenderness, childish querulousness and the clash of temperament with temperament. This much Strauss has eminently succeeded in doing, and he has consequently written a suggestive and intellectual piece of music, such as at once puts him on the plane occupied by the other great intellectualists on music—Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner. It is this that attracts clever, thoughtful men to his music.

Yet again the love music in this same symphony rings with real and natural feeling. Its melodies are broad and sustained. Its ideas are fresh and poetized.

I cannot go into detail respecting his orchestral coloring. It is at once strong and varied, and no one knows better than he how to revel in the gleam and shimmer of unexpected yet supplementary ornament.

Technically the fugal writing in the last movement of the work seemed masterly and collossal. It has been very generally asserted that Dr. Muck is not in close sympathy with Strauss—it speaks well for Dr. Muck that in the first place he should have placed the work of a composer with whose aims and ideals he disagreed, and in the second he should have played it with such unerring faithfulness and conscientiousness.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 25 1907 State NY

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HEARERS OF THE "SEVEN VEILS" CRY FOR MORE.

How the Solemn Musical Portrayal of John the Baptist in a Metropolitan Encore Seemed to Echo the Best Moments of Strauss the Dreamer in a Previous Boston Symphony Matinee—And How New York Housewives Heard Mrs. Strauss Wake the Baby and Discharge the Help—The Despair of Dr. Muck and the Consolation of Mr. Conried.

If the generosity of the Metropolitan parterre on a celebrated occasion of the year left anything to be desired on Mr Conried's side, that ultimate consolation was administered last evening. Hertz and the same 106 musicians played the much-abused "Dance of the Seven Veils" to a mob of humble listeners at $1.50 or less, in the same chairs where but one audience before this had heard the new music at $10 rates. On a blizzard night, it was cold comfort at best. But the Sunday crowd was there for the one "Salome" number, and it cried loudly for more. Modestly the conductor bowed his thanks. Protestingly he took out his watch, for the hour was late, and swung the gold pendant before the spectators' eyes. This bit of pleasantry, so to speak, only increased the uproar, until in all seriousness an encore had to be given. The further selection from Strauss's proscribed opera was the sonorous and majestic passage that accompanies the Prophet John's descent into the well.

It is only another of those coincidences which have marked this amazing year. Such is the fate of music's deadly parallels, too, that the Johannine tone poem itself had a living echo at Carnegie Hall only the afternoon before, in the best passage of the "Symphonia Domestica." Dr. Karl Muck played Strauss in New York far better than he expounded his friend in his Chicago and Boston interviews. The less said and the more played—as the Boston Orchestra played Strauss—the better understanding we all may come to.

In default of a musical Pure Food law, we must thank a succession of untiring, though unhumorous commentators, both here and abroad, for the official label of "Creation and Inspection" which now attaches to the bright and not too particular middle part of the "Domestica" nocturne. As one woman at the matinée remarked, "Mr. Strauss certainly waked that baby up." And as another with the gift of second sight was heard to say, "The sounds that appealed to me were where Mrs. Strauss's servants appeared to be leaving in a body."

A man who "thinks at the top of his lungs," and who, until he wrote "Salome," had always refused to let the people see what he was thinking about, must needs be at first obscure. "A Day in the Life of a Musician," Dr. Strauss called the "Domestica." When he first produced it in New York three years ago, as he did in Germany soon after and in Paris only last season, the joke was on his critics—the present writer included—who took the nocturne of noise to be at least high noon. There is a sameness undeniable in fifty minutes of such orchestration without the light and shade of stage pictures or poetic text. But the barest sketch of evening, night and morning lends itself to symphonic ordering of events, and the time will come when Richard Strauss may be the Twentieth Century Haydn.

That last awakening double fugue was "chamber music" indeed for the virtuoso orchestra from the Hub of the Universe. They stood up to acknowledge the applause. That musical morning matinée of a composer en famille was no longer suggestive of future music's enfant terrible, whose success in New York he himself—yes, we mean Strauss—had indefinitely postponed by certain inartistic engagements that silenced his sworn champions in 1904. Has the time not yet come when the composer of "Domestica" and "Salome" may speak for himself through his music?

One thing is certain. The Strauss fever must run its course in this part of the world. If the disease is of a malignant type, some of us may die before we see the end of it. If the cases are harmless, as in kindred disorders of the artistic community in times past, then many persons will yet make a good recovery. The Bostonian production of "Domestica" was creditable to Dr. Muck's liberal spirit, for he does not love the work. The incident of two cities may have weight in determining the reported Conried plans for a "Salome" at the Boston Theatre in April. At least this plan is seriously entertained now.

[154]

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

STRAUSS' SYMPHONY, DR. MUCK, DIRECTOR

Superb Performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TONE POEM OF UGLINESS

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Plays Brahms's Second Piano Concerto Finely.

Dr. Muck fulfilled what he considered a duty toward the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by playing at his afternoon concert yesterday Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." He himself is understood to be only a qualified admirer of his colleague's musical compositions, and to end his regard for his works before "Ein Heldenleben," which was the last of his series of programmatic tone poems before the "Symphonia Domestica." But this last-named achievement had been heard only once in this country, when it had its first performance anywhere, under the composer's direction, in Carnegie Hall on March 21, 1904. Dr. Muck gave it for the benefit of the unenlightened Boston public, and it was a natural ambition to include what must have been a most laborious and carefully prepared performance in his New York concerts.

And it should be said at once that this performance was a most remarkable one; a wonderful achievement for any orchestra, and one that surpassed in precision and certainty and in the reproduction of all the effects aimed at by the composer the one that he himself conducted here after innumerable rehearsals. It was listened to with close and intelligent attention by an audience that, having been frequently warned to be prompt, was almost entirely seated before the concert began. The performance was very properly warmly applauded; but it was pretty evident that the applause was not intended to extend much beyond the performance to the music itself.

But, although it was set before the audience in this admirable manner, the "Symphonia Domestica" sounded more ugly, more useless, more impossible to accept as music than ever. There never was music more artificial, more entirely manufactured than this. As the latest product of Strauss's progress in programmatic music, it denotes a drying up of the sources from which flowed the real beauties of his earlier works of the same sort. The progressive tendency in his later compositions to make pure calculation, purely intellectual processes, take the place of emotion, passion, a sense of beauty, has here reached a limit. It is entirely "cerebral," this celebration of a day in the composer's family life. That there are passages of beauty and euphony in it will not be denied. That he has at times used his enormous orchestral technique and the enormous orchestral apparatus he demands to produce combinations that subserve the real function of music is unquestionably true. It would be amazing indeed if he had not.

But in most of his score he is exclusively engaged in making a mosaic of his themes, in wholes and in fragments, by which those arbitrary and for the most part dry and musically inert symbols shall piece out a representation of extraneous ideas that the composer had in his mind as the incidents of a day's life in his family. They have the ingenuity of a Chinese puzzle and the emotional significance of one. The only portion that as a whole can fix the wearied attention of the listener is the adagio, in which there are portions of serene flow and of sustained melodic development. Here, too, are most of the beautiful passages of instrumental coloring; but they are all too brief.

Much of the instrumentation has more of that perfect recklessness and indifference to the material limitations of the several instruments of the orchestra than Strauss has ever shown elsewhere. The same sort of indifference is shown in the thematic combinations—the sort of thing that used to be called counterpoint. But counterpoint is the art of making thematic combination sound well, and this art Strauss has completely thrown overboard in the "Symphonia Domestica." He cares not at all how two, three, or any other number of his themes and thematic fragments sound together so long as he gets them together, in the fashion he has decided upon to "represent" something. The result is long stretches of page upon page of hideous cacophony crackled by instruments often strained completely out of their natural utterance, with heartbreaking difficulty to the player.

Strauss's themes themselves in this piece have little physiognomy of their own; little suggestive character, little beauty. They have a certain sort of plasticity that enables him to manipulate them, but not much besides. It results from all this that the music has less characterization, less that touches the imagination, than anything else that he has ever written. In most of his other compositions there is that which grows upon the listener by repeated hearing; that which sounds harsh or strained is resolved by understanding into something strongly expressive, and that which is confused and disheveled is brought to a focus of interest.

This is not at all the case with the "Symphonia Domestica." Heard a second time, in the superb performance that was given it yesterday, it took no firmer root than before in the listener's imagination. It sounded poorer, more impotent than it did at first. It is the still-born child of a composer whose genius has irrevocably influenced the course of modern st, and played Brahms's second pianoforte concerto in B flat. The work is a noble and beautiful one, that solo pianists are wary of attacking; it makes severe demands not only upon the physical equipment, but also upon the intellectual. But him who can master its content and its form it richly rewards; and so Mr. Gabrilowitsch was rewarded yesterday. He played it with breadth and power, with a fine intelligence and poetic feeling that reached their summit in the gravely beautiful andante. It was a pity that beauty of tone could not be added to the other excellences of his performance. The concert was closed with a brilliant performance of Brahms's academic overture.

N. Y. Tribune
Feb. 24—07

MUSIC.

Strauss and His Domestic Symphony.

The precious boon of a second hearing of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia domestica" was vouchsafed to New York by Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday afternoon. In the vicinage of Boston, it is said, it was felt that a solemn obligation to Art demanded the performance of this masterwork, since the olfactories of New York had been found too delicate for the odors of "Salome." Why that obligation should have extended to New York is not clear. Monsieur, madame et bébé had their day in court here some three years ago under circumstances that looked impressive to the outer world, for then it was that the composer himself first presented his mavellous offspring. It had long been heralded in the most approved style commanded by the modern musical mountebank, but it made so little impression that the backers of the Strauss festival, of which it was the chief illumination, after announcing a repetition of the work, beat an inglorious retreat on learning that the thrifty composer, having taken their money, had sold himself to a department store which dealt in pianofortes of another brand. Memory fails to recall that the musical public of New York wept because of the deprivation.

Boston might have heard the composition then had Dr. Strauss not estimated his services as conductor of a concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund at a figure which threatened, if added to the royalty demanded for the privilege of performing the work, to swallow up all the receipts. The world has been officially told that Dr. Muck declines to give his approval to the latter-day compositions of his colleague at the Royal Opera House in Berlin. This fact, taken in connection with those already rehearsed, might well leave the popular mind in a state of bewilderment touching the reason for placing the symphony on a New York programme. Of course, it is not to be thought of for a moment that it was mercenary. The Boston orchestra enjoys such a measure of favor in New York that it needs no appeal to sensationalism to increase it. Besides, there were tangible evidences in the box office of the Metropolitan Opera House and Carnegie Hall that New York has had enough of both "Salome" and the "Symphonia domestica."

One purpose the concert of last Saturday could serve, and that it did; it emphasized again the superb virtuososhiip of Dr. Muck and his men. The performance of the symphony was a splendid technical feat, and because it was that it brought to convincing notice the hollowness and impotency of the music. Compared with the original performance under the baton of the composer, it was like that of "Don Quixote" under Mr. Gericke by the same organization and the "festival" performance which followed on its heels by Mr. Wetzler's orchestra, conducted by Dr. Strauss.

On the one hand, beautiful finish, wonderful clarity, and an effort to produce as much euphony as possible; the other, little else than crudeness and crassness of effects. The double figures at the end of the symphony, which the composer told his friends here was designed to depict a controversy between papa and mamma concerning baby's bath, sounded like a cosmic cataclysm under Strauss, but was gentle and almost agreeable under Muck. The performance was keenly appreciated, and Dr. Muck stood with the orchestra to acknowledge the applause which it called forth. And then the conductor, who is honest in his dislike of Strauss's latest compositions, including "Salome," provided an antidote in the shape of two compositions by Brahms—the pianoforte concerto in B flat, of which Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the solo part with fine intelligence and feeling, and the "Academic" overture. He had followed the same plan a week before in Boston.

H. E. K.

Paper Times
City New York
Date FEB 25 1907 State N Y

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It cannot be said that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon was a delight. It began with Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," which may be described as forty-six minutes of unmusical dulness, relieved by an occasional glimpse of musical beauty. This bandying about, for three-quarters of an hour, of a few insignificant themelets, inspires just two emotions—wrath and ennui. When Richard Strauss himself conducted this work here there was one redeeming feature; at the end he built up a splendid tonal climax. Even that was missing on Saturday. The rest of the programme was devoted to Brahms—his splendid "Academic Overture" and his tiresome and unpianistic second concerto for piano which Mr. Gabrilowitsch played to the best of his ability.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date FEB 24 1907 State N Y

RICHARD STRAUSS BY DR. CARL MUCK

"Symphonia Domestica" Played by Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

VIRILITY IN COMPOSITION

Strong Presentation of Home Life in Music Illustrated in Yesterday's Interpretation.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

A large and studious audience gathered yesterday at Carnegie Hall to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of Richard Strauss' "Domestic Symphony," a work which, as its title indicates, seeks to express, by means of symphonic music, the feelings and impressions of a few hours of family life.

It was not the first time that this remarkable and fascinating work has been given in New York. It was produced some three years ago in the same concert room under the direction of, but not under orchestral auspices so favorable as those bestowed by the brilliant musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But at time the lurid and blazing light of the suppressed "Salome" had not beat fiercely upon Richard Strauss and caused his name to be the household word it has now become.

Furthermore, the mere fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had undertaken to play the work attracted all those who desired to hear a lucid, intelligent and logical interpretation of the work. With Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to render the work, the question as to whether it was adequately and clearsightedly performed could not vex the higher question as to whether or not it was good art, the output of an indubitable inspiration and the annunciation of a new era in music.

Two Classes of Opponents.

The opponents of Strauss are divided into two classes—those who object to his music and those who object to his making money. We belong to neither. If after the music of "Salome" it seemed possible to remain incredulous of the genius of Richard Strauss, surely the "Symphonia Domestica" should undermine such unbelief and win the waverer. One thing, however, I hold as almost axiomatic: Like the poetry of Browning, like the "Rosmersholm" and "The Wild Duck" of Ibsen, Strauss' music is written for young men. It is written in the future, and not in the Aorist tense. Nor is the reason of this far to seek. The would-be successors of Beethoven and Brahms have hitherto been but as shadows, as men who wrote things and were not. But behind the music of the "Symphonia Domestica," as behind the pictures of Whistler and the dramas of Wagner, there is a restless, imperious, super-energetic personality—a man of musical fiber and muscle so powerfully knit, of mental web so curious and distinct, that even those who struggle against yielding to the persuasiveness of his art have reluctantly to admit the indomitable energy of the man.

Then again, Strauss says new things in a new way. He has also said old things in a new way, a fault to which creative genius has at all times been prone. All this shows why Strauss' music in all kinds has given rise to such unending argument. But, as is nearly always the case in heated discussion, the subject of the argument is the victor in the argument.

The mistake about "The Domestic Symphony" is to have affixed to it a prolonged explanation—to have said that this element in it is father, and that this is auntie, while this other is baby angrily taking his bath.

Title Tells It All.

All the explanation of this marvelous work that is required is its title, "The Domestic Symphony." Surely a symphony that would undertake to describe twelve hours of family life such as this undertakes to do would naturally and automatically suggest to its hearers masculine fatigue, impatience and passion, feminine tenderness, childish querulousness and the clash of temperament with temperament. This much Strauss has eminently succeeded in doing, and he has consequently written a suggestive and intellectual piece of music, such as at once puts him on the plane occupied by the other great intellectualists on music—Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner. It is this that attracts clever, thoughtful men to his music.

Yet again the love music in this same symphony rings with real and natural feeling. Its melodies are broad and sustained. Its ideas are fresh and poetized.

I cannot go into detail respecting his orchestral coloring. It is at once strong and varied, and no one knows better than he how to revel in the gleam and shimmer of unexpected yet supplementary ornament.

Technically the fugal writing in the last movement of the work seemed masterly and collossal. It has been very generally asserted that Dr. Muck is not in close sympathy with Strauss—it speaks well for Dr. Muck that in the first place he should have placed the work of a composer with whose aims and ideals he disagreed, and in the second he should have played it with such unerring faithfulness and conscientiousness

Paper Sun
City New York
Date FEB 25 1907 State N Y

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HEARERS OF THE "SEVEN VEILS" CRY FOR MORE.

How the Solemn Musical Portrayal of John the Baptist in a Metropolitan Encore Seemed to Echo the Best Moments of Strauss the Dreamer in a Previous Boston Symphony Matinee—And How New York Housewives Heard Mrs. Strauss Wake the Baby and Discharge the Help—The Despair of Dr. Muck and the Consolation of Mr. Conried.

If the generosity of the Metropolitan parterre on a celebrated occasion of the year left anything to be desired on Mr Conried's side, that ultimate consolation was administered last evening. Hertz and the same 106 musicians played the much-abused "Dance of the Seven Veils" to a mob of humble listeners at $1.50 or less, in the same chairs where but one audience before this had heard the new music at $10 rates. On a blizzard night, it was cold comfort at best. But the Sunday crowd was there for the one "Salome" number, and it cried loudly for more. Modestly the conductor bowed his thanks. Protestingly he took out his watch, for the hour was late, and swung the gold pendant before the spectators' eyes. This bit of pleasantry, so to speak, only increased the uproar, until in all seriousness an encore had to be given. The further selection from Strauss's proscribed opera was the sonorous and majestic passage that accompanies the Prophet John's descent into the well.

It is only another of those coincidences which have marked this amazing year. Such is the fate of music's deadly parallels, too, that the Johannine tone poem itself had a living echo at Carnegie Hall only the afternoon before, in the best passage of the "Symphonia Domestica." Dr. Karl Muck played Strauss in New York far better than he expounded his friend in his Chicago and Boston interviews. The less said and the more played—as the Boston Orchestra played Strauss—the better understanding we all may come to.

In default of a musical Pure Food law, we must thank a succession of untiring, though unhumorous commentators, both here and abroad, for the official label of "Creation and Inspection" which now attaches to the bright and not too particular middle part of the "Domestica" nocturne. As one woman at the matinée remarked, "Mr. Strauss certainly waked that baby up." And as another with the gift of second sight was heard to say, "The sounds that appealed to me were where Mrs. Strauss's servants appeared to be leaving in a body."

A man who "thinks at the top of his lungs," and who, until he wrote "Salome," had always refused to let the people see what he was thinking about, must needs be at first obscure. "A Day in the Life of a Musician," Dr. Strauss called the "Domestica." When he first produced it in New York three years ago, as he did in Germany soon after and in Paris only last season, the joke was on his critics—the present writer included—who took the nocturne of noise to be at least high noon. There is a rameness undeniable in fifty minutes of such orchestration without the light and shade of stage pictures or poetic text. But the barest sketch of evening, night and morning lends itself to symphonic ordering of events, and the time will come when Richard Strauss may be the Twentieth Century Haydn.

That last awakening double fugue was "chamber music" indeed for the virtuoso orchestra from the Hub of the Universe. They stood up to acknowledge the applause. That musical morning matinée of a composer en famille was no longer suggestive of future music's enfant terrible, whose success in New York he himself—yes, we mean Strauss—had indefinitely postponed by certain inartistic engagements that silenced his sworn champions in 1904. Has the time not yet come when the composer of "Domestica" and "Salome" may speak for himself through his music?

One thing is certain. The Strauss fever must run its course in this part of the world. If the disease is of a malignant type, some of us may die before we see the end of it. If the cases are harmless, as in kindred disorders of the artistic community in times past, then many persons will yet make a good recovery. The Bostonian production of "Domestica" was creditable to Dr. Muck's liberal spirit, for he does not love the work. The incident of two cities may have weight in determining the reported Conried plans for a "Salome" at the Boston Theatre in April. At least this plan is seriously entertained now.

Staats Zeitung

Feb. 24–07

[illegible] Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die „Sinfonia Domestica" von Richard Strauß, die Eröffnungsnummer des gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerts, bedeutet bekanntlich eine Abkehr des Komponisten von seinen programmatischen Tendenzen. In diesem Werke dominirt die „absolute Musik" fast durchweg. Wir haben uns stets unbedingt zu den Verehrern des großen Symphonikers Strauß gezählt, aber die „Domestica" erschien uns von Anfang an weder als ein gelungenes, noch als ein erquickliches Werk. Das Publikum schien gestern unserer Meinung [illegible]

[illegible]en, denn der Erfolg war ein recht schwacher, und es machten sich deutliche Zeichen der Ermüdung bemerkbar.

Der ersten Abtheilung der in einem Satz von 50 Minuten Dauer geschriebenen Symphonie liegen drei Gruppen von Hauptthemen zu Grunde, die des Mannes („gemächlich", „träumerisch", „feurig"), der Frau (welche schon im „Heldenleben" als „lebhaft", „heiter" und „graziös" geschildert wurde), und des Kindes, das naiv und einfach-musikalisch illustrirt wird. Es handelt sich demnach um autobiographische Bekenntnisse psychologischer Natur. Die Verschlingung der Hauptthemen malt das Elternglück, es folgt kindliches Spiel nach ernster Tagesarbeit; die Glocke schlägt 7 Uhr Abends und ein Wiegenlied ertönt, dem sich ein zärtliches Duo anschließt. Nachdem die Glocke 7 Uhr früh angezeigt, folgt ein ehelicher Streit, der heiter und erfreulich ausgeht. Musikalisch gesprochen folgt einem Allegro-Satz mit Einführung der Themen bestimmtere musikalische Gestaltung in einem D-dur-Satz. Es folgt eine Art Scherzo, hierauf die erwähnten lyrischen Episoden und ein durch Wärme und Phantasie ausgezeichnetes Adagio von großem Wohllaut. Für die glänzende Doppelfuge hat sich der Komponist seine ganze polyphone Kunst und den vom „Till Eulenspiegel" her bekannten musikalischen Witz aufgespart, aber es fehlen auch unbarmherzige Kakophonien nicht. Das Werk zeigt im Ganzen den Meister formenbildender Kunst, aber die Themen sind kurzathmig, von geringer Erfindungskraft und oft gesucht-einfach und volksthümlich.

Dr. Muck, der sich erst kürzlich in einem Interview als Gegner der späteren Orchesterwerke Richard Strauß' ausgesprochen hatte, ließ die "Domestica" seine Abneigung nicht entgelten. Er dirigirte das überaus anspruchsvolle Werk mit Feuer und liebevollem Eingehen auf alle Einzelheiten und das Orchester klang in gewohnter Meisterschaft und Tonschönheit.

Nach dem kontrapunktischen Freud und Leid im Hause Strauß wirkte das zweite Piano-Concert von Johannes Brahms wie eine Erlösung. Man kann dieses zum erstenmal vom Komponisten selbst am 26. Dezember 1880 in einem Wiener philharmonischen Concert vorgetragene Concert mit vollem Recht eine „Symphonie mit obligatem Klavier" nennen, denn erstlich ist seine Form mit den vier Sätzen den üblichen drei der Klavier-Concerte gegenüber auffallend, und dann ist der Klavierpart vollständig mit der Orchesterstruktur verwoben, und dem Piano werden in jedem Satz nur wenige Solo-Takte gegönnt. Auf den herrlichen ersten Satz, dessen heiteres Kraftgefühl wie von warmem Sonnenschein durchschimmert ist, folgt ein energisches, überaus frisches Allegro passionato, ein regulares Scherzo, das sich ungemein bravourös und glänzend giebt. Dem sangbaren Andante in B-dur wohnt keine Spur von den gewohnten grüblerischen Andantes des früheren Brahms inne, es ist im Gegentheil von zartem, lieblichen Charakter. Das Finale, ein Allegro moderato in B-dur, ist von hinreißender Wirkung.

Herr Gabrilowitsch hat sich durch die sehr bemerkenswerthe Wiedergabe des schwierigen Werkes wieder als Pianist von hohen Gaben proklamirt. Den ersten Satz haben wir allerdings schon großzügiger gehört, aber er entfaltete im zweiten eine sehr anerkennenswerthe durchgeistigte Bravour und Spannkraft, dem dritten verlieh er feine Grazie, die nur selten an die frühere Manirirtheit dieses Künstlers gemahnte, und mit dem Finale erreichte er den Höhepunkt. Das Publikum rief den Künstler sechs oder sieben Mal enthusiastisch hervor.

Den glänzenden Abschluß bildete die „Akademische Fest-Ouverture" von Brahms. Genialer und freigebiger hat noch kein Graduirter für die ihm erwiesene Ehre quittirt, als Brahms, der sich damit für seine Promotion zum Ehrendoktor der Philosophie bei der altberühmten [illegible] bedanken wollte.

[illegible] Humor gebietet. Die „Mädchen [illegible] pianissimo mit einem reizenden, prickelnden Allegro-Thema in C-moll, von den Violinen staktato vorgewagen, um bald darauf in das bekannte stimmungsvolle Studentenlied „Wir hatten gebaut ein stattliches Haus" überzugehen. Nach gemeinsamer Durchführung dieser Themen tritt das bekannte „Fuchsenlied" („Wer kommt da von der Höh'") als Seitenthema auf und verbreitet köstliches Behagen um sich. Zwei Fagotte, von Bratschen und Celli pizzicati umschmeichelt, bringen das Thema, das dann von allen Instrumenten fortissimo übernommen [illegible] sich Brahms als Jubel- und Fest-Gesang die friedliche Studenten-Marseillaise, das „Gaudeamus igitur" aufgespart, von auf und abwirbelnden Passagen der Streicher begleitet und umspielt. Aus diesem Werk klingt ein Nachhall „alter Burschenherrlichkeit". Jugenderinnerungen steigen auf, man sieht sich wieder im Kreis wildfröhlicher Gesellen, und dieses oder jenes bemooste Haupt wischt sich wohl gar einen nassen Tropfen vom Aug.

H.

Paper Mail

City [illegible] New York

Date State N Y

STRAUSS AND HIS MUSICAL DIARY

No True Power in the "Symphonia Domestica" Played by Boston Orchestra.

Richard Strauss's musical jokes are apt to be drawn out to lengths either tiresome or irritating to American listeners. With all the plausible cajolery and allowable brutality of "Till Eulenspiegel," that orchestral portrait of the legendary German rogue is too extended, too verbose. And when one penetrates into the intimacies of Strauss's own household, as the hearer of the "Symphonia Domestica" is forced to do, the composer's egotistical humor taxes the patience severely.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony orchestra played this amazing composition of Strauss's with brilliant efficiency on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall, but even their superlative performance could not conceal the commonplace quality of the themes, token of the feeble inspiration that produced this music, or the composer's readiness to assume that any combination of notes whatever will prove pleasing or endurable to the ear. Strauss at his best, as in "Tod und Verklarung," and parts of "Zarathustra," is a towering figure; Strauss in the moods of the "Domestica" s simply a bore.

But while Strauss's ideas here are weak and his programme trivial, his mastery of orchestral color remains absolute. So various and dazzling are the clothes in which these uninteresting musical thoughts are dressed that they outshine nearly anything else in the repertory. Even after the intermission that followed the "Symphonia Domestica," the Brahms piano concerto in B flat seemed dull in orchestration and of little color charm, and the playing of Ossip Bahrilowitsch did little to restore it to its pristine glories. The Strauss composition should have come at the end of the programme.

Paper Telegram

City New York

Date FEB 25 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony Concert—Domestic Pictures by R. Strauss

POSSIBLY a few rarely strong minded mortals resisted the temptation to read the "programme" of the Strauss "Symphonia Domestica," as given at length in the Boston Symphony booklet, and they reaped the reward of their self-control during the first fifty minutes of the Boston Symphony fourth afternoon concert Saturday at Carnegie Hall. It is reasonable to suppose that Mr. Strauss is a man of some mental capacity, and that if he has an idea there is something beyond caprice behind it. Before the first presentation of the "Symphonia Domestica" he refused to give any more definite "programme" than that suggested by the simple title. He declared that he wished the composition to be heard first as music, pure and simple.

Any one who listened to it Saturday as music found it good music, interesting music, melodic, fresh and poignantly harmonic music, music with new rhythms and musical devices used in new and pleasing ways. Whoever listened to it with his eye on the book trying to extract the elusive "baby's bath" theme and the "easy going" husband theme lost much and gained little. And this loss would have been saved them if they had followed the composer's advice. Doubtless reference to the programme during a second hearing of the composition would uncover the subtle humor of the thing. Indeed, the "Symphonia Domestica" reveals Strauss in his best assumption of the part of the Mr. George Bernard Shaw of music. It is the best of music, but there is a little quirk in it that suggests that this big intellect is making sly fun of the smaller ones in the audience and would not be above some stupendous absurdity to draw the stupid applause of the fakers.

But is the Sinfonia Domestica really a tone poem of domesticity? Does it produce in the listener any domestic emotions, bring to the surface any domestic memories, paint any loved interiors? No. It is clever musical trickery, and any one who should hunt for any real emotion in it would hunt in vain. There is more of the real feeling for home, wife and children, for the beloved surroundings, the peace and delight of the fireside in one bar of Wagner's Siefried Idyl than in the whole fifty minutes of Strauss—and Wagner, in writing the Idyl, was not any too sincere.

If Strauss really meant to express his thoughts about his home, wife and children, there is reason to be sorry for all three—since he seems to take them all as a joke. It was in bad taste to have chosen such a subject, and it was inartistic to have wasted such good music on it; and wasted it is, for without the "programme" it becomes a musical ragbag, and perhaps, after all, that is what it is, but the rags are beautiful ones.

The remainder of the concert was devoted to Brahms—the Concerto No. 2, in B flat major, and the Academic Overture. The soloist was Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Notes in the booklet would have made the audience believe this concerto long and uninteresting. It is neither; in fact, it has things to interest in every bar. In many ways it represents the ablest kind of concerto writing. In few concertos is the piano so wonderfully welded into the whole. As a rule it becomes an embroidery instrument and its part seems an afterthought and just glued on. Brahms in this second concerto makes his piano an instrument for enforcing his musical point, breaking in on the orchestra antiphonally. He gives it just those parts that would be most grateful and effective for it and avoids making it merely a show instrument. The result is a composition for two choirs, piano and orchestra, that has, in a remarkable degree, that perfection of form which was Brahms' special aim after beauty of musical idea. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance was splendid intellectually and technically. He left little to be desired, and the audience gave him his deserts. Even Mr. Muck seemed to enjoy his work.

Paper Globe

City New York

Date [illegible]/State N. Y.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

RICHARD STRAUSS'S "Sinfonia Domestica," which had not been performed here since it was played under the leadership of the composer and for the first time in public nearly three years ago, was the main offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The "programme" of the work has been widely exploited; the failure of the composer to portray recognizably concrete objects has been loudly proclaimed. For the time being it is well enough to look on the symphony as absolute music, or at least music whose "programme" can be outlined in a few words and borne in mind without undue effort of memory and continual reference to explanatory notes. So regarded the work is undeniably trying on the listener by reason of its great and unbroken length—[illegible] minutes of most intricate music without a pause. And yet much of it is undeniably beautiful. The means employed to the end are enormous, but the wonder is that the composer treats his vast orchestra with such continence and indulges so little in immoderate sound. Only in the final section does the family speech become Brobdingnagian, and a house divided against itself rock on its foundations.

After Strauss, Brahms. The second piano concerto of the elder master continued the concert, and his "Academic Overture" completed it. These are Brahms at respectively his most ingratiating and his most genial. Yet even so, their relative sobriety was pleasant after the kaleidoscopic tone color of Strauss. Ossip Gabrilowitsch played most sympathetically the difficult piano part in the concerto. This concerto Mr. Joseffy has made in a way his own. Mr. Gabrilowitsch braves a dangerous comparison when he essays it here, and it must be admitted that at times he suffers by the comparison. Mr. Joseffy's perfect fusion of the solo instrument with the orchestra in the heavenly andante, he does not, for instance, attain. But aside from Mr. Joseffy we know of no pianist who could more safely attempt the work than Mr. Gabrilowitsch

Staats Zeitung

Feb. 24–07

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die „Sinfonia Domestica" von Richard Strauß, die Eröffnungsnummer des gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerts, bedeutet bekanntlich eine Abkehr des Komponisten von seinen programmatischen Tendenzen. In diesem Werke dominirt die „absolute Musik" fast durchweg. Wir haben uns stets unbedingt zu den Verehrern des großen Symphonikers Strauß geschlagen, aber die „Domestica" erschien uns von Anfang an weder als ein gelungenes, noch als ein erquickliches Werk. Das Publikum schien gestern unserer Meinung

[illegible]ein, denn der Erfolg war ein recht schwacher, und es machten sich deutliche Zeichen der Ermüdung bemerkbar.

Der ersten Abtheilung der in einem Satz von 50 Minuten Dauer geschriebenen Symphonie liegen drei Gruppen von Hauptthemen zu Grunde, die des Mannes („gemächlich", „träumerisch", „feurig"), der Frau (welche schon im „Heldenleben" als „lebhaft", „heiter" und „graziös" geschildert wurde), und des Kindes, das naiv und einfach-musikalisch illustrirt wird. Es handelt sich demnach um autobiographische Bekenntnisse psychologischer Natur. Die Verschlingung der Hauptthemen malt das Elternglück, es folgt kindliches Spiel nach ernster Tagesarbeit; die Glocke schlägt 7 Uhr Abends und ein Wiegenlied ertönt, dem sich ein zärtliches Duo anschließt. Nachdem die Glocke 7 Uhr früh angezeigt, folgt ein ehelicher Streit, der heiter und erfreulich ausgeht. Musikalisch gesprochen folgt einem Allegro-Satz mit Einführung der Themen bestimmtere musikalische Gestaltung in einem D-dur-Satz. Es folgt eine Art Scherzo, hierauf die erwähnten lyrischen Episoden und ein durch Wärme und Phantasie ausgezeichnetes Adagio von großem Wohllaut. Für die glänzende Doppelfuge hat sich der Komponist seine ganze polyphone Kunst und den vom „Till Eulenspiegel" her bekannten musikalischen Witz aufgespart, aber es fehlen auch unbarmherzige Kakophonien nicht. Das Werk zeigt im Ganzen den Meister formenbildender Kunst, aber die Themen sind kurzathmig, von geringer Erfindungskraft und oft gesucht-einfach und volksthümlich.

Dr. Muck, der sich erst kürzlich in einem Interview als Gegner der späteren Orchesterwerke Richard Strauß' ausgesprochen hatte, ließ die "Domestica" seine Abneigung nicht entgelten. Er dirigirte das überaus anspruchsvolle Werk mit Feuer und liebevollem Eingehen auf alle Einzelheiten und das Orchester klang in gewohnter Meisterschaft und Tonschönheit.

Nach dem kontrapunktischen Freud und Leid im Hause Strauß wirkte das zweite Piano-Concert von Johannes Brahms wie eine Erlösung. Man kann dieses zum erstenmal vom Komponisten selbst am 26. Dezember 1880 in einem Wiener philharmonischen Concert vorgetragene Concert mit vollem Recht eine „Symphonie mit obligatem Klavier" nennen, denn erstlich ist seine Form mit den vier Sätzen den üblichen drei der Klavier-Concerte gegenüber auffallend, und dann ist der Klavierpart vollständig mit der Orchesterstruktur verwoben, und dem Piano werden in jedem Satz nur wenige Solo-Takte gegönnt. Auf den herrlichen ersten Satz, dessen heiteres Kraftgefühl wie von warmem Sonnenschein durchschimmert ist, folgt ein energisches, überaus frisches Allegro passionato, ein regulares Scherzo, das sich ungemein bravourös und glänzend giebt. Dem sangbaren Andante in B-dur wohnt keine Spur von den gewohnten grüblerischen Andantes des früheren Brahms inne, es ist im Gegentheil von zartem, lieblichen Charakter. Das Finale, ein Allegro moderato in B-dur, ist von hinreißender Wirkung.

Herr Gabrilowitsch hat sich durch die sehr bemerkenswerthe Wiedergabe des schwierigen Werkes wieder als Pianist von hohen Gaben proklamirt. Den ersten Satz haben wir allerdings schon großzügiger gehört, aber er entfaltete im zweiten eine sehr anerkennenswerthe durchgeistigte Bravour und Spannkraft, dem dritten verlieh er feine Grazie, die nur selten an die frühere Manirirtheit dieses Künstlers gemahnte, und mit dem Finale erreichte er den Höhepunkt. Das Publikum rief den Künstler sechs oder sieben Mal enthusiastisch hervor.

Den glänzenden Abschluß bildete die „Akademische Fest-Ouverture" von Brahms. Genialer und freigebiger hat noch kein Graduirter für die ihm erwiesene Ehre quittirt, als Brahms, der sich damit für seine Promotion zum Ehrendoktor der Philosophie bei der altberühmten Breslauer U[illegible]erstät bedanken wollte.

[illegible]einen Meisters, [illegible] Humor gebietet. Die „Akademische" beginnt pianissimo mit einem reizenden, prickelnden Allegro-Thema in C-moll, von den Violinen staktato vorgetragen, um bald darauf in das bekannte stimmungsvolle Studentenlied „Wir hatten gebaut ein stattliches Haus" überzugehen. Nach gemeinsamer Durchführung dieser Themen tritt das bekannte „Fuchsenlied" („Wer kommt da von der Höh'") als Seitenthema auf und verbreitet köstliches Behagen um sich. Zwei Fagotte, von Bratschen und Celli pizzicati umschmeichelt, bringen das Thema, das dann von aller Instrumenten fortissimo übernommen wird. [illegible] hat sich Brahms als Jubel- und Fest-Gesang die friedliche Studenten-Marseillaise, das "Gaudeamus igitur" aufgespart, von auf und abwirbelnden Passagen der Streicher begleitet und umspielt. Aus diesem Werk klingt ein Nachhall „alter Burschenherrlichkeit". Jugenderinnerungen steigen auf, man sieht sich wieder im Kreis wildfröhlicher Gesellen, und dieses oder jenes bemooste Haupt wischt sich wohl gar einen nassen Tropfen vom Aug.

H.

Paper Mail

City New York

Date State N Y

STRAUSS AND HIS MUSICAL DIARY

No True Power in the "Symphonia Domestica" Played by Boston Orchestra.

Richard Strauss's musical jokes are apt to be drawn out to lengths either tiresome or irritating to American listeners. With all the plausible cajolery and allowable brutality of "Till Eulenspiegel," that orchestral portrait of the legendary German rogue is too extended, too verbose. And when one penetrates into the intimacies of Strauss's own household, as the hearer of the "Symphonia Domestica" is forced to do, the composer's egotistical humor taxes the patience severely.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony orchestra played this amazing composition of Strauss's with brilliant efficiency on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall, but even their superlative performance could not conceal the commonplace quality of the themes, token of the feeble inspiration that produced this music, or the composer's readiness to assume that any combination of notes whatever will prove pleasing or endurable to the ear. Strauss at his best, as in "Tod und Verklarung," and parts of "Zarathustra," is a towering figure; Strauss in the moods of the "Domestica" is simply a bore.

But while Strauss's ideas here are weak and his programme trivial, his mastery of orchestral color remains absolute. So various and dazzling are the clothes in which these uninteresting musical thoughts are dressed that they outshine nearly anything else in the repertory. Even after the intermission that followed the "Symphonia Domestica," the Brahms piano concerto in B flat seemed dull in orchestration and of little color charm, and the playing of Ossip Gabrilowitsch did little to restore it to its pristine glories. The Strauss composition should have come at the end of the programme.

Paper Telegram

City New York

Date FEB 25 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony Concert—Domestic Pictures by R. Strauss

POSSIBLY a few rarely strong minded mortals resisted the temptation to read the "programme" of the Strauss "Symphonia Domestica," as given at length in the Boston Symphony booklet, and they reaped the reward of their self-control during the first fifty minutes of the Boston Symphony fourth afternoon concert Saturday at Carnegie Hall. It is reasonable to suppose that Mr. Strauss is a man of some mental capacity, and that if he has an idea there is something beyond caprice behind it. Before the first presentation of the "Symphonia Domestica" he refused to give any more definite "programme" than that suggested by the simple title. He declared that he wished the composition to be heard first as music, pure and simple.

Any one who listened to it Saturday as music found it good music, interesting music, melodic, fresh and poignantly harmonic music, music with new rhythms and musical devices used in new and pleasing ways. Whoever listened to it with his eye on the book trying to extract the elusive "baby's bath" theme and the "easy going" husband theme lost much and gained little. And this loss would have been saved them if they had followed the composer's advice. Doubtless reference to the programme during a second hearing of the composition would uncover the subtle humor of the thing. Indeed, the "Symphonia Domestica" reveals Strauss in his best assumption of the part of the Mr. George Bernard Shaw of music. It is the best of music, but there is a little quirk in it that suggests that this big intellect is making sly fun of the smaller ones in the audience and would not be above some stupendous absurdity to draw the stupid applause of the fakers.

But is the Sinfonia Domestica really a tone poem of domesticity? Does it produce in the listener any domestic emotions, bring to the surface any domestic memories, paint any loved interiors? No. It is clever musical trickery, and any one who should hunt for any real emotion in it would hunt in vain. There is more of the real feeling for home, wife and children, for the beloved surroundings, the peace and delight of the fireside in one bar of Wagner's Siefried Idyl than in the whole fifty minutes of Strauss—and Wagner, in writing the Idyl, was not any too sincere.

If Strauss really meant to express his thoughts about his home, wife and children, there is reason to be sorry for all three—since he seems to take them all as a joke. It was in bad taste to have chosen such a subject, and it was inartistic to have wasted such good music on it; and wasted it is, for without the "programme" it becomes a musical ragbag, and perhaps, after all, that is what it is, but the rags are beautiful ones.

The remainder of the concert was devoted to Brahms—the Concerto No. 2, in B flat major, and the Academic Overture. The soloist was Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Notes in the booklet would have made the audience believe this concerto long and uninteresting. It is neither; in fact, it has things to interest in every bar. In many ways it represents the ablest kind of concerto writing. In few concertos is the piano so wonderfully welded into the whole. As a rule it becomes an embroidery instrument and its part seems an afterthought and just glued on. Brahms in this second concerto makes his piano an instrument for enforcing his musical point, breaking in on the orchestra antiphonally. He gives it just those parts that would be most grateful and effective for it and avoids making it merely a show instrument. The result is a composition for two choirs, piano and orchestra, that has, in a remarkable degree, that perfection of form which was Brahms' special aim after beauty of musical idea. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance was splendid intellectually and technically. He left little to be desired, and the audience gave him his deserts. Even Mr. Muck seemed to enjoy his work.

Paper Globe

City New York

Date [illegible]/State N. Y.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

RICHARD STRAUSS'S "Sinfonia D[illegible] mestica," which had n[illegible] performed here since it was played under the leadership of the composer and for the first time in public nearly three years ago, was the main offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The "programme" of the work has been widely exploited; the failure of the composer to portray recognizably concrete objects has been loudly proclaimed. For the time being it is well enough to look on the symphony as absolute music, or at least music whose "programme" can be outlined in a few words and borne in mind without undue effort of memory and continual reference to explanatory notes. So regarded the work is undeniably trying on the listener by reason [illegible] its great and unbroken length—[illegible] minutes of most intricate music without a pause. And yet much of it is undeniably beautiful. The means employed to the end are enormous, but the wonder is that the composer treats his vast orchestra with such continence and indulges so little in immoderate sound. Only in the final section does the family speech become Brobdingnagian, and a house divided against itself rock on its foundations.

After Strauss, Brahms. The second piano concerto of the elder master continued the concert, and his "Academic Overture" completed it. These are Brahms at respectively his most ingratiating and his most genial. Yet even so, their relative sobriety was pleasant after the kaleidoscopic tone color of Strauss. Ossip Gabrilowitsch played most sympathetically the difficult piano part in the concerto. This concerto Mr. Joseffy has made in a way his own. Mr. Gabrilowitsch braves a dangerous comparison when he essays it here, and it must be admitted that at times he suffers by the comparison. Mr. Joseffy's perfect fusion of the solo instrument with the orchestra in the heavenly andante, he does not, for instance, attain. But aside from Mr. Joseffy we know of no pianist who could more safely attempt the work than Mr. Gabrilowitsch

[155]

FIFTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY QUARTET

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, Assists in Fine Programme.

ROMANTIC MUSIC OF TWO PERIODS PLAYED

Debussy's Quartet in G Minor Gave Chief Charm to the Evening.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, assisted by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist, gave its fifth concert last night in Chickering Hall. The programme was as follows: Debussy, quartet in G minor; Faure, sonata in A major for piano and violin; Schumann, trio in F major for piano, violin and 'cello op. 80.

It was a pleasure to hear again the quartet of the remarkable Claude Debussy. Mr. Hess is to be thanked for having the courage as well as the taste to put it on the programme. For, strange as it may seem to all true lovers of music, who, respecting the masterpieces of the dead, wish to know what composers now living do and are curious concerning new developments and forms of expression in music, there are some who protest against the introduction of "ultra modern" compositions in symphony and chamber concerts, and protest as though they had suffered a personal injury.

The Daily Telegraph of London published on Jan. 28 a report of a lecture by Sir Alexander Mackenzie on "The French Impressionists." This worthy Scot, who has written a ton or two of orthodox notes, had much to say against the music of a notorious offender, a dissolute harmonist named Debussy. He brought up the old charges that were in turn made against Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Wagner, and he invented other ones. Debussy's music, it appears, is naughty and intolerable, because it is called into being chiefly "by the observation of the clouds, of special lights, or by the perfume of flowers, the gambols of satyrs and fauns, the sounds of bells, the voices of birds."

This is a gratifying step in advance. When Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's poem was performed for the first time in London, several journals published the title as "The Afternoon of a Fawn."

Sir Alexander finds "no real polyphonic invention" in Debussy's music; there are no moments of repose or contrast; the themes cannot be developed. Truly a dangerous man, this Debussy, and, according to Sir Alexander, the school is dangerous to its disciples, for its "obvious limitations admit of very little scope for individuality or the impression of much or any personal stamp." This, coming from Sir Alexander, is peculiarly hard.

The quartet played last night is one of Debussy's earlier works, yet it shows many of the qualities that endear the composer to some and irritate Sir Alexander et al., who wish the "individuality" of others to be as theirs. But was Sir Alexander ever imitated? Perish the thought! In the first three movements of this quartet we find the great and rare quality of high poetical imagination. This music is wholly "absolute." There is no hint at faun or satyr, sound of bell or vision of clouds sailing majestically like galleons or scudding in fright at the sight of the baleful moon. The hearer is left to his own thoughts. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Not only is the musical thought imaginative, but the treatment of the thought is singularly beautiful, nor should the fact that the expression is often unusual disconcert any reasonable person. What a dull, drab world it would be if all modern composers should sedulously imitate Sir Alexander, a formalist from his youth up! The question is not whether Debussy's music is like that of others, whether it is of "good and regular standing," like an orthodox member in the old-fashioned meeting house; the question is this: "Is the music beautiful?"

The trouble with Debussy is that he is neither an orthodox deacon in the true church, nor a noisy "bounder." His appeal is to them that dream dreams; that see in a forest something more than cordwood; that hear other voices in the sea than those of fashionable bathers.

By the side of this quartet with its phrases of tenderness, its occasional passion—for here Debussy is for once passionate—its exquisite colors and subtly disturbing rhythms, its hints at melancholy vistas, the sonata of Gabriel Faure seemed for the most part made up of endless repetitions of comparatively unimportant statements. There is beauty in the second movement, beauty that is too soon wire-drawn. As the sonata was played last night, the scherzo, especially the haunting trio, gave the most pleasure. Mr. Hess, who was eminently in the vein, was ably assisted by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, an excellent ensemble player.

There was another movement that was an intimate appeal to the hearer, the second in the trio by Schumann. Here, too, is truly romantic music, music that once was thought as irregular, foolishly fantastical, and harmonically licentious as that of Debussy is today by the stern-faced lovers of the obvious.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Debussy. Quartette in G minor.
G. Faure. Sonata for Violin and Piano, A major.
Schumann. Piano Trio. F major. Op. 80.
Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

After Mr. Gabrilowitsch's excellent showing in the difficult Brahms concerto, at the last symphony concert, we were quite prepared to find him very thorough in the two works of romantic chamber music given at this concert. We speak of these as "romantic," for, although the classical form may be traced in them and they are both technically "Sonatas," the spirit pervading both works is essentially modern and there is that freedom of expression and that fullness of emotion that belongs to the more romantic school of music.

It was just this poetic quality that evoked the best powers of the young pianists, who, we are glad to see, is developing into something more than a concert virtuoso. The support by Prof. Hess in both works and Mr. Warnke in the last, was only what one might have expected from such artists. Prof. Hess has at times a tendency to over-emphasize his part of the work, but his technique and his phrasing are always musicianly. Mr. Warnke is gaining somewhat in breadth of tone.

He has been somewhat too conservative in this matter; once he gives us the fullness of tone that Schroeder, Schulz, or Hekking produce, and he will be the equal of any violoncellist that we could have. It was therefore with especial pleasure that we noticed more of abandon and less of reserve in his playing in the Trio on this occasion.

The Trio itself is more contrapuntal and more clearly in form than much of Schumann's chamber-music, and while it does not attain the height of the piano quintette, Op. 44, or the quartette, Op. 47, it is still a good example of the composer's style before his powers began to decay. It falls in the year 1847, before his brain disease had made perceptible progress.

As it was it towered over the other numbers of the programme, especially in its slow movement, which was given with especial fullness of tone and noble expression.

The Faure sonata formed an excellent prelude to the above-described work. It is somewhat in the German, even in the Schumann style. The turbulence and passion of the first movement and the "innigkeit" of the slow movement are Schumann in a large degree. It was most interesting to note a modern Frenchman following the tender poetry of the Teutons rather than the acrid complexities of the neo-Gallic vein. Yet there were complexities and to spare in the difficult Scherzo, although in the Trio of this the melodic grace of Faure was again to the front.

The two artists made a thorough success of this work. We consider it one of the best violin sonatas that ever came out of France. Mr. Gabrilowitsch did not push the piano too much into the foreground, as is too often the case when a concert soloist indulges in chamber-music. The ensemble was, if anthing, forced a trifle from the other side.

The Andante was effective in its elegiac quality, although it seemed rather long for its contents. The Scherzo was given with much delicacy and the breadth of the finale deserved the hearty applause it won. There was a recall at the end.

If the two works described were romantic in character the Dubussy quartette was hysterical. It seems wild, eccentric and incoherent. It has the sharpest possible contrasts. It is by turns furious and languorous, and its sudden skips seem to be without rhyme or reason. The composer seems determined on only one thing—to be original if the heavens fall! One can become original, in form, in style, as Beethoven did in his quartette in C sharp minor, but this radical style ought to be offset by ideas, and there ought to be some inherent necessity, in the themes or figures to condone the departure from all precedent. We must confess that we discern nothing of this palliative character in the Debussy work in question. It seems bizarre without reason, incendiary music which yet cannot set the Thames on fire.

The first movement seemed to propound the question—"Rede me this riddle?"—but it was short and the agony was soon over. The second movement was very perturbed and ran greatly to pizzicato effects. It may have been a Scherzo but it was about as playful as a midnight murder. It was, nevertheless, impressive and finely played.

In the slow movement there was some beautiful viola and violoncello work exquisitely done. The finale had a very painful fugato and was altogether unpleasant. We could not comprehend the work, although we tried loyally.

Louis C. Elson.

Paper Town & Country
City New York
Date Mar 2/07 State N Y

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of February twenty-first, Dr. Karl Muck produced the "Apprentice Sorcerer," by Dukas, in a very acceptable manner, bringing out the strength, the ordonance, local color and justness of expression which is so characteristic of this very good work. The soloist of the evening, Mme. Olga Samaroff, played the Tschaikowsky Concerto in B flat minor with wonderful breadth of tone in the first movement and intensity of expression in the second, and all through showed qualities which make her one of the best feminine pianistes. The Sibelius Symphony, Number One, was less pleasing, although very well rendered.

FEBRUARY 20.

DEBUSSY AND FAURE

A Concert of French Chamber Music by the Symphony Quartet—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Assists

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which took place last evening in Chickering Hall, brought forward Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, and a programme of somewhat unfamiliar pieces, including Debussy's "Quartet in G Minor," op. 10; Fauré's "Sonata for Piano and Violin," op. 10; and Schumann's "Trio," op. 80.

Debussy's ingenious and captivating quartet was composed as long ago as 1893; it was played for the first time in Paris by the Ysaye Quartet in December of that year. It was first performed in Boston by the Kneisel Quartet, March 10, 1902. Since that time we have heard much of Debussy's music, his prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," his nocturne for orchestra, "The Blessed Damozel"; we are tolerably familiar with the more intimately personal idiom of his piano pieces, and a few of his songs, although his masterpiece, the epoch-making opera "Palleas and Melisande," exists for most of us only in the imperfect version of its piano score. Nevertheless, it has been made possible to reconstruct the progress of his individuality, and to characterize the relative value of this quartet. It is for the most part logical and eminently sane music, audacious in its harmonic idiom, piquant and effective, if at times inordinately difficult in its quartet. In comparison with many of Debussy's later works it is distinguished by its direct simplicity, absence of artificiality, its conspicuous skill in thematic transformation, and its steadily poetic and picturesque sentiment. In date of composition it stands between the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the nocturnes, although that "Pelleas and Melisande" was also underway is evident for the occasional premonitions of the latter's harmonic idiom which occur in the quartet.

The different versions of the principal theme of the first movement as they appear in the substitute for a scherzo, and as the second subject of the finale give a pleasing unity to the work, without even a suspicion of deliberate craftsmanship. The slow movement is vibrant with delicate and imaginative poetry, although the middle episode is perhaps deficient in sentiment. The performance was on the whole excellent, although the lack of sensuous beauty of tone was apparent in the first movement, there were frequent slips in intonation. Some exception might be taken to the tempi of both the first and second movements. However, it was a pleasure to hear again in its entirety this work of a uniquely gifted composer.

Gabriel Fauré's sonata for piano and violin belongs to an earlier epoch in the development of French music than the Debussy quartet. Although an early work, it has nevertheless some claims to be considered a classic among modern sonatas. First performed at a concert of the National Music Society in Paris, it was given at a Trocadéro concert June 5, 1878. It has made its way in Germany, and it was played here as long ago as Jan. 28, 1892, by Mr. Baermann and Mr. Lœffler. As a whole, it contains little of the marvellous poetry and exotic individuality of the composer of the songs "Les Berceux," "Les Roses d'Ispahan," "Au Cimitière," "Clais de Lune," and other riper examples of Fauré's inimitable art. It is characterized by polished form, elegance of sentiment, and refinement rather than strength. In spite of much that is indisputably French in its construction and individuality there are traces of affectionate assimilation of Schumann. The gem of the work is the scherzo, a scintallating flash of brilliancy. The performance by Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Hess was more notable for its fire than for sympathetic adjustment of ensemble, although the brilliance of effect was undeniable.

The Schumann trio, seldom heard, came at the end of a programme containing music of unusual individuality and striking glitter of effect. It was inevitable that the first movement of the trio should fail to interest by comparison, for it is not striking either in its sentiment or the novelty of its treatment. In the two succeeding movements the real Schumann is again in evidence, the depth of feeling in one and the bland grace of the other were authoritative in their expressive mood. The finale at least found a fitting close. The performance was accurate and spontaneous, although Mr Gabrilowitsch was again somewhat too prominent. It is against all reason to expect a pianist with a decided personality to suppress it all entirely in the altruistic ideal of chamber music. The piano cannot but surmount the lesser volume of the strings. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is a brilliant performer of chamber music; he is the possessor of an assertive temperament. It is perhaps not his fault if the attention of the listeners is drawn to him.

E. B. H.

[156]

VOL. [illegible], NO. 57.

TUESDAY, FEB. 26, 1907.

FIFTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY QUARTET

Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, Assists in Fine Programme.

ROMANTIC MUSIC OF TWO PERIODS PLAYED

Debussy's Quartet in G Minor Gave Chief Charm to the Evening.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, assisted by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist, gave its fifth concert last night in Chickering Hall. The programme was as follows: Debussy, quartet in G minor; Faure, sonata in A major for piano and violin; Schumann, trio in F major for piano, violin and 'cello op. 80.

It was a pleasure to hear again the quartet of the remarkable Claude Debussy. Mr. Hess is to be thanked for having the courage as well as the taste to put it on the programme. For, strange as it may seem to all true lovers of music, who, respecting the masterpieces of the dead, wish to know what composers now living do and are curious concerning new developments and forms of expression in music, there are some who protest against the introduction of "ultra modern" compositions in symphony and chamber concerts, and protest as though they had suffered a personal injury.

The Daily Telegraph of London published on Jan. 28 a report of a lecture by Sir Alexander Mackenzie on "The French Impressionists." This worthy Scot, who has written a ton or two of orthodox notes, had much to say against the music of a notorious offender, a dissolute harmonist named Debussy. He brought up the old charges that were in turn made against Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Wagner, and he invented other ones. Debussy's music, it appears, is naughty and intolerable, because it is called into being chiefly "by the observation of the clouds, of special lights, or by the perfume of flowers, the gambols of satyrs and fauns, the sounds of bells, the voices of birds."

This is a gratifying step in advance. When Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's poem was performed for the first time in London, several journals published the title as "The Afternoon of a Fawn."

Sir Alexander finds "no real polyphonic invention" in Debussy's music; there are no moments of repose or contrast; the themes cannot be developed. Truly a dangerous man, this Debussy, and, according to Sir Alexander, the school is dangerous to its disciples, for its "obvious limitations admit of very little scope for individuality or the impression of much or any personal stamp." This, coming from Sir Alexander, is peculiarly hard.

The quartet played last night is one of Debussy's earlier works, yet it shows many of the qualities that endear the composer to some and irritate Sir Alexander et al., who wish the "individuality" of others to be as theirs. But was Sir Alexander ever imitated? Perish the thought! In the first three movements of this quartet we find the great and rare quality of high poetical imagination. This music is wholly "absolute." There is no hint at faun or satyr, sound of bell or vision of clouds sailing majestically like galleons or scudding in fright at the sight of the baleful moon. The hearer is left to his own thoughts. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Not only is the musical thought imaginative, but the treatment of the thought is singularly beautiful, nor should the fact that the expression is often unusual disconcert any reasonable person. What a dull, drab world it would be if all modern composers should sedulously imitate Sir Alexander, a formalist from his youth up! The question is not whether Debussy's music is like that of others, whether it is of "good and regular standing," like an orthodox member in the old-fashioned meeting house; the question is this: "Is the music beautiful?"

The trouble with Debussy is that he is neither an orthodox deacon in the true church, nor a noisy "bounder." His appeal is to them that dream dreams; that see in a forest something more than cordwood; that hear other voices in the sea than those of fashionable bathers.

By the side of this quartet with its phrases of tenderness, its occasional passion—for here Debussy is for once passionate—its exquisite colors and subtly disturbing rhythms, its hints at melancholy vistas, the sonata of Gabriel Faure seemed for the most part made up of endless repetitions of comparatively unimportant statements. There is beauty in the second movement, beauty that is too soon wire-drawn. As the sonata was played last night, the scherzo, especially the haunting trio, gave the most pleasure. Mr. Hess, who was eminently in the vein, was ably assisted by Mr. Gabrilowitsch, an excellent ensemble player.

There was another movement that was an intimate appeal to the hearer, the second in the trio by Schumann. Here, too, is truly romantic music, music that once was thought as irregular, foolishly fantastical, and harmonically licentious as that of Debussy is today by the stern-faced lovers of the obvious.

FEBRUARY 26, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Debussy. Quartette in G minor.
G. Faure. Sonata for Violin and Piano, A major.
Schumann. Piano Trio. F major. Op. 80.
Pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

After Mr. Gabrilowitsch's excellent showing in the difficult Brahms concerto, at the last symphony concert, we were quite prepared to find him very thorough in the two works of romantic chamber music given at this concert. We speak of these as "romantic," for, although the classical form may be traced in them and they are both technically "Sonatas," the spirit pervading both works is essentially modern and there is that freedom of expression and that fullness of emotion that belongs to the more romantic school of music.

It was just this poetic quality that evoked the best powers of the young pianists, who, we are glad to see, is developing into something more than a concert virtuoso. The support by Prof. Hess in both works and Mr. Warnke in the last, was only what one might have expected from such artists. Prof. Hess has at times a tendency to over-emphasize his part of the work, but his technique and his phrasing are always musicianly. Mr. Warnke is gaining somewhat in breadth of tone.

He has been somewhat too conservative in this matter; once he gives us the fullness of tone that Schroeder, Schulz, or Hekking produce, and he will be the equal of any violoncellist that we could have. It was therefore with especial pleasure that we noticed more of abandon and less of reserve in his playing in the Trio on this occasion.

The Trio itself is more contrapuntal and more clearly in form than much of Schumann's chamber-music, and while it does not attain the height of the piano quintette, Op. 44, or the quartette, Op. 47, it is still a good example of the composer's style before his powers began to decay. It falls in the year 1847, before his brain disease had made perceptible progress.

As it was it towered over the other numbers of the programme, especially in its slow movement, which was given with especial fullness of tone and noble expression.

The Faure sonata formed an excellent prelude to the above-described work. It is somewhat in the German, even in the Schumann style. The turbulence and passion of the first movement and the "innigkeit" of the slow movement are Schumann in a large degree. It was most interesting to note a modern Frenchman following the tender poetry of the Teutons rather than the acrid complexities of the neo-Gallic vein. Yet there were complexities and to spare in the difficult Scherzo, although in the Trio of this the melodic grace of Faure was again to the front.

The two artists made a thorough success of this work. We consider it one of the best violin sonatas that ever came out of France. Mr. Gabrilowitsch did not push the piano too much into the foreground, as is too often the case when a concert soloist indulges in chamber-music. The ensemble was, if anthing, forced a trifle from the other side.

The Andante was effective in its elegiac quality, although it seemed rather long for its contents. The Scherzo was given with much delicacy and the breadth of the finale deserved the hearty applause it won. There was a recall at the end.

If the two works described were romantic in character the Dubussy quartette was hysterical. It seems wild, eccentric and incoherent. It has the sharpest possible contrasts. It is by turns furious and languorous, and its sudden skips seem to be without rhyme or reason. The composer seems determined on only one thing—to be original if the heavens fall! One can become original, in form, in style, as Beethoven did in his quartette in C sharp minor, but this radical style ought to be offset by ideas, and there ought to be some inherent necessity, in the themes or figures to condone the departure from all precedent. We must confess that we discern nothing of this palliative character in the Debussy work in question. It seems bizarre without reason, incendiary music which yet cannot set the Thames on fire.

The first movement seemed to propound the question—"Rede me this riddle?"—but it was short and the agony was soon over. The second movement was very perturbed and ran greatly to pizzicato effects. It may have been a Scherzo but it was about as playful as a midnight murder. It was, nevertheless, impressive and finely played.

In the slow movement there was some beautiful viola and violoncello work exquisitely done. The finale had a very painful fugato and was altogether unpleasant. We could not comprehend the work, although we tried loyally.

Louis C. Elson.

Paper Town & Country

City New York

Date Mar 2/07 State N Y

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of February twenty-first, Dr. Karl Muck produced the "Apprentice Sorcerer," by Dukas, in a very acceptable manner, bringing out the strength, the ordonance, local color and justness of expression which is so characteristic of this very good work. The soloist of the evening, Mme. Olga Samaroff, played the Tschaikowsky Concerto in B flat minor with wonderful breadth of tone in the first movement and intensity of expression in the second, and all through showed qualities which make her one of the best feminine pianistes. The Sibelius Symphony, Number One, was less pleasing, although very well rendered.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT
FEBRUARY 26, 1907

DEBUSSY AND FAURE

A Concert of French Chamber Music by the Symphony Quartet—Mr. Gabrilowitsch Assists

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which took place last evening in Chickering Hall, brought forward Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, and a programme of somewhat unfamiliar pieces, including Debussy's "Quartet in G Minor," op. 10; Fauré's "Sonata for Piano and Violin," op. 10; and Schumann's "Trio," op. 80.

Debussy's ingenious and captivating quartet was composed as long ago as 1893; it was played for the first time in Paris by the Ysaye Quartet in December of that year. It was first performed in Boston by the Kneisel Quartet, March 10, 1902. Since that time we have heard much of Debussy's music, his prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," his nocturne for orchestra, "The Blessed Damozel"; we are tolerably familiar with the more intimately personal idiom of his piano pieces, and a few of his songs, although his masterpiece, the epoch-making opera "Palleas and Melisande," exists for most of us only in the imperfect version of its piano score. Nevertheless, it has been made possible to reconstruct the progress of his individuality, and to characterize the relative value of this quartet. It is for the most part logical and eminently sane music, audacious in its harmonic idiom, piquant and effective, if at times inordinately difficult in its quartet. In comparison with many of Debussy's later works it is distinguished by its direct simplicity, absence of artificiality, its conspicuous skill in thematic transformation, and its steadily poetic and picturesque sentiment. In date of composition it stands between the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the nocturnes, although that "Pelleas and Melisande" was also underway is evident for the occasional premonitions of the latter's harmonic idiom which occur in the quartet. The different versions of the principal theme of the first movement as they appear in the substitute for a scherzo, and as the second subject of the finale give a pleasing unity to the work, without even a suspicion of deliberate craftsmanship. The slow movement is vibrant with delicate and imaginative poetry, although the middle episode is perhaps deficient in sentiment. The performance was on the whole excellent, although the lack of sensuous beauty of tone was apparent in the first movement, there were frequent slips in intonation. Some exception might be taken to the tempi of both the first and second movements. However, it was a pleasure to hear again in its entirety this work of a uniquely gifted composer.

Gabriel Fauré's sonata for piano and violin belongs to an earlier epoch in the development of French music than the Debussy quartet. Although an early work, it has nevertheless some claims to be considered a classic among modern sonatas. First performed at a concert of the National Music Society in Paris, it was given at a Trocadéro concert June 5, 1878. It has made its way in Germany, and it was played here as long ago as Jan. 28, 1892, by Mr. Baermann and Mr. Lœffler. As a whole, it contains little of the marvellous poetry and exotic individuality of the composer of the songs "Les Berceux," "Les Roses d'Ispahan," "Au Cimitiére," "Clais de Lune," and other riper examples of Fauré's inimitable art. It is characterized by polished form, elegance of sentiment, and refinement rather than strength. In spite of much that is indisputably French in its construction and individuality there are traces of affectionate assimilation of Schumann. The gem of the work is the scherzo, a scintallating flash of brilliancy. The performance by Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Hess was more notable for its fire than for sympathetic adjustment of ensemble, although the brilliance of effect was undeniable.

The Schumann trio, seldom heard, came at the end of a programme containing music of unusual individuality and striking glitter of effect. It was inevitable that the first movement of the trio should fail to interest by comparison, for it is not striking either in its sentiment or the novelty of its treatment. In the two succeeding movements the real Schumann is again in evidence, the depth of feeling in one and the bland grace of the other were authoritative in their expressive mood. The finale at least found a fitting close. The performance was accurate and spontanaeous, although Mr Gabrilowitsch was again somewhat too prominent. It is against all reason to expect a pianist with a decided personality to suppress it all entirely in the altruistic ideal of chamber music. The piano cannot but surmount the lesser volume of the strings. Mr. Gabrilowitsch is a brilliant performer of chamber music; he is the possessor of an assertive temperament. It is perhaps not his fault if the attention of the listeners is drawn to him.

E. B. H.

[156]

January 19, 1907

MUSICAL AMERICA

AMERICAN COMPOSITION INTRODUCED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

George W. Chadwick's Symphonic Poem "Cleopatra" Presented to New York Audience by Dr. Karl Muck at Carnegie Hall Concert.

GEORGE W. CHADWICK

American Composer Whose Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra" was Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York Last Saturday

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, last Saturday, was notable for the presentation of a new and meritorious American composition, a symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," by George W. Chadwick. The remainder of the programme was devoted to familiar numbers, including Sir Edward Elgar's brilliant but too extended overture, "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Mr. Chadwick's "Cleopatra," which was first played at the Worcester Festival of 1905, is one of his most recent as well as one of his most ambitious works. In going to the story of Antony and Cleopatra Mr. Chadwick has taken a theme that has many allurements and many possibilities in the delineation of character, of passion, and of incident. He has used these rather as poetic hints than as outlines to be definitely followed in the music, which shows forth the characters of the voluptuous Egyptian Queen, and of the Roman warrior, the death of the ill-fated Antony, and the lament of Cleopatra, and their burial together in one grave. Many of the themes are unimportant of themselves, without deep musical significance, the most striking and characteristic as well as the most plastic being those attributed to Cleopatra, languorous and passionate. There is much highly colored and bold orchestration. One of the most successful episodes is at the very beginning, when the music echoes the plashing waters through which Cleopatra's voyage is made.

The work received an enthusiastic and painstaking performance that put everything in Mr. Chadwick's score in its finest aspect. It was the first time that Dr. Muck has performed here a work by an American composer, and the appreciation and devotion that were given to it by conductor and players alike were most grateful.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date FEB 21 1907 State Md

MELBA PLEASES HEARERS

Lyric Crowded To Doors At Boston Symphony Concert.

THE PROGRAM ONE OF BEAUTY

Society And Music Lovers Mingle In Biggest Audience Of Present Series Of Concerts.

Mme. Melba's concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth of the present season, was from a social as well as an artistic standpoint the most brilliant event of its kind given in Baltimore this season. For the first time in the series the Lyric was crowded almost to the doors. Every seat in the spacious building had been sold the latter part of last week.

Society was represented by its most stylishly clad devotees, while the artistic persons of Baltimore's population were present in numbers. That the announcement of Melba as the evening's soloist was responsible for the presence of such a brilliant audience there is no doubt. Fully an hour before the concert commenced the audience began to arrive in great numbers.

Hundreds of those who arrived, believing that they would be able to purchase tickets, hastened to the box office only to be greeted with the oft-repeated reply of the man behind the window, "Standing room only." This fact, however, seemed only to whet the desire of the applicants to gain admission, and they seemed thoroughly grateful for this privilege.

Once seated, the crowd was interesting in the delightful commingling of society—those members of it, at least, who are to be seen when the events are of an almost distinctly social nature—with those who represent the support upon which such great organizations as the Boston Symphony Orchestra depend; those who love music for music's sake and who are willing to delve deep into their pockets in order to gratify their genuine desire to hear this, the grandest and noblest of arts.

Orchestra At Its Best.

Aside from Melba even, the concert was a great one. Dr. Muck seemed more imposing and devoted to his work than ever before; the orchestra itself never played better nor could a more interesting program have been desired. Indeed, the concert of the orchestra even, eliminating the singing of Melba, was of such fine quality that it should have of itself drawn such a substantial audience as that which greeted it.

Following was the program given:

Overture—In the South, op. 50.....Elgar

Scena—Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly, from L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato.....Handel

Flute obligato by Mr. Andre Maquarre.

Recitative and Aria—Ah, fors e lui, from La Traviata (Act 1, Scene 6).....Verdi

Symphony No. 1, in E minor.....Sibelius

That Melba is still a great artist—one of the greatest of living sopranos—there is no question. That her voice, on the other hand, has not improved since she was last heard here several years ago is equally unquestionable. In its truest sense she is a finished, devoted artist, and she has lost none of this devotion. Her voice seems still to retain its purity, and she possesses, almost to the extent she did years ago when she was in the zenith of her fame, that wonderfully brilliant tone quality and the fine art of pure, crisp enunciation.

Freshness Of Voice Missed.

But the inevitable is beginning to manifest itself. That freshness which is the underlying, genuinely attractive element of a great voice is on the wane. An artistically, well-trained voice without this sparkling, stimulating freshness loses its most essential qualification. Few artists, as a matter of fact, appear to retain it after a certain period in a lengthy and more or less strenuous professional career. One of these most fortunate in this respect is Patti, who, at the venerable age of 60 odd years, still has a voice said at present to be as rich and fresh almost as when she first became the idol of music-loving people on two continents.

On the other hand, she still sings with all the dramatic intensity for which she is noted, and in the "La Traviata" recitative and aria she seemed the embodiment of all that Verdi desired of his Violetta, scoring another notable triumph to the already long list that she has enjoyed in that role.

In the Handel scene the singer was also at her best, the purity of her velvety top notes, echoing the flute obligato, outrivaling in melting sweetness the notes of the instrument itself.

The Sibelius symphony is a comparative novelty on Baltimore programs, but nevertheless of decided interest. It is decidedly Finnish in conception, rugged in construction and typical in its arrangement. Dr. Muck gave the number a splendid, conscientious reading that only caused the great audience to sigh with regret at its conclusion.

The Elgar overture is a beautiful, sprightly composition, conveying its message of joy and elation through a decidedly fine orchestral number.

Some Of Those Present.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs.—
Dr. Henry B. Jacobs,
B. Howard Haman,
Allan McLane,
Summerfield Baldwin,
Joseph W. Valiant,
Frank Gosnell,
Dr. H. Woods, Jr.,
Eugene S. Newbold,
J. Seth Hopkins,
Harry Lee,
Wm. Janney Hull,
J. M. Easter,
Charles Dohme,
Rev. A. Guttmacher,
F. V. Little,
Pittsburg;
M. B. Gressitt,
Dr. D. W. Cathell,
Sewell S. Watts,
Prof. S. Steinmueller,
Judge T. J. Morris,
Dr. B. M. Hopkinson,
W. H. Thomas,
Wm. H. Thomas, Jr.,
M. S. Griffith,
M. C. Hodgdon,
John S. Gibbs,
H. A. Orrick,
Prof. C. F. Muller,
Charles P. Engee,
W. W. Symington,
J. E. Griffith,
S. Grinsfelder,
Ernest J. Clark,
John Howard Herrick,
George Morrow,
Dr. L. K. Hirschberg,
W. Clarence Stewart,
E. L. Bowen,
Dean Perkins,
Louis P. Mass,
H. A. Beasley,
M. Strauss,
F. T. Turner,
H. S. Grimth,
H. Idding,
Albert H. Ellis,
I. L. Kemper,
Joseph L. Weyrich,
Mrs.—
Richard Cromwell,
E. A. Clark,
Gaun M. Hutton,
Hardie Ridgely,
Clinton L. Riggs,
Thomas S. Clark,
C. Morton Stewart,
E. Turner,
Leslie Holloway,
Alfred Thompson,
S. S. Greenwell,
H. F. Chappell,
C. J. Carey,
C. N. Patterson,
J. Stahn,
A. W. Brinkman,
W. S. Brinkman,
James C. Leonard,
Cambridge, Md.;
W. Kinsey,
D. G. McIntosh,
S. B. Waite,
Frank Bolton,
Kennedy Cromwell,
J. C. Lewit,
Richmond, Va.;
Violett
Chicago;
Allen S. Will,
G. M. Lamb,
Max Hochschild,
Jackson Piper,
Benjamin Woolford,
A. K. Benton,
F. S. Matthews,
Charles T. Matthews,
Edward Pagenstecher,
F. H. Clark,
D. Williams,
S. D. Schmucker,
R. Straus,
John King,
Bertha Miller,
S. S. Greenwald,
J. S. Kempe,
W. G. Miller,
Frank Kerr,
Misses—
Elizabeth C. McLane,
Dorothy S. Baldwin,
Cromwell,
Alice C. Robinson,
Annie Rell,
Harrisburg, Pa.;
Emily Valiant,
Grace Dammann,
Hunter,
Annapolis;
Mary N. Willoughby,
Lurman,
Alice Baldwin,
Pauline Baldwin,
Lillie Graham,
Mary Smith,
Norfolk, Va.;
Marguerite Babillon,
Bertha Lee Jenkins,
Elizabeth Ligan,
M. Phelps,
Grace Darlington,
Bessie Disney,
Berdie Miller,
Waite,
Carolyn Corner,
Florence Thomas,
Winnifred Hazeltine,
M. Hogg,
Wilson,
Aileen de La Tour,
Laura Canby,
E. L. Dannenberg,
H. A. Stewart,
C. Y. Dulaney,
E. McCormick,
C. McCormick,
C. L. Bacon,
A. L. Bacon,
A. R. Ault,
Lillian Wolfe,
Minna Frank,
Lillian Blum,
Bloomfield,
F. T. Haugh,
Agnes Gill,
J. S. Armstrong,
E. King,
Edith W. Miller,
Buckler,
Mary Hall,
Elizabeth Hall,
Bentley,
Katherine French,
Dougherty,
Gottlieb,
V. Dare,
Elsa Murray,
Elizabeth Miller,
L. Hagendorp,
E. Hagendorp,
E. Prather,
Emma Engelhaupt,
Jennie Hasman,
Burton,
Grace Wrigging,
Grace Burkhardt,
K. Scofield,
Elsie Scofield,
A. Scofield,
M. Phelps,
Grace Parker,
Marian Abrahams,
B. Belt,
M. Belt,
Messrs.—
George May,
Dr. R. B. Warfield,
Frank Frick,
Walter de C. Postmey,
Dr. Thos. L. Shearer,
St. George L. Sioussat,
Albert Sioussat,
J. Wilson Leakin,
Dr. Chas. M. Franklin,
Frank E. Beck,
Hugh Jenkins,
J. Harry Tregoe,
Craig McLanahan,
H. S. Duer,
Samuel Deatham,
S. J. Van Lill,
B. F. Lewis,
Claude Seals,
S. H. Wing,
J. F. Young,
J. G. Nassauer,
A. H. Levine,
Albert Gustav,
Harry S. Weyrich,
Willard A. Baldwin,
George W. Taylor,
A. D. Graham,
F. M. Dushane,
Max Goldberg,
F. B. Crawford,
H. L. Duer,
George Oehm,
C. E. Hunter,
A. T. Smith,
H. C. Buckmister,
Frank J. Clunet,
A. C. Feldstein,
H. H. Bland,
A. N. Martin,
Prof. M. Bloomfield,
Jacob M. Moses,
R. K. Uhler,
S. E. Whiteman,
Rev. Father Gaynor,
Frederick Gottlieb,
Harry Fahnestock,
Joseph Goldman,
Frederick Muesse,
R. K. Wood,
C. Grove,
Howard P. Sadtler,
W. G. Dougherty,
A. L. Muller,
C. Bryan,
J. Blankenship,
W. G. Sproston,
B. Scofield,
T. Sheban,
W. Lentz,
A. Piper,
Theodore Horn,
Charles L. Myer,
Wesley Tucker,
Thomas P. Stran,
J. D. Guy,
J. Shulman,
C. A. Hermann,
Howard Munnikhuysen,
A. S. Greenfield,
Henry Moore,
A. K. Blunt,
Wm. George Reid,
T. W. Donoho,
R. B. Robinson,
William Dugent,
A. Spear,
M. K. Heyn,
Henry Sharpless,
Henry Freedman,
K. Miller,
M. T. McDonald,
D. P. Foley,
S. A. Rice,
J. F. Hawkins,
John Turner,
H. C. Weetz,
Dan Partridge,
Alabama;
E. Andrew,
J. W. Mealy,
C. M. Eyster,
J. W. Cole,
F. B. Davis,
J. Duff,
A. V. Lightbourne,
A. G. Moorehead,
O. M. DuBran,
C. H. Meyer,
G. Petheram,
M. Steufel,
Ridgley,
Helen Van Sickle,
K. J. Hinseman,
Margaret Stick,
M. S. Bash,
Carrie Cole,
Edith Jones,
Juliet Wolf,
Daisy Read,
Gertrude C. Paul,
Gertrude Kuper,
Mary Meisendorfer,
Evelyn Cohen,
E. P. Moore,
Bernardine Bunnecke,
Mary Hutchins,
Ellen Goldberg,
Elizabeth Hopewell,
J. G. Wilson,
Margaret Maas,
M. Hochschild,
Florence Hochschild,
Gretchen Hochschild,
Bessie Blum,
Lillian Blum,
Rita Van Lill,
Mary Corbett,
Nellie Corbett,
F. Kennedy,
A. Kennedy,
Henrietta Baker,
E. Muhly,
Mollie Goldman,
Mabel Kaufman,
L. Adler,
Florence Ingram,
Elsie Oehm,
Buelah Jones,
I. Kann,
Minnie Spring,
Molly Weston Wood,
H. B. Hunt,
Millie Honig,
Fannie Morgan,
L. Walters,
Elizabeth Caldwell,
Elsie Dugent,
L. Weer,
Cordelia Spear,
Biola Rosenheim,
Selma Rosenheim,
Elisabeth Scott,
Clara C. Groppell,
Mary Cathcart,
A. V. Patterson,
Adeline Stahn,
R. Bingham,
Adele Dohme,
M. Dohme,
Eleanor Beily,
M. S. Corson,
Helen Bond,
Minnie Lear,
Kate Janney,
A. P. Janney,
Nora Miller,
M. C. Lewis,
May Harvey,
E. F. Young,
F. Kempey,
A. Burke,
M. Alice Wood,
Edith Ganat,
C. W. L. Johnson,
Max Honig,
J. S. Rosenheim,
Dr. R. N. Duffy,
F. C. Flinn,
S. Broadbent,
C. Malin,
E. Kuenne,
Nathan Block,
R. M. Hunter,
Annapolis;
Louis de La Tour,
A. E. Robinson,
M. J. L. Kreil, Jr.,
G. M. Lamb,
W. A. Frey,
F. P. Armiger,
W. A. McLeran,
G. H. Rice,
H. C. Williams,
Frank Bolton,
Louis Schloss,
William Gottlieb,
New York;
Dr. William M. Lewis,
S. L. Hayman,
D. S. Elliott,
Sumner Parker,
R. W. Pesch,
John Van Sickle,
William Reiser,
Charles Lapides,
H. Mark,
C. T. Cahn,
Myer Silesky,
George Bunnecke,
Soloman Rosenstein,
C. M. [illegible]

Paper Times Democrat
City New Orleans
Date FEB 23 1907 State La

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Olga Samaroff, Pianist, Gets Enthusiastic Welcome With Boston Orchestra.

Many features made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra more than usually interesting last night at the Baptist Temple. The programme was almost evenly divided between Russian music and a French symphony, whose author, Berlioz, is believed to have had considerable influence upon the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff, the composer of the opening overture. Then, too, there was Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who was anticipated for an earlier symphony concert here. Though her name is as Russian as the composer Tschaikowsky, she is an American by birth, hailing from San Antonio, Texas, via Paris and Berlin. Just two years ago she was introduced to Boston, and having stood the critical test of that exacting musical [illegible] she has since scored notable successes in concert work, privately and [illegible]

Madame Samaroff proved herself last evening to be an artist with whom concert critics will have to reckon. She is attractive in appearance, though not [illegible] in her stage manners, nor yet in [illegible] arrangements at the piano. [illegible] remarkably equipped with [illegible] requisite—a fine [illegible] clearness of tone. Her scale passages were particularly smooth and clean cut. The composition which she played was Tschaikowsky's Pianoforte Concerto, op. 23, No. 1, in B flat minor with the orchestra. It is a stupendous work, taxing every phase of a pianist's ability, particularly force. In this the pianist was not lacking, though there was not the charm and warmth in her playing that thrills. The audience was duly appreciative of her splendid performance, and would [illegible] her [illegible] in a quieter vein.

The concerto is one rich in theme and elaborate in its modifications and harmonies, thus affording great possibilities for the orchestra, which were made much of last evening. Dr. Muck's ability as a conductor is being admired more and more with each added concert which he gives in this borough.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture was a brilliant and charming one, and in the words of a critic, "his inspiration is sometimes exquisite." The orchestra interpreted the number with its remarkable skill and finish.

The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with a viola solo played by Mr. E. Ferir, of the orchestra. It theme was suggested by Byron's "Childe Harold," and its development suggests the words of melancholy, happiness and joy, then the evening hymn of pilgrims, a serenade and lastly an orgy of brigands. As a psychological study set to music, with the viola always representing the hero, it is interesting; but in such contrast, musically, to the elaborate orchestration of the earlier part of last evening's programme as to become a little tedious. The audience only accorded it mild applause.

The last symphony concert of this season will take place on March 22 at the Baptist Temple.

[157]

January 19, 1907

MUSICAL AMERICA

AMERICAN COMPOSITION INTRODUCED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

George W. Chadwick's Symphonic Poem "Cleopatra" Presented to New York Audience by Dr. Karl Muck at Carnegie Hall Concert.

GEORGE W. CHADWICK

American Composer Whose Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra" was Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York Last Saturday

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, last Saturday, was notable for the presentation of a new and meritorious American composition, a symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," by George W. Chadwick. The remainder of the programme was devoted to familiar numbers, including Sir Edward Elgar's brilliant but too extended overture, "In the South"; Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Mr. Chadwick's "Cleopatra," which was first played at the Worcester Festival of 1905, is one of his most recent as well as one of his most ambitious works. In going to the story of Antony and Cleopatra Mr. Chadwick has taken a theme that has many allurements and many possibilities in the delineation of character, of passion, and of incident. He has used these rather as poetic hints than as outlines to be definitely followed in the music, which shows forth the characters of the voluptuous Egyptian Queen, and of the Roman warrior, the death of the ill-fated Antony, and the lament of Cleopatra, and their burial together in one grave. Many of the themes are unimportant of themselves, without deep musical significance, the most striking and characteristic as well as the most plastic being those attributed to Cleopatra, languorous and passionate. There is much highly colored and bold orchestration. One of the most successful episodes is at the very beginning, when the music echoes the plashing waters through which Cleopatra's voyage is made.

The work received an enthusiastic and painstaking performance that put everything in Mr. Chadwick's score in its finest aspect. It was the first time that Dr. Muck has performed here a work by an American composer, and the appreciation and devotion that were given to it by conductor and players alike were most grateful.

Paper Times Democrat
City New Orleans
Date FEB 23 19[illegible] State La

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Olga Samaroff, Pianist, Gets Enthusiastic Welcome With Boston Orchestra.

Many features made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra more than usually interesting last night at the Baptist Temple. The programme was almost evenly divided between Russian music and a French symphony, whose author, Berlioz, is believed to have had considerable influence upon the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff, the composer of the opening overture. Then, too, there was Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who was anticipated for an earlier symphony concert here. Though her name is as Russian as the composer Tschaikowsky, she is an American by birth, hailing from San Antonio, Texas, via Paris and Berlin. Just two years ago she was introduced to Boston, and having stood the critical test of that exacting musical clientele she has since scored notable successes in concert work, privately and with orchestras.

Madame Samaroff proved herself last evening to be an artist with whom concert critics will have to reckon. She is attractive in appearance, though not graceful in her stage manners, nor yet in some of her arm movements at the piano. She is, however, admirably equipped with one indispensable requisite—a fine technique. She was always sure of her notes and played with great precision and clearness of tone. Her scale passages were particularly smooth and clean cut. The composition which she played was Tschaikowsky's Pianoforte Concerto, op. 23, No. 1, in B flat minor with the orchestra. It is a stupendous work, taxing every phase of a pianist's ability, particularly force. In this the pianist was not lacking, though there was not the charm and warmth in her playing that thrills. The audience was duly appreciative of her splendid performance, and would [illegible] heard a solo in lighter vein.

The concerto is one rich in theme and elaborate in its modifications and harmonies, thus affording great possibilities for the orchestra, which were made much of last evening. Dr. Muck's ability as a conductor is being admired more and more with each added concert which he gives in this borough.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture was a brilliant and charming one, and in the words of a critic, "his inspiration is sometimes exquisite." The orchestra interpreted the number with its remarkable skill and finish.

The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with a viola solo played by Mr. E. Ferir, of the orchestra. It theme was suggested by Byron's "Childe Harold," and its development suggests the words of melancholy, happiness and joy, then the evening hymn of pilgrims, a serenade and lastly an orgy of brigands. As a psychological study set to music, with the viola always representing the hero, it is interesting; but in such contrast, musically, to the elaborate orchestration of the earlier part of last evening's programme as to become a little tedious. The audience only accorded it mild applause.

The last symphony concert of this season will take place on March 22 at the Baptist Temple.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date [illegible] State Md

MELBA PLEASES HEARERS

Lyric Crowded To Doors At Boston Symphony Concert.

THE PROGRAM ONE OF BEAUTY

Society And Music Lovers Mingle In Biggest Audience Of Present Series Of Concerts.

Mme. Melba's concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth of the present season, was from a social as well as an artistic standpoint the most brilliant event of its kind given in Baltimore this season. For the first time in the series the Lyric was crowded almost to the doors. Every seat in the spacious building had been sold the latter part of last week.

Society was represented by its most stylishly clad devotees, while the artistic persons of Baltimore's population were present in numbers. That the announcement of Melba as the evening's soloist was responsible for the presence of such a brilliant audience there is no doubt. Fully an hour before the concert commenced the audience began to arrive in great numbers.

Hundreds of those who arrived, believing that they would be able to purchase tickets, hastened to the box office only to be greeted with the oft-repeated reply of the man behind the window, "Standing room only." This fact, however, seemed only to whet the desire of the applicants to gain admission, and they seemed thoroughly grateful for this privilege.

Once seated, the crowd was interesting in the delightful commingling of society—those members of it, at least, who are to be seen when the events are of an almost distinctly social nature—with those who represent the support upon which such great organizations as the Boston Symphony Orchestra depend; those who love music for music's sake and who are willing to delve deep into their pockets in order to gratify their genuine desire to hear this, the grandest and noblest of arts.

Orchestra At Its Best.

Aside from Melba even, the concert was a great one. Dr. Muck seemed more imposing and devoted to his work than ever before; the orchestra itself never played better nor could a more interesting program have been desired. Indeed, the concert of the orchestra even, eliminating the singing of Melba, was of such fine quality that it should have of itself drawn such a substantial audience as that which greeted it.

Following was the program given:

Overture—In the South, op. 50.....Elgar

Scena—Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly, from L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato.....Handel

Flute obligato by Mr. Andre Maquarre.

Recitative and Aria—Ah, fors e lui, from La Traviata (Act 1, Scene 6).....Verdi

Symphony No. 1, in E minor.....Sibelius

That Melba is still a great artist—one of the greatest of living sopranos—there is no question. That her voice, on the other hand, has not improved since she was last heard here several years ago is equally unquestionable. In its truest sense she is a finished, devoted artist, and she has lost none of this devotion. Her voice seems still to retain its purity, and she possesses, almost to the extent she did years ago when she was in the zenith of her fame, that wonderfully brilliant tone quality and the fine art of pure, crisp enunciation.

Freshness Of Voice Missed.

But the inevitable is beginning to manifest itself. That freshness which is the underlying, genuinely attractive element of a great voice is on the wane. An artistically, well-trained voice without this sparkling, stimulating freshness loses its most essential qualification. Few artists, as a matter of fact, appear to retain it after a certain period in a lengthy and more or less strenuous professional career. One of these most fortunate in this respect is Patti, who, at the venerable age of 60 odd years, still has a voice said at present to be as rich and fresh almost as when she first became the idol of musicloving people on two continents.

On the other hand, she still sings with all the dramatic intensity for which she is noted, and in the "La Traviata" recitative and aria she seemed the embodiment of all that Verdi desired of his Violetta, scoring another notable triumph to the already long list that she has enjoyed in that role.

In the Handel scene the singer was also at her best, the purity of her velvety top notes, echoing the flute obligato, outrivaling in melting sweetness the notes of the instrument itself.

The Sibelius symphony is a comparative novelty on Baltimore programs, but nevertheless of decided interest. It is decidedly Finnish in conception, rugged in construction and typical in its arrangement. Dr. Muck gave the number a splendid, conscientious reading that only caused the great audience to sigh with regret at its conclusion.

The Elgar overture is a beautiful, sprightly composition, conveying its message of joy and elation through a decidedly fine orchestral number.

Some Of Those Present.

Among those present were:

Mr. and Mrs.—
Dr. Henry B. Jacobs,
B. Howard Haman,
Allan McLane,
Summerfield Baldwin,
Joseph W. Valiant,
Frank Gosnell,
Dr. H. Woods, Jr.,
Eugene S. Newbold,
J. Seth Hopkins,
Harry Lee,
Wm. Janney Hull,
J. M. Easter,
Charles Dohme,
Rev. A. Guttmacher,
F. V. Little,
Sewell S. Watts,
Prof. S. Steinmueller,
Judge T. J. Morris,
Dr. B. M. Hopkinson,
W. H. Thomas,
Wm. H. Thomas, Jr.,
M. S. Griffith,
M. C. Hodgdon,
John S. Gibbs,
H. A. Orrick,
Prof. C. F. Muller,
Charles P. Engee,
W. W. Symington,
J. E. Griffith,
S. Grinsfelder,

Pittsburg;
M. B. Gressitt,
Dr. D. W. Cathell,
Herbert J. West,
Ernest J. Clark,
John Howard Herrick,
George Morrow,
John B. Bland,
R. H. Bland,
A. N. Martin,
Prof. M. Bloomfield,
Jacob M. Moses,
R. K. Uhler,
S. E. Whiteman,
Rev. Father Gaynor,
Frederick Gottlieb,
Harry Fahnestock,
Joseph Goldman,
Frederick Muesse,
R. K. Wood,
C. Grove,
Howard P. Sadtler,

Mrs.—
Richard Cromwell,
B. A. Clark,
Gaun M. Hutton,
Hardie Ridgely,
Clinton L. Riggs,
Thomas S. Clark,
C. Morton Stewart,
E. Turner,
Leslie Holloway,
Alfred Thompson,
S. S. Greenwell,
H. F. Chappell,
C. J. Carey,
C. N. Patterson,
J. Stahn,
A. W. Brinkman,
W. S. Brinkman,
James C. Leonard,

Cambridge, Md.;
W. Kinsey,
D. G. McIntosh,
S. R. Waite,
Frank Bolton,
Kennedy Cromwell,
J. C. Lewit,

Richmond, Va.;
Violett

Chicago;
Allen S. Will,
G. M. Lamb,
Max Hochschild,
Jackson Piper,
Benjamin Woolford,
A. K. Benton,
F. S. Matthews,
Charles T. Matthews,
Edward Pagenstecher,
F. H. Clark,
D. Williams,
S. D. Schmucker,
R. Straus,
John King,
Bertha Miller,
S. S. Greenwald,
J. S. Kempe,
W. G. Miller,
Frank Kerr,
W. G. Dougherty,
A. L. Muller,
C. Bryan,
J. Blankenship,
W. G. Sproston,
B. Scofield,
T. Sheban,
W. Lentz,
A. Piper,
Theodore Horn,
Charles L. Myer,
Wesley Tucker,
Thomas P. Stran,
J. D. Guy,
J. Shulman,
C. A. Hermann,
Howard Munnikhuysen,
A. S. Greenfield,
Henry Moore,
A. K. Blunt,
Wm. George Reid,
T. W. Donoho,
E. B. Robinson,
William Dugent,
A. Spear,
M. K. Heyn,
Henry Sharpless,
Henry Freedman,
K. Miller,
M. T. McDonald,
D. P. Foley,
S. A. Rice,
J. F. Hawkins,
John Turner,
H. C. Weetz,
Dan Partridge,

Alabama:
E. Andrew,
J. W. Mealy,
C. M. Eyster,
J. W. Cole,
F. B. Davis,
J. Duff,
A. V. Lightbourne,
A. G. Moorehead,
O. M. DuBrau,
C. H. Meyer,

Misses—
Elizabeth C. McLane,
Dorothy S. Baldwin,
Cromwell,
Alice C. Robinson,
Annie Rell,

Harrisburg, Pa.;
Emily Valiant,
Grace Dammann,
Hunter,

Annapolis;
Mary N. Willoughby,
Lurman,
Alice Baldwin,
Pauline Baldwin,
Lillie Graham,
Mary Smith,

Norfolk, Va.;
Marguerite Rabillon,
Bertha Lee Jenkins,
Elizabeth Ligan,
M. Phelps,
Grace Darlington,
Bessie Disney,
Berdie Miller,
Waite,
Carolyn Corner,
Florence Thomas,
Winnifred Hazeltine,
M. Hogg,
Wilson,
Aileen de La Tour,
Laura Canby,
E. L. Dannenberg,
H. A. Stewart,
C. Y. Dulaney,
E. McCormick,
C. McCormick,
C. L. Bacon,
A. L. Bacon,
A. R. Ault,
Lillian Wolfe,
Minna Frank,
Lillian Blum,
Bloomfield,
F. T. Haugh,
Agnes Gill,
J. S. Armstrong,
E. King,
Edith W. Miller,
Buckler,
Mary Hall,
Elizabeth Hall,
Bentley,
Katherine French,
Dougherty,
Gottlieb,
V. Dare,
Elsa Murray,
Elizabeth Miller,
L. Hagendorp,
E. Hagendorp,
E. Prather,
Emma Engelhaupt,
Jennie Hazman,
Burton,
Grace Wriggins,
Grace Burkhardt,
K. Scofield,
Elsie Scofield,
A. Scofield,
M. Phelps,
Grace Parker,
Marian Abrahams,
B. Belt,
M. Belt,
G. Petheram,
M. Steufel,
Ridgley,
Helen Van Sickle,
K. J. Hinneman,
Margaret Stick,
M. S. Bash,
Carrie Cole,
Edith Jones,
Juliet Wolf,
Daisy Read,
Gertrude C. Paul,
Gertrude Kuper,
Mary Meisendorfer,
Evelyn Cohen,
E. P. Moore,
Bernardine Bunnecke,
Mary Hutchins,
Ellen Goldberg,
Elizabeth Hopewell,
J. G. Wilson,
Margaret Maas,
M. Hochschild,
Florence Hochschild,
Gretchen Hochschild,
Bessie Blum,
Lillian Blum,
Rita Van Lill,
Mary Corbett,
Nellie Corbett,
F. Kennedy,
A. Kennedy,
Henrietta Baker,
E. Muhly,
Mollie Goldman,
Mabel Kaufman,
L. Adler,
Florence Ingram,
Elsie Oehm,
Buelah Jones,
I. Kann,
Minnie Spring,
Molly Weston Wood,
H. B. Hunt,
Millie Honig,
Fannie Morgan,
L. Walters,
Elizabeth Caldwell,
Elsie Dugent,
L. Weer,
Cordelia Spear,
Biola Rosenheim,
Selma Rosenheim,
Elizabeth Scott,
Clara C. Groppell,
Mary Cathcart,
A. V. Patterson,
Adeline Stahn,
R. Bingham,
Adele Dohme,
M. Dohme,
Eleanor Reily,
M. S. Corson,
Helen Bond,
Minnie Lear,
Kate Janney,
A. P. Janney,
Nora Miller,
M. C. Lewis,
May Harvey,
E. F. Young,
F. Kemper,
A. Burke,
M. Alice Wood,
Edith Gannt,

Messrs.—
George May,
Dr. R. B. Warfield,
Frank Frick,
Walter de C. Pomtney,
Dr. Thos. L. Shearer,
St. George L. Sioussat,
Albert Siousaat,
J. Wilson Leakin,
Dr. Chas. M. Franklin,
Frank E. Beck,
Hugh Jenkins,
J. Harry Tregoe,
Craig McLanahan,
H. S. Duer,
Samuel Dealham,
S. J. Van Lill,
B. F. Lewis,
Claude Seals,
S. H. Wing,
J. F. Young,
J. G. Nassauer,
A. H. Levine,
Albert Gustav,
Harry S. Weyrich,
Willard A. Baldwin,
George W. Taylor,
A. D. Graham,
F. M. Dushane,
Max Goldberg,
F. B. Crawford,
H. L. Duer,
George Oehm,
C. E. Hunter,
A. T. Smith,
H. C. Buckmister,
Frank J. Clunet,
A. C. Feldstein,
L. Masse,
C. W. L. Johnson,
Max Honig,
J. S. Rosenheim,
Dr. R. N. Duffy,
F. C. Flinn,
S. Broadbent,
C. Malin,
E. Kuenne,
Nathan Block,
R. M. Hunter,

Annapolis;
Louis de La Tour,
A. E. Robinson,
M. J. L. Kreil, Jr.,
G. M. Lamb,
W. A. Frey,
F. P. Armiger,
W. A. McLeran,
G. H. Rice,
H. C. Williams,
Frank Bolton,
Louis Schloss,
William Gottleib,

New York;
Dr. William M. Lewis,
S. L. Hayman,
D. S. Elliott,
Sumner Parker,
R. W. Peach,
John Van Sickle,
William Reiser,
Charles Lapides,
H. Mark,
C. T. Cahn,
Myer Silesky,
George Bunnecke,
Soloman Rosenstein,
C. M. Bensing,

[157]

Paper American
City Trenton
Date FEB 22 1907 State N J

THE BOSTONIAN ORCHESTRA.

MUSIC FROM FINLAND PROVES PLEASING.

The F Minor Symphony of Jean Sibelius Heard—A Composer Not Afraid to Write Good Tunes—Mme. Olga Samaroff and Tschaikowsky's B Flat Concerto.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Paul Dukas's delightful humoresque, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Tschaikowsky's much performed B flat concerto for piano and orchestra, with Olga Samaroff as the soloist, and Jean Sibelius's first symphony. It was one of those concerts which give much joy to the lover of good music and send the typical concert goer home wondering whether he ought to like it or not.

Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, is not an old acquaintance of local music lovers, and they are not quite sure yet whether he is to be approved or condemned. His "Lemmenkainen Journeys Homeward" was made known to us by the Philharmonic Society so lately as February, 1902, and that was the beginning of our knowledge of his art. His first symphony, which is in the popular key of E minor, though composed in 1899, was unfamiliar. It will probably not remain unfamiliar, for it ought to be repeated.

Possibly sticklers for the conventional disposition of themes in the first movement and the inevitable repeat of the exposition part will hold that this composition is not a symphony at all, but just an orchestral color piece. The truth is, however, that while the antique pattern is ignored, the established fundamentals of symphonic form are not. The first movement sets forth its leading themes together with some subsidiary matter in perfect clearness, and while the development begins after the manner of many moderns as soon as the topics are announced, it is none the less a discussion of the themes along lines laid down by the fathers.

Sibelius's respectability being thus demonstrated he may claim our calm consideration, for he has music in his blood and he is not afraid to publish it. He sings in a broad, virile fresh aired style that is altogether invigorating. The music of this symphony is not the product of profound scholarship and the midnight oil, but of the winds and waves of the writer's native land. It was conceived in the sunlight and born under the open sky.

It is musical music, not pedagogic demonstrations of contrapuntal theorems based on the contemporaneous axiom that all chords which are ugly are good for the soul. Human beings can listen to this sort of symphonic composition and be glad that they do not have to wag their ears and assume a demeanor of owlish wisdom.

The melodies, born of the soil and nursed of the people, are frank and unaffected. The rhythms are clean and piquant. The harmonies are rich and sufficiently intricate. The instrumental color is solid and varied.

The principal theme of the first movement is one of great pregnancy and the entire movement is eloquent. But the riches of the last movement are quite bewildering till they gradually marshal themselves to orderly array and sing out their summary in a most satisfying finish.

The elegiac slow movement is captivating, while the scherzo is a piece of invigorating originality. The symphony was exquisitely played and it takes a deal of playing, too, as the English say. It bristles with instrumental difficulties, and a rude performance would rob it of half its charm. It lost nothing last night in the hands of Dr. Muck.

Mme. Samaroff has improved vastly since this public first heard her in a misguided concert in Carnegie Hall. She is now accepted as one of the interesting players of this country. Her performance of the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto last night was distinguished by great beauty of tone, delicate and judiciously graded nuancing, exquisite daintiness of enunciation in the florid passages and poetic treatment of the [illegible] She fell short of the highest accomplishment by reason of her want of the power to impart the necessary splendor, the bolder proclamations of the composer. She was conversant with all that was elegantly little, but not with all that was awfully vast. To point out such a shortcoming in the face of an interpretation so lovely in most of its aspects may seem ungracious, but after all Tschaikowsky makes some rather heavy demands in this concerto.

Paper Press
City New York
Date FEB 23 1907 State N Y

MUSICAL.

Fourth Boston Orchestra Concert Introduces a New Pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night brought out the usual throng of music-lovers who find in these concerts an unfailing source of joy, and food for their higher appreciation of the art universal. For the first time this season the programme provided for the apperance of a soloist outside of the membership of the orchestra. The omission of this element at the first concert was, it is understood, intentional. At the second concert in December, Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist, through a disagreement of plans there was no soloist in January, and Mme. Olga Samaroff, an American born pianist, of Russian and German parentage, appeared last night.

This record in the matter of soloists is exceptional, and may be said to have established a precedent so far as concerns their relation to these concerts. There have been local expressions of disappointment, but the importance and source of these is uncertain. It is known that the Brooklyn Institute management, under whose auspices these concerts are given, is opposed to the policy of concerts without soloists. The Institute is strong on the effect of personality in pulling big houses and making money. Apparently, it believes that this is the surest way of making money. That the playing of the orchestra itself is sufficient to provide the finest sort of musical entertainment has been quite thoroughly demonstrated. The importance of a soloist at such concerts appeals differently, according to the viewpoint. For the present state of American musical taste there is a safe middle-ground between the European view of no soloist, which is strictly adhered to in some series of concerts, and the insistence upon a soloist without fail.

Last night's concert was a happy illustration of how the presence of a soloist can be a happy diversion, consistent with the character of the concert, and without seeming to be exploited as the most important feature. Her playing of Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23, was programmed between the rendering by the orchestra of the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony. The concerto is more musically solid than most works of this sort, having been written seemingly less with a view to merely exploit the piano than to make a composition of artistic structure and substantial worth. Mme. Samaroff played it well, brilliantly, in fact, with a clear, crisp certainty, yet not with a great deal of breadth. She is undoubtedly an interesting, capable pianist, whose sincerity of purpose is an engaging element in her behalf.

Both the orchestral works are unfamiliar here, that is, so far as relates to their performance in Brooklyn. The overture is less than ten years old and speaks well for the ability of the composer. It is direct in the presentation of its themes and lucidly forceful in construction and a very wholesome bit of writing in this form. The Berlioz symphony has held its own through nearly three-quarters of a century of variable musical discussion in the adjustment of artistic principles affecting music. Dr. Muck conducted with fine poise and force and the orchestra again eloquently proclaimed its unrivaled position in the art of orchestral expression.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 1907 State N Y

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22d. The programme will be Beethoven's Overture "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Tschaikowsky's symphonie "Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

Paper World
City New York
Date FEB 28 1907 State N Y

PUCCINI FINDS NO LIBRETTO THEME.

Composer Sails for Italy After a Futile Search Here for the "New Note."

BELASCO MAY FURNISH NEW IDEA FOR OPERA.

Musician Pleased with Young American Women Singers at Metropolitan.

Puccini, the Italian composer, who came here to superintend the staging of his own "Madame Butterfly" at the Metropolitan Opera House, sails home to-day on La Provence with golden memories of America in his mind and her golden dollars in his pocket. He spent yesterday afternoon in saying au revoirs, for he says he may return.

From a cordial hour with Herr Direktor Conried at his uptown home Puccini came to the Hotel Astor, where he had said he would be pleased to give his views on things American.

"I have been astonished at the musical enthusiasm of the American people, of which I did not dream," he said. "Their taste seems to be very eclectic, with no prejudices, and they are as ready to applaud one type of opera as another. Either Wagner or music of the Italian school rouses this enthusiasm equally, and the opera-houses are full all the time.

Hunting a Libretto.

"Almost the first thing I did when I came to New York was to begin a hunt for an original idea for another opera. This being a new people, bound less often with the conventionalisms of some of the European nations, I thought it probable I would find such an idea. I have not been completely satisfied. I have seen almost every dramatic production that has appeared in New York since I have been here, and I have not yet found the entirely original note I was seeking.

"I did not necessarily expect to find something that would appeal alone to Americans in this search," continued the composer, "but thought that a country such as this might have given it to me. I always choose my own subject for a libretto, and I regret I have not found it. Belasco has promised me an idea which has never been used in grand opera. What it may be I don't know. While I have nothing under way now I have not by any means given up the idea or the possibility of an American opera, and possibly this Belasco idea may be what I am seeking.

"I have been impressed with the sincerity and truth of your emotional actresses, and the naivete of the type of 'The Girl of the Golden West' was very new and charming to me. Shakespeare has been suggested to me as furnishing themes for grand opera. 'As You Like It,' 'The Tempest' and 'King Lear' have all been considered. I cannot seem to see a grand opera in any of them.

The American Artists.

"I was pleased with the young American artists at the Metropolitan. Miss Farrar put a great deal of herself into her roles. In 'Madame Butterfly' I had to tell her very little—it all came from herself. The nobility of pose and dignity of line of Mme. Eames on the stage impressed me deeply. She is of the grand style of the Empire. I wish also to speak of Mme. Cavalieri, whose career has been miraculous. By dint of her will and determination she has come from the Folies Bergeres in Paris to the stage of the Metropolitan. She has great talent and great temperament, but she will still have to work. I admire her in 'Manon.'

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which I would much like to hear play some of my music, made a profound impression on me for its precision, warmth and vigor, and especially the beauty of its wood-wind choir.

"I have been asked why I did not do a cycle of Italian grand operas about a national theme, as the 'Ring' of Wagner. I have never been able to quite see such a cycle in my mind. Cellini's career has been suggested. It is useless for grand opera because there is no love in it. Some one said, 'Invent the love motive.' Love cannot be invented; it must grow. Dante does not lend himself to a grand opera. His themes are too sombre."

Paper Press
City Philadelphia
Date MAR 10 1907 State Pa
Mar 10/07

Philadelphia is to hear at the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," with which Dr. Muck has achieved such signalled success in Boston and New York. The other work on the program will be Brahms' Variations on a chorale by Haydn and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3. This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Philadelphia.

MARCH 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four composers whose works made up the 16th Symphony program, two, Debressy and Ritter, were represented by pieces played for the first times at these concerts. The former a Frenchman, is becoming quite conspicuous in the musical world, and his three orchestral sketches under the title of "The Sea," which opened the program, are less than two years old. Ritter's symphonic waltz, "Olaf's Wedding Dance," was composed about 15 years ago. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," completed the program.

To many minds Claude Debussy continues to be a puzzle, for his harmonic ideas are expressed in such strange forms that his modern musical activity and adroitness fail to satisfy the orthodox brain. The trio named, "The Sea," are termed impressionistic sketches of the ocean. The first is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean", the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of Wind and Wave." Each one is fantastic, the modulations are almost continuous and with few, if any, sustained melodies, and the orchestration is managed in such a way as to suggest an incessant restlessness, which of course is typical of Neptune's domain.

They are tonal pictures elaborately developed, with an immense amount of detail, deliberately bold and somewhat irritating at times because there are so few restful measures. The man is a wonder in conjuring up odd instrumental combinations and the composition is remarkable in this respect if in no other. Knowing the subject the musical illustration is vivid and typical. Dr. Muck guided his forces safely and dexterously through this ocean of harmony whose qualities met with reserved appreciation on the part of the auditors.

The Russian, Alexander Ritter, based his waltz, "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," on a Norwegian legend in which a youth falls in love with a princess. The king, the father of the princess, decrees that he shall marry her and be executed immediately. After the ceremony there is a dance, and at midnight the executioner appears. But when search is made for the bride and bridegroom, their bodies are found floating in the river. The main part of the composition is an old-fashioned German waltz.

In contrasting the dances with the somber incidents, Ritter shows considerable skill, for the interruptions are effective, the "atmosphere" is clearly suggested, and the whole work is effective. The orchestra played the work in splendid fashion and showed the skill of the band by interpreting the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz, which followed, in such a manner as to clearly define the breaks differently from those of the Ritter piece. The latter were gloomy and foreboding; in the "Mephisto" the diabolic was revealed. The Berlioz overture was given brilliantly. The concert was unusually brief.

The program this week will be devoted to the classics, the first three works being of the 18th century. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra, three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and three contra-basses. This work has never been played at the Symphony concerts, although others of the same series have appeared on the programs in the past. Other numbers will be Haydn's second symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. There will be no soloists.

Paper Herald
City Washington
Date MAR 10 1907 State D C

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel on Wednesday afternoon, March 20, at 4 o'clock. The concert will introduce to Washington Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who has had so much success in all of her concerts in this country since she arrived from England early in January. Prof. Hess has selected a programme which will comprise Haydn's String Quartet in C major, opus 33, No. 3; two movements from Debussy's Quartet in G minor, opus 10, and Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, in B flat major, opus 99.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date MAR 10 1907 State Md

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday, March 20. The program will be an overture by the Polish Moskowski entitled "Die Steppe," a novelty here; Brahm's "Variations on a Chorale," by Haydn, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Baltimore.

Paper Herald
City Washington
Date MAR 10 1907 State D C

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Tuesday afternoon, March 19. There will be no soloist. The programme will consist of Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain;" Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Tschaikowsky's Symphonie Pathetique. This will, in all probability, be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Washington.

[158]

Paper American
City Trenton
Date FEB 22 1907 State N.J

THE BOSTONIAN ORCHESTRA.

MUSIC FROM FINLAND PROVES PLEASING.

The E Minor Symphony of Jean Sibelius Heard—A Composer Not Afraid to Write Good Tunes—Mme. Olga Samaroff and Tschaikowsky's B Flat Concerto.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Paul Dukas's delightful humoresque, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice;" Tschaikowsky's much performed B flat concerto for piano and orchestra, with Olga Samaroff as the soloist, and Jean Sibelius's first symphony. It was one of those concerts which give much joy to the lover of good music and send the typical concert goer home wondering whether he ought to like it or not.

Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, is not an old acquaintance of local music lovers, and they are not quite sure yet whether he is to be approved or condemned. His "Lemmenkainen Journeys Homeward" was made known to us by the Philharmonic Society so lately as February, 1902, and that was the beginning of our knowledge of his art. His first symphony, which is in the popular key of E minor, though composed in 1899, was unfamiliar. It will probably not remain unfamiliar, for it ought to be repeated.

Possibly sticklers for the conventional disposition of themes in the first movement and the inevitable repeat of the exposition part will hold that this composition is not a symphony at all, but just an orchestral color piece. The truth is, however, that while the antique pattern is ignored, the established fundamentals of symphonic form are not. The first movement sets forth its leading themes together with some subsidiary matter in perfect clearness, and while the development begins after the manner of many moderns as soon as the topics are announced, it is none the less a discussion of the themes along lines laid down by the fathers.

Sibelius's respectability being thus demonstrated he may claim our calm consideration, for he has music in his blood and he is not afraid to publish it. He sings in a broad, virile fresh aired style that is altogether invigorating. The music of this symphony is not the product of profound scholarship and the midnight oil, but of the winds and waves of the writer's native land. It was conceived in the sunlight and born under the open sky.

It is musical music, not pedagogic demonstrations of contrapuntal theorems based on the contemporaneous axiom that all chords which are ugly are good for the soul. Human beings can listen to this sort of symphonic composition and be glad that they do not have to wag their ears and assume a demeanor of owlish wisdom.

The melodies, born of the soil and nursed of the people, are frank and unaffected. The rhythms are clean and piquant. The harmonies are rich and sufficiently intricate. The instrumental color is solid and varied.

The principal theme of the first movement is one of great pregnancy and the entire movement is eloquent. But the riches of the last movement are quite bewildering till they gradually marshal themselves to orderly array and sing out their summary in a most satisfying finish.

The elegiac slow movement is captivating, while the scherzo is a piece of invigorating originality. The symphony was exquisitely played and it takes a deal of playing, too, as the English say. It bristles with instrumental difficulties, and a rude performance would rob it of half its charm. It lost nothing last night in the hands of Dr. Muck and his men.

Mme. Samaroff has improved vastly since this public first heard her in a misguided concert in Carnegie Hall. She is now accepted as one of the interesting players of this country. Her performance of the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto last night was distinguished by great beauty of tone, delicate and judiciously graded nuancing, exquisite daintiness of enunciation in the florid passages, and poetic treatment of the cantilena.

She fell short of the highest accomplishment by reason of her want of the power to impart the necessary splendor, the bolder proclamations of the composer. She was conversant with all that was elegantly little, but not with all that was awfully vast. To point out such a shortcoming in the face of an interpretation so lovely in most of its aspects may seem ungracious, but after all Tschaikowsky makes some rather heavy demands in this concerto.

Paper Press
City New York
Date FEB 23 1907 State N.Y.

MUSICAL.

Fourth Boston Orchestra Concert Introduces a New Pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night brought out the usual throng of music-lovers who find in these concerts an unfailing source of joy, and food for their higher appreciation of the art universal. For the first time this season the programme provided for the apperance of a soloist outside of the membership of the orchestra. The omission of this element at the first concert was, it is understood, intentional. At the second concert in December, Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist, through a disagreement of plans there was no soloist in January, and Mme. Olga Samaroff, an American born pianist, of Russian and German parentage, appeared last night.

This record in the matter of soloists is exceptional, and may be said to have established a precedent so far as concerns their relation to these concerts. There have been local expresions of disappointment, but the importance and source of these is uncertain. It is known that the Brooklyn Institute management, under whose auspices these concerts are given, is opposed to the policy of concerts without soloists. The Institute is strong on the effect of personality in pulling big houses and making money. Apparently, it believes that this is the surest way of making money. That the playing of the orchestra itself is sufficient to provide the finest sort of musical entertainment has been quite thoroughly demonstrated. The importance of a soloist at such concerts appeals differently, according to the viewpoint. For the present state of American musical taste there is a safe middle-ground between the European view of no soloist, which is strictly adhered to in some series of concerts, and the insistence upon a soloist without fail.

Last night's concert was a happy illustration of how the presence of a soloist can be a happy diversion, consistent with the character of the concert, and without seeming to be exploited as the most important feature. Her playing of Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23, was programmed between the rendering by the orchestra of the overture to the opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Korsakoff and the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony. The concerto is more musically solid than most works of this sort, having been written seemingly less with a view to merely exploit the piano than to make a composition of artistic structure and substantial worth. Mme. Samaroff played it well, brilliantly, in fact, with a clear, crisp certainty, yet not with a great deal of breadth. She is undoubtedly an interesting, capable pianist, whose sincerity of purpose is an engaging element in her behalf.

Both the orchestral works are unfamiliar here, that is, so far as relates to their performance in Brooklyn. The overture is less than ten years old and speaks well for the ability of the composer. It is direct in the presentation of its themes and lucidly forceful in construction and a very wholesome bit of writing in this form. The Berlioz symphony has held its own through nearly three-quarters of a century of variable musical discussion in the adjustment of artistic principles affecting music. Dr. Muck conducted with fine poise and force and the orchestra again eloquently proclaimed its unrivaled position in the art of orchestral expression.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22d. The programme will be Beethoven's Overture "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Tschaikowsky's symphonie "Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y

PUCCINI FINDS NO LIBRETTO THEME.

Composer Sails for Italy After a Futile Search Here for the "New Note."

BELASCO MAY FURNISH NEW IDEA FOR OPERA.

Musician Pleased with Young American Women Singers at Metropolitan.

Puccini, the Italian composer, who came here to superintend the staging of his own "Madame Butterfly" at the Metropolitan Opera-House, sails home to-day on La Provence with golden memories of America in his mind and her golden dollars in his pocket. He spent yesterday afternoon in saying au revoirs, for he says he may return.

From a cordial hour with Herr Direktor Conried at his uptown home Puccini came to the Hotel Astor, where he had said he would be pleased to give his views on things American.

"I have been astonished at the musical enthusiasm of the American people, of which I did not dream," he said. "Their taste seems to be very eclectic, with no prejudices, and they are as ready to applaud one type of opera as another. Either Wagner or music of the Italian school rouses this enthusiasm equally, and the opera-houses are full all the time.

Hunting a Libretto.

"Almost the first thing I did when I came to New York was to begin a hunt for an original idea for another opera. This being a new people, bound less often with the conventionalisms of some of the European nations, I thought it probable I would find such an idea. I have not been completely satisfied. I have seen almost every dramatic production that has appeared in New York since I have been here, and I have not yet found the entirely original note I was seeking.

"I did not necessarily expect to find something that would appeal alone to Americans in this search," continued the composer, "but thought that a country such as this might have given it to me. I always choose my own subject for a libretto, and I regret I have not found it. Belasco has promised me an idea which has never been used in grand opera. What it may be I don't know. While I have nothing under way now I have not by any means given up the idea or the possibility of an American opera, and possibly this Belasco idea may be what I am seeking.

"I have been impressed with the sincerity and truth of your emotional actresses, and the naivete of the type of 'The Girl of the Golden West' was very new and charming to me. Shakespeare has been suggested to me as furnishing themes for grand opera. 'As You Like It,' 'The Tempest' and 'King Lear' have all been considered. I cannot seem to see a grand opera in any of them.

The American Artists.

"I was pleased with the young American artists at the Metropolitan. Miss Farrar put a great deal of herself into her roles. In 'Madame Butterfly' I had to tell her very little—it all came from herself. The nobility of pose and dignity of line of Mme. Eamos on the stage impressed me deeply. She is of the grand style of the Empire. I wish also to speak of Mme. Cavalieri, whose career has been miraculous. By dint of her will and determination she has come from the Folies Bergeres in Paris to the stage of the Metropolitan. She has great talent and great temperament, but she will still have to work. I admire her in 'Manon.'

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which I would much like to hear play some of my music, made a profound impression on me for its precision, warmth and vigor, and especially the beauty of its wood-wind choir.

"I have been asked why I did not do a cycle of Italian grand operas about a national theme, as the 'Ring' of Wagner. I have never been able to quite see such a cycle in my mind. Cellini's career has been suggested. It is useless for grand opera because there is no love in it. Some one said, 'Invent the love motive.' Love cannot be invented: it must grow. Dante does not lend himself to a grand opera. His themes are too sombre."

Paper Press
City Philadelphia
Date State Pa

Mar 10/07

Philadelphia is to hear at the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 18, Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," with which Dr. Muck has achieved such signalled success in Boston and New York. The other work on the program will be Brahms' Variations on a chorale by Haydn and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3. This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Philadelphia.

SUNDAY GLO...
MARCH 3, 1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four composers whose works made up the 16th Symphony program, two, Debressy and Ritter, were represented by pieces played for the first times at these concerts. The former, a Frenchman, is becoming quite conspicuous in the musical world, and his three orchestral sketches under the title of "The Sea," which opened the program, are less than two years old. Ritter's symphonic waltz, "Olaf's Wedding Dance," was composed about 15 years ago. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," completed the program.

To many minds Claude Debussy continues to be a puzzle, for his harmonic ideas are expressed in such strange forms that his modern musical activity and adroitness fail to satisfy the orthodox brain. The trio named, "The Sea," are termed impressionistic sketches of the ocean. The first is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of Wind and Wave." Each one is fantastic, the modulations are almost continuous and with few, if any, sustained melodies, and the orchestration is managed in such a way as to suggest an incessant restlessness, which of course is typical of Neptune's domain.

They are tonal pictures elaborately developed, with an immense amount of detail, deliberately bold and somewhat irritating at times because there are so few restful measures. The man is a wonder in conjuring up odd instrumental combinations and the composition is remarkable in this respect if in no other. Knowing the subject the musical illustration is vivid and typical. Dr Muck guided his forces safely and dexterously through this ocean of harmony whose qualities met with reserved appreciation on the part of the auditors.

The Russian, Alexander Ritter, based his waltz, "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," on a Norwegian legend in which a youth falls in love with a princess. The king, the father of the princess, decrees that he shall marry her and be executed immediately. After the ceremony there is a dance, and at midnight the executioner appears. But when search is made for the bride and bridegroom, their bodies are found floating in the river. The main part of the composition is an old-fashioned German waltz.

In contrasting the dances with the somber incidents, Ritter shows considerable skill, for the interruptions are effective, the "atmosphere" is clearly suggested, and the whole work is effective. The orchestra played the work in splendid fashion and showed the skill of the band by interpreting the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz, which followed, in such a manner as to clearly define the breaks differently from those of the Ritter piece. The latter were gloomy and foreboding; in the "Mephisto" the diabolic was revealed. The Berlioz overture was given brilliantly. The concert was unusually brief.

The program this week will be devoted to the classics, the first three works being of the 18th century. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra, three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and three contra-basses. This work has never been played at the Symphony concerts, although others of the same series have appeared on the programs in the past. Other numbers will be Haydn's second symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. There will be no soloists.

Paper Star Herald
City Washington
Date State D C

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel on Wednesday afternoon, March 20, at 4 o'clock. The concert will introduce to Washington Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who has had so much success in all of her concerts in this country since she arrived from England early in January. Prof. Hess has selected a programme which will comprise Haydn's String Quartet in C major, opus 33, No. 3; two movements from Debussy's Quartet in G minor, opus 10, and Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, in B flat major, opus 99.

Paper American
City Baltimore
Date State Md

MAR 10 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday, March 20. The program will be an overture by the Polish Moskowski entitled "Die Steppe," a novelty here; Brahm's "Variations on a Chorale," by Haydn, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Baltimore.

Paper Star Herald
City Washington
Date MAR State D C

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Tuesday afternoon, March 19. There will be no soloist. The programme will consist of Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain;" Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Tschaikowsky's Symphonie Pathetique. This will, in all probability, be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Washington.

[158]

...SCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DEBUSSY'S ORCHESTRAL SKETCHES OF "THE SEA"

Music of Characteristic Fluidity and Suggestion That Yet Lacks Something of the Spontaneity and Sensitiveness of His Earlier Work—The Idiom of Debussy and His Seeming Aims in It—His Pictures and Secrets of the Sea

From Richard Strauss, whose later music he loves little, Dr. Muck has passed to Debussy, whose music he may love still less, and yesterday he and the Symphony Orchestra played for the first time in Boston and probably in all America the Frenchman's three "Orchestral Sketches" of "The Sea." They are Debussy's last published composition for orchestra, and they were first played in Paris sixteen months ago. He has named them "From Dawn to Midday on the Sea," "The Sport of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." Otherwise there is no printed hint of their poetic contents. Instrumentally they are scored for an ordinary modern orchestra with a celesta added, which is a very modest asking for an ultra-modern composer. Perhaps Debussy looks in his heart rather than in his instruments when he writes. In Paris the sketches met what the old theatrical records call a mixed reception. The devotees and the partisans of Debussy acclaimed the characteristic perfections of the music. Those who will have none of him spent their wit or their acrimony upon the sketches. The few to whom Debussy was neither a narrow cult nor a hateful thing suggested quietly that the sketches were not altogether of his best work. Yesterday the audience seemed interested but cold. Not a hand stirred after the first sketch; a very unusual incident at a Symphony concert; a few moved after the second; a few more after the third. The talk of the lobbies, outside a flash or two of blue-stockinged wit was of other things

Debussy seems to need suggestion for his music. The making of tonal patterns for the sake of their own beauty and nothing else has seldom allured him, in spite of his [illegible]onical professions to the contrary. D[illegible]matic ideas in the conventional sense [illegible] the story of Francesca da Rimini is [illegible]matic), or dramatic music-making for [illegible] own sake (as a symphony of Tschaikovsky is dramatic) have seldom stirred him. His titles almost always hint at an impression as the reason and the purpose of the music. The impression may come from many sources, but often it springs from nature. Recall such titles as "Gardens in the Rain," or "Reflections in the Water." Recall especially "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the nocturne of "The Clouds." As they moved across the sky, their motion and color and contour touched his imagination, and out of the impression came his music. A chief virtue of that music is its lovely fluidity. The very clouds it would delineate are solid beside it. Now the sea is the most fluid thing in nature and Debussy's music is the most fluid thing in music. The affinity between all three is obvious. The fruit of it in some form or other was inevitable. Free as Debussy is in variety of impressions and in the choice of them for musical expression, he was almost bound in temperament to write sooner or later of the sea. Perhaps, for thought of this very obligation, the three symphonic sketches seemed less spontaneous than most of his music, less sincere and within the chosen idiom more rhetorical. In the other orchestral pieces the blending of impression and expression is of a perfect fineness. In the sea pieces there are moments when, as it seemed yesterday, Debussy turns rhetorical, and when his imagination falters. From beginning to end the listener fancies that the music has cost more; that impressions have been summoned for it.

To those impressions the responsive auditor may gather what he will. He may fancy, as he listens, the dawn over a shadowy and lapping sea. He may hear the morning breeze stir it or the morning light ripple it. He may feel the waves awakening to a playful animation and the sea expanding, as it were before his eyes. He may see the waves turn brighter, curl their crests, scatter their spray. He may hear them racing, eddying, dancing in their play, shaking themselves into prismatic spray, or pausing in momentary stillness, then undulating, then drawing circle around circle. Or he may listen to their voices, chiding, cajoling, mocking, wooing the wind that plays over them and with its voice makes answer. In the music of the familiar nocturne, the clouds move and light and the winds have their play with them. In the sea-pieces the waves move endlessly and light and the winds have also their play with them and every wave with its fellow. The tale used to go that Debussy had sat in barracks on the outskirts of Paris and watched clouds hour upon hour. He may have watched the sea as endlessly. But the clouds of the nocturne and the sea of the orchestral sketches are also and equally the clouds and the sea of a poet's vision. They are not the things themselves, like the delineations of Strauss's music. They are Debussy's dream of them, and the secrets that they tell him.

For Debussy, like other of the new Frenchmen, is a poet who happens to write in tones, rather than a composer who may nourish poetic ideas and receive poetic impressions. The composer would set his music to the expression of his poetry. The poet who would write in tones needs make a new music of his own that shall be as fluid, undulating, iridescent, fitful, and intangible as his dreams. The composer sets about intensifying his melodies, simplifying his polyphony, accenting his rhythms, diversifying his harmonies. Not so, retorts the poet; you are only forging your own fetters the tighter. The real virtue of music as a means of poetic expression is its perfect fluidity and incessant movement. It is all impalpable curves—flowing, flowing, flowing, and taking the shape and the color with which imagination may clothe them. If Debussy is the poet, who would write in tones because no medium would give him such freedom, he found it in the nocturnes, in the piece of the faun, and now again in the sea sketches. To listen to them yesterday was to receive little sense of melodies, of rhythms, of figures in the ordinary sense of the words, and none of the relations of music that custom has made arbitrary. Rather there came the sense of endless harmonies, endless modulations flowing one from another, flowing side by side, separating, converging, but undulating always. The music was of changeful and supple and sensitive curves of sound. And each curve had color according as the instruments that shaped it, and the colors blended or contrasted with infinite shadings.

The suggestion of these curves and colors was what Debussy's imagination willed. Out of them he wove the shining web of the sea. Or he made little waves to curl and dance in them. Or he wrought them of the spray. Or he gave them the voice of wind and sea at peace or troubled. Or he bade light take its sport with them. Or the music turned gray with the monotony, the melancholy and the loneliness of the sea. Then was Debussy most sea-poet in tones. For then into them he put the mysteries of the waters and pondered them perhaps overmuch. For the exquisite spontaneity and iridescence of "The Afternoon of a Faun" is not in the sea-pieces, nor in them is the perfect completeness and sincerity of the nocturnes. Yet even while it toiled a most sensitive imagination was writing a most sensitive music for hearers that might share a little in the same sensitiveness. Of the poetry of the sea Debussy was making a poetry of tones, and in it was the secret and the mystery of all poetry—the power to insinuate or to stir responsive emotions. They were not really of the sea or of imaginations concerning it. They were of the strange evanescent beauty of those harmonies, the strange iridescence of those modulations, the subtle and changeful tints of those shadings. It was a new pleasure of a new sort of ordered sound. And therein was its justification. It had brought freedom, emotion, suggestion, beauty. There was magic in it, and by this magic it had drawn into tones the voice of the sea and its secrets—a sea that it is easiest to hear as in a dream. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz that followed was coarse reveling beside it. Ritter's dance of the condemned lovers, with its "effective" climax, was melodrama in comparison. They were music before it had been emancipated to a poet's needs. But, then, few poets write it.

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck has made a programme of eighteenth-century music plus Beethoven for the seventeenth pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It comprises Bach's third "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra, which is new to the Symphony concerts, Haydn's familiar symphony in D major, Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony. There will be no soloist.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, MARCH 4, 1907

The Symphony Concert

On Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, the playing of Debussy's "Sea Pieces" at the Symphony concert had exquisite understanding on the part of the conductor and exquisite fineness of expression on the part of the men. It is the custom to call Dr. Muck an objective conductor—one who would give, not himself, but the composer and his music true and characteristic voice. But there are objective conductors who, with all their effort and sincerity, cannot hear some voices, and thus fail to transmit them to their hearers. Debussy's, above that of almost any other living composer's, is a singularly evasive and baffling voice. Yet Dr. Muck heard it as clearly as he heard Strauss's in the "Sinfonia Domestria" a few weeks ago, as he has heard many voices, old and new, the winter through, and made it speak in characteristic tones. The music had its perfect plasticity, its endless glint, its glamor, its suggestion. More, it had a continuity that some conductors cannot find in Debussy. Subtle harmony flowed from subtle harmony, yet melodic contours never quite vanished; themes splintered or dissolved in fragments, like the very spray of the sea that Debussy would picture, and strange instrumental timbres blended or contrasted like the mysterious voices of Debussy's own wind and waves. Throughout the sound was as the surface of the sea ever the same, yet ever changeful. At every turn the virtuosity of the men obeyed the conductor's and the composer's will. They read the poetry of sound that Debussy would write in his music—and read it as though it were no new and strange idiom. The performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" was a large achievement of orchestral eloquence. That of the "Sea Pieces" was a fine achievement of orchestral intuition. Each was like the re-creation of the music and each held the listeners rapt.

H. T. P.

BOSTON, MARCH 3, 1907.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

SYMPHONY'S 16TH CONCERT OF SEASON

Debussy's "Sea" Given Here for First Time and Is Ably Rendered at Most Brilliant Performance.

BY PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

"The Sea": (1) "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; (2) "Frolics of Waves"; (3) "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea".....Debussy
"Olaf's Wedding Dance".....A. Ritter
"Mephisto Waltz".....Liszt
Overture, "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz

The compositions by Debussy and Ritter were played for the first time in this city. I believe the performance of Debussy's "Sea" was the first in the United States.

There are some who insist that music written even by the most imaginative, skilful and audacious composer cannot portray a scene in nature or a phenomenon of nature so effectively, either by an attempt at photographic realism, by "impressionism," or by subtle suggestion, as a painting or a page of printed words.

Raff wrote an "Autumn" symphony, with a dance of ghosts, a hunting scene, an elegy; with a first movement entitled "Impressions and Sentiments." What is all this music and that of other fall composers when weighed against this line of Collins: "While sallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves"?

There are landscapists in music who have composed admirable pages, but what one of them could express in tones these lines from the same ode, the ode "To Evening"?

Or, if chill, blustering winds or driving rain
Prevent my willing feet, be mine the hut
That, from the mountain's side,
View wilds, and swelling floods,
And hamlets brown, and dim-discover'd spires;
And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all
Thy dewy fingers draw
The gradual dusky veil.

What symphonic poem entitled "Egdon Heath" could vie with the first chapter of Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native"?

Look over the works of the seascapists in music, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Paul Gilson and others. Let them rage and howl and bluster or mimic the treacherous calm and deceitful merriment. How far are they from depicting "the spasm of the sky and the shatter of the sea!"

Thus do some cry out against this specific portraiture in music.

Some Music That Does.

But the sea is very old and it is still young; it is monotonous and it is terrible in its variety of expression. The same sea that was to Aeschylus as multitudinous laughter was so dreaded by John on Patmos that in the heaven he saw in the wondrous vision there is no sea. Is it not possible for a composer who is on intimate terms with the ocean to express in tones some of its characteristics? Are there no measures in two overtures of Mendelssohn in the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony, in "Scheherazade," in "Sadko" and in Gilson's symphonic poem that bring the sea irresistibly to mind, and that without aid of programme?

Nor is there any need of programme to catch the meaning of Debussy's "Sketches." Whether these sketches belong to music or to a new art is a question that need not now be discussed. Nor is it necessary to speak about Debussy's strange and surprising musical material. The question is simply this: Does he succeed in his purpose? And here the individuality of the hearer enters into the answer. There must be something more in the music than mere mimicry of hissing or roaring waves, of rising or falling tide, of angry response to raging wind, of monstrous playfulness? The composer, it is true, can literally reproduce in sound only sound; but he can suggest sight and savor to the hearer that is receptive.

The sketches are more than a remarkable tour de force; they are something more than essays in a strange language. The hearer must cast aside all theories about how music should be written; he must listen in good faith.

As heard last night, and the performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, the first and the second movements seemed the more poetic and at the same time realistic. The third, while it was impressive and at times admirably mimetic, did not seem so clearly imagined or so convincingly expressed. It would be impossible to give any analysis in the most general way of any one of the movements, for they are as shifting and capricious as the sea itself. There are fragments of themes; there are themes that might be called typical motives, which are of exquisite beauty, but all these themes float on the waves of sound; they are lost; they reappear.

It Meant Much to Many.

This music is to be heard, rather than talked about. To some, curious and expectant, but without prejudice, it was perhaps chaotic and unintelligible. Others were interested only in the unusual harmonic progressions and in the strange use of familiar instruments. And there were others to whom this music was a highly poetic expression of the sea and its mystery. The sketches are at least an answer to those who have insisted that Debussy's melodic vein is weak and that he lacks virility.

Music so strange, so fascinating, so perplexing, should be heard more than once in a season. It is a pity that the sketches are not on the programme of the concert this week.

Ritter's music to the grim Norse Saga, placed between "the Sea," and the familiar "Mephisto" waltz, was killed on the spot. The subject chosen by Ritter might well serve a composer of greater imagination and richer invention. Neither the dance music nor that which typifies the executioner is striking either in ecstasy of passion or in bodement. An inherently cheap waltz is heavily scored.

In Liszt's scene from Lenau's "Faust" the sensuousness is akin to sensuality, but how diabolically clever this music is! Not a point is missed. Familiar as the work is, it is always engrossing, and the performance last night was dramatic, euphonious, and eminently Mephistophelian. Nor even after Debussy and Liszt did Berlioz, the great forerunner, seem old-fashioned.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra were heartily applauded after the superb close of "The Sea," and even those who probably did not enjoy the music wondered at the splendor of the performance.

BOSTON AMERICAN

..., MARCH 3, 1907.

IMPRESSIONIST NIGHT AT THE SYMPHONY.

Debussy's Musical Sketches of "The Sea" Are So Labelled, but Really Phonographic.

"OLAF'S DANCE" FULL OF REAL SUGGESTION

By Kent Perkins.

It was a night of "impressionism," the so-called and the real, in Symphony Hall, at the sixteenth concert of the orchestra for the season last evening. The first half of the program was given over to Debussy's three orchestral sketches, "The Sea," while the second part consisted of Alexander Ritter's "Olaf's Wedding Dance"; Liszt's episode No. 2 from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto's waltz), and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. The sea sketches and "Olaf's Wedding" were heard here for the first time.

The Debussy pieces are labelled "Impressionistic." They are supposed to picture the sea in three aspects—"From Dawn to Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves," "Dialogues of the Sea." They are lauded by their admireres as representing the acme of impressionism in music.

I can not agree with this view. Debussy's "Afternoon of the Fawn" is really impressionistic and beautifully so, for it exemplifies "the theory or method of suggesting an effect as impression without elaboration of details," to quote the dictionary definition of impressionism.

Phonographic Sea Music.

"The Sea," in all its three parts, is filled and saturated with orchestral imitations of the sounds of the ocean, its waves, its undulations, its foam-crested billows, its swish and swirl, its tossings and heavings; the crinkly, writhing spume flecks wriggling down the breasts of its great waves—all the details are there copied with remarkable cleverness. But of suggestion, the very basis of impressionism, there is little or none and the phonographic elaboration of details submerges what little there is.

The work seems pure realism, but what's the use of it? One can see and hear the ocean better at Nahant or Marblehead Neck.

The different parts of the piece were mildly applauded, but the work of Dr. Muck and the orchestra was recognized with long-continued approval at the end.

Some Real Impressionism.

In "Olaf's Wedding Dance" there was plenty of real impressionism. It is based on the story of a knight who loved the King's daughter clandestinely. The lovers' secret was betrayed to the King, who insisted that they marry and prepared an elaborate wedding feast, compelling the knight, Olaf, however, to agree that at midnight he would give himself to the executioner. The note of tragedy is powerfully but not realistically suggested throughout the passionate dance music and the terrible ending at the stroke of the midnight bell is intensely dramatic—by suggestion.

In "Mephisto's Waltz" more of real suggestion without phonographic details was heard and the audience evidently liked the Ritter, Liszt and Berlioz music much better than that of Debussy, for all of these selections were received with more spontaneous approval than was given to the clever Frenchman's work.

[159]

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Debussy.—Three Orchestral Sketches. "The Sea."
Alex. Ritter.—Olaf's Wedding Dance, Op. 22.
Liszt.—Scene in the Tavern. Mephisto Waltz.
Berlioz.—Roman Carnival Overture.

There was no soloist nor will there be one next Saturday. This is not a fault; our orchestra is a great enough attraction by itself.

When we read the title of the first of the sea-sketches by Debussy—"from Dawn till Noon on the Ocean"—we feared that, in accordance with modern realism, we were to have a movement seven hours long. It was not so long, but it was terrible while it lasted. We do not wish to treat a prominent composer flippantly; we find some musicians for whom we have the highest respect going into ecstasies over this work and we have honestly endeavored to put ourselves into a receptive mood and to discern its beauties. We have failed. We can find little else but shreds and patches, and the eternal bleatings of muted horns and cacklings of oboes breeds only contempt.

Even the despised Mendelssohn has given more graphic sea-music in his "Hebrides Overture," while there is more of the flavor of the ocean in the first 50 measures of the "Flying Dutchman" overture than in the entire Debussy work. The first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony" also stands far above this tone picture and in the same field.

Frenchmen are notoriously bad sailors, and a Gallic picture of the sea is apt to run more to stewards and basins and lemons than to the wild majesty of Poseidon. There was, however, much glow of orchestration in the second movement and the brilliant performance of the finale was sufficient to arouse the audience. Dr. Muck was recalled twice at the end, and finally caused the orchestra to rise to acknowledge the applause. We were as mystified at the end as at the beginning. We clung, like a drowning man, to a few fragments of the tonal wreck, a bit of a theme here and a comprehensible figure there, but finally this muted horn sea overwhelmed us. If this be Music we would much prefer to leave the Heavenly Maid until she has got over her Hysterics.

After this the concert was given over to the dance. Each one of the three last numbers was a dance of some sort. Olaf's Wedding Dance was not a very joyous matter. One thought of Sydney Smith's description of the dancers at an English party.—"They looked as if they were hired to do it and were doubtful about being paid." But it must be borne in mind that the unfortunate Olaf was to be executed at midnight after indulging in this revelry. When a man knowns that the headsman is waiting for the final cadence he may be excused for losing his head beforehand. There was nothing remarkable in the themes of this waltz, but it was interesting to see how rigidly the 12 o'clock closing law was enforced at the end.

The two last numbers of the concert were of much more genuine character than the two first. Liszt and Berlioz have not yet been surpassed by their numerous followers in the domain of programme-music and scintillant modern orchestration. In the Mephisto waltz there was fantasy, diablerie and wonderful tone-coloring. The flute obbligato and the harp playing deserve especial mention. Yet on the whole the number did not make its due effect. Dr. Muck in his zeal for unity sometimes places compositions side by side that neutralize each other. We found this to be the case in this instance. The weak waltz of Ritter was yet sufficiently strong to counteract the effect of Faust's dance.

Up to this point the dancing had been sanguinary or fiendish, with a Carmagnolian quality back of its merriment; but now, in the last number, there was honest lightheartedness. The English-horn serenade theme, beautifully played, was the first bit of genuine tune of the concert. We have never ranked Berlioz very high as a melodist, yet on this occasion one came upon the serenade as a weary traveller comes upon an oasis in the desert. The Salterello was full of animation and much applause followed the end of the work. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" had also been heartily recognized. The concert had the merit of brevity.

We can understand that a conductor must give us important new works whether he approves of them or not, but a single one might be quite enough at a sitting. Nor is the boredom consequent upon some of this modern iconoclasm the only bad result. We can state it as a definite fact that, while our orchestra is at present surpassingly brilliant, especially when imbued with Dr. Muck's great personality, its ensemble and precision is less than of yore. We can only ascribe this to the effect of some of these cacophonic compositions!

Louis C. Elson.

Paper	Sun
City	New York
Date	State N Y

MAR - 9 1907

Carnegie Hall's last pair of Bo[s]ton Symphony concerts this season will be given on March 21 and 23. On the Thursday evening programme is the three-part symphonic poem by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer," with "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz "Carnaval Romain." The Saturday afternoon will comprise Brahms's [Serenade] in A minor for flute and strings, the [Symphony] in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's [Eighth] Symphony.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Light and Familiar Music in Which Conductor, Orchestra and Audience Take Their Pleasure

After their wrestlings with Strauss, Debussy, Brahms, and minor moderns and ultra-moderns, conductor, band and audience took their ease comparatively at the Symphony concert yesterday. For the second time in the course of the season, Dr. Muck chose his programme from music that was of the eighteenth century by date or in spirit. Two symphonies stood upon it—Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's eighth in F major—and each was very familiar. Between them was Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute," familiar too, but hardly in the dramatic accents that Dr. Muck gave to it. New, however, to the Symphony concerts, but not to those that know their Bach, was his "Brandenburg" concerto, in G major for strings, that began the list. From first to last the music bade the listeners to the pleasure of beautiful, ordered, flowing and expressive sound. It bade the conductor to heed of the curves, arabesques and ornaments of the tonal patterns he and his men were weaving, to a care of perfect euphony and brightness, to songful charm and serene simplicity. It bade the men to the delicate liveliness, the rippling fluidity of tone and the light spontaneous precision that has long been their custom in such music. In their playing yesterday it was hard to find, in spite of some keen-eared listeners in New York, any decline in these qualities. Rather Dr. Muck, and the men themselves under his stimulus, have given their tone a warmer brightness, and a more sparkling fluidity. The sheer suppleness of it was fascinating. It seemed to run of itself into the edgeless arabesques of the music. The pleasure of the performance matched the pleasure of the programme, and it was an immediate, serene and effortless pleasure. Therein, says the paradoxical Debussy, is the ideal purpose and attainment of music. Bach, he admits, achieved it. He is not so sure seemingly of the homely Haydn or the "unbuttoned" Beethoven of the eighth symphony. The audience yesterday was much surer than it is with Debussy himself.

H. T. P.

Boston Globe
26 March 10, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Yesterday's Symphony Offerings.

Bright Prospects for Coming Grand Opera Season.

Second Dolmetsch Recital —Current Gossip.

Last week's Symphony program was so modern that it seemed almost to lean forward; last night's, in grateful contrast, was of the powdered-hair period again; graceful music, powerful but simple music, the works of the great men who were inspired, not of experimental poets in tone.

No. 3 of the Bach "Brandenburg concertos" led the program, played for the first time in Symphony concerts. The work is arranged for the violins in three parts, the violas and celli in three, and basses. It is in two charming, breezy movements, and is Bach's own typical flowing contrapuntal development of simple themes. It called for a rearrangement of the players which brought an odd weight of tone at the left side of the hall, and demonstrated more than anything else could how very well the hall was designed for the orchestra in its ordinary arrangement.

The Haydn "military symphony" came next, beautiful and always carrying its surprises, in spite of familiarity; the wonderful andante movement played with a tenderness that made a strong contrast for the following rapid minuet, one of the best of all the symphonic minuets.

The theatrical, happy, excited overture to "The Magic Flute" made a pleasant resting place between two symphonies, and finally on the program was the great eighth symphony.

Of the performance there was as usual little to cause comment; the playing was perfect, the reading scholarly. The icy exactness, the almost military precision which was a characteristic of former conductors, seems to have been good-naturedly shaded almost away, and the playing of the great band is the more spirited on that account.

No soloist is announced for this week's concerts, by more than there was yesterday. The numbers for this week are Nakowski's overture, "The Steppe"; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vyssehrad"; Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," and Beethoven's eighth symphony, the

VOL. C[illegible] NO. [illegible]

SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1907.

17TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Plays Brandeburg Concerto for First Time.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Brandeburg concerto, No. 3.....Bach
Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 1).....Haydn
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 7.....Beethoven

The concerto by Bach was played for the first time at these concerts. With the exception of this contrapuntal debauch the programme was made up of familiar and approved compositions that have long been recommended as safe for family use. There is also safety in applauding music of this kind. As the old French song has it, "Just tell me when they come to Mozart's music, so that I may show publicly my pleasure."

There was much pleasure in listening last night, for Dr. Muck's interpretation was constantly engrossing. Let three or four able conductors lead a symphony by Haydn in successive years, and each will bring out something fresh and beautiful. There is in the music certain phrases or certain movements that appeal with special significance to A, while the other conductors, Messrs. B, C and D, are similarly incited to poetic interpretation by other passages which leave A cold.

Then music itself has a way of surprising even the hardened listener. A phrase will pass unnoticed by him for a dozen hearings and then suddenly reveal its beauty. No matter how poor a performance of "Carmen" may be, some exquisite detail of instrumentation will then be heard for the first time.

Critics Become Eulogists.

Criticism of the concert last night would resolve itself inevitably into eulogy of Dr. Muck. There might be discussion of subjects suggested by the nature of the programme, by the performance of Bach's music, by the manner of reading the andante of Haydn.

Should Bach's little chamber concerto be performed by a large, modern orchestra, and does it gain or lose thus performed? To what degree should a conductor modernize or "poetize" music of the 18th century, music that in itself is not emotional as we now understand emotion? Should a programme be made up of only classic works and another of only romantic compositions? A week ago last night the programme was ultra-modern, for Berlioz is still an ultra-modern. Last night it was rigidly classic. Next Saturday the compositions are Polish, Czech and Russian.

These questions, howevr, are subjects for essays of chief importance in a report of a concert.

It should be remembered, howevr, that all the places played last night were once new, and they no doubt, in turn, astonished or perplexed when they were first performed. Bach was a man far ahead of his period. Harmonically he, too, is an ultra-modern. Haydn visited London and bought out works, as Richard Strauss visited the United States to conduct pieces already composed by him and to produce his "Symphonia Dometsica," Mozart's music to "The Magic Flute" disappointed the Viennese at first. Beethoven's symphony did not please the audience when it was first performed.

Interpretation Admirable.

Dr. Muck treated the old music lovingly, but not in the spirit of an antiquarian, not with the piety which is sometimes called devotion, but is in fact dull, half-witted appreciation. He was fortunate with all the composers alike in his conception of their spirit. He was not pedantic, nor was he extravagant in the effort to show originality of treatment. His readings were sane, elastic, full of life.

The performance of Haydn's andante, of Beethoven's allegretto, and of Mozart's overture will linger in the memory, and if the impression made by these pieces was the most striking, it is because the music itself was inherently more effective, for his interpretation was admirable throughout the concert.

Paper	Union
City	Brooklyn
Date	State N Y

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22. The programme will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

Paper	Eagle
City	Brooklyn
Date	State N Y

MAR [illegible]

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22. The programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

MUSICAL [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Programme
Bach. Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3.
Haydn. Symphony in D.
Mozart. "Magic Flute" overture.
Beethoven. Eighth Symphony.

Dr. Muck has had no half-measures in his programme. It is either all classic or all modern, all Gallic, or all Teutonic or all Slavonic. On this occasion it is entirely German and wholly classic. There was again no soloist. Of the last named fact no one ought to complain, for our orchestra is sufficiently excellent and our conductor sufficiently great to be worth hearing quite by themselves.

We would have preferred the Brandeburg Concerto in a small hall and played with only ten or a dozen instruments, even in its magnified state it has quaintness and indescribable dignity. It is a symmetrical complexity that is unique in the last, which cannot be said of the [illegible] 5-4 and 7-4 rhythms and zigzag modulations. There was much applause at its end, in fact a recall of the conductor.

We wonder whether Strauss, D'Indy, Debussy or Reger could create such a series of properly contrasted melodies as are found in a Haydn symphony! Haydn's first movements wear particularly well and his finales are almost always jovial and attractive in their rusticity. The formal variations which one often finds in his slow movements, and the set contrasts of tunes, in 3-4 rhythm, that form his Minuets, are less powerful to modern audiences. We found these two movements rather tepid on this occasion, not through any defect of interpretation, but simply because they represented a style that is tame to the modern listener.

But the "Magic Flute" overture made us sit up! It was the most original reading that we can remember. The introduction was taken so slow that it almost dropped apart. Per contra, the fugal [illegible] which constitutes the chief theme was whipped up to a furious Presto. The [illegible] in this subject were accented very [illegible]ly (a full "sforzando" effect) which gave an entirely new result to the theme. We do not dislike this effect but it is quite new to us and, at first, it astonished us because of its audacity.

The fugal matter shows what diverse results can be produced from the same tonal material, for if our readers will look up the Fugue No. 7, in the second part of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," they will find a very similar subject, in the same key but leading to entirely different development. And this fugue happened to be Mozart's especial favorite among the shorter fugues of Bach.

We thought that the melodic subordinate theme of the overture suffered somewhat by being over-driven. The Prestissimo speed was maintained throughout the work. The Coda was urged to the point of fury.

There was nothing essentially new read into the Beethoven symphony, the most playful of the nine. The Bassoons deserve praise for excellence in their work which is most prominent in this composition. Beethoven loved this clown of the orchestra and used it as the best vehicle to express his merry moods, which often ran into the grotesque. In the second movement the charming dialogue between violins and violoncellos was daintily given and the brusquerie of the end was well portrayed. The horns played well in the trio of the Minuet. In the Finale there was an occasional desire to push "piano" effects to the "ppp" point and some parts were almost inaudible, but the flying leaps from flutes to contrabasses, and the duet between kettle-drum and bassoon, were as sportive as could be wished. The contra-basses deserve especial mention.

But all in all, the Bach movements, even in their "arranged" state, were the finest part of the concert. In such noble music the true art-lover can hear calm and serene deities

"Who, as they sung, would take the prisoned soul
And lap it in Elysium."

Louis C. Elson.

Paper	Evening World
City	New York
Date	State N Y

MAR [illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay their last visit to us for the season at two concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and the following Saturday afternoon. Claude Debussy's "La Mer," a novelty; Hadyn's symphony in D Major and Beethoven's eighth symphony are promised.

Paper	Globe
City	New York
Date	MAR - 9 1907 State

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Loudon Charlton's direction, starts on its annual spring tour the first of April. The itinerary, so far as arranged, includes Erie, Pa., April 3; Meadville, Pa., April 4; Bayside Park, [illegible]

[160]

...DVERTISER
...G, MARCH 4, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Debussy.—Three Orchestral Sketches. "The Sea."
Alex. Ritter.—Olaf's Wedding Dance, Op. 22.
Liszt.—Scene in the Tavern. Mephisto Waltz.
Berlioz.—Roman Carnival Overture.

There was no soloist nor will there be one next Saturday. This is not a fault; our orchestra is a great enough attraction by itself.

When we read the title of the first of the sea-sketches by Debussy—"from Dawn till Noon on the Ocean"—we feared that, in accordance with modern realism, we were to have a movement seven hours long. It was not so long, but it was terrible while it lasted. We do not wish to treat a prominent composer flippantly; we find some musicians for whom we have the highest respect going into ecstasies over this work and we have honestly endeavored to put ourselves into a receptive mood and to discern its beauties. We have failed. We can find little else but shreds and patches, and the eternal bleatings of muted horns and cacklings of oboes breeds only contempt.

Even the despised Mendelssohn has given more graphic sea-music in his "Hebrides Overture," while there is more of the flavor of the ocean in the first 50 measures of the "Flying Dutchman" overture than in the entire Debussy work. The first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony" also stands far above this tone picture and in the same field.

Frenchmen are notoriously bad sailors, and a Gallic picture of the sea is apt to run more to stewards and basins and lemons than to the wild majesty of Poseidon. There was, however, much glow of orchestration in the second movement and the brilliant performance of the finale was sufficient to arouse the audience. Dr. Muck was recalled twice at the end, and finally caused the orchestra to rise to acknowledge the applause. We were as mystified at the end as at the beginning. We clung, like a drowning man, to a few fragments of the tonal wreck, a bit of a theme here and a comprehensible figure there, but finally this muted horn sea overwhelmed us. If this be Music we would much prefer to leave the Heavenly Maid until she has got over her Hysterics.

After this the concert was given over to the dance. Each one of the three last numbers was a dance of some sort. Olaf's Wedding Dance was not a very joyous matter. One thought of Sydney Smith's description of the dancers at an English party,—"They looked as if they were hired to do it and were doubtful about being paid." But it must be borne in mind that the unfortunate Olaf was to be executed at midnight after indulging in this revelry. When a man knowns that the headsman is waiting for the final cadence he may be excused for losing his head beforehand. There was nothing remarkable in the themes of this waltz, but it was interesting to see how rigidly the 12 o'clock closing law was enforced at the end.

The two last numbers of the concert were of much more genuine character than the two first. Liszt and Berlioz have not yet been surpassed by their numerous followers in the domain of programme-music and scintillant modern orchestration. In the Mephisto waltz there was fantasy, diablerie and wonderful tone-coloring. The flute obbligato and the harp playing deserve especial mention. Yet on the whole the number did not make its due effect. Dr. Muck in his zeal for unity sometimes places compositions side by side that neutralize each other. We found this to be the case in this instance. The weak waltz of Ritter was yet sufficiently strong to counteract the effect of Faust's dance.

Up to this point the dancing had been sanguinary or fiendish, with a Carmagnolian quality back of its merriment; but now, in the last number, there was honest lightheartedness. The English-horn serenade theme, beautifully played, was the first bit of genuine tune of the concert. We have never ranked Berlioz very high as a melodist, yet on this occasion one came upon the serenade as a weary traveller comes upon an oasis in the desert. The Salterello was full of animation and much applause followed the end of the work. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" had also been heartily recognized. The concert had the merit of brevity.

We can understand that a conductor must give us important new works whether he approves of them or not, but a single one might be quite enough at a sitting. Nor is the boredom consequent upon some of this modern iconoclasm the only bad result. We can state it as a definite fact that, while our orchestra is at present surpassingly brilliant, especially when imbued with Dr. Muck's great personality, its ensemble and precision is less than of yore. We can only ascribe this to the effect of some of these cacophonic compositions!

Louis C. Elson.

Paper	Sun
City	New York
Date	State N Y

MAR - 9 1907

Carnegie Hall's last pair of Bo... phony concerts this season will ... on March 21 and 23. On the Thurs... ing programme is the three-part ... poem by Claude Debussy, enti... Sea," with "The Mystic Trump... Converse, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz ... Berlioz "Carnaval Romain." The ... matinée will comprise Brahms's su... minor for flute and strings, the ... symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's ... ture, "The Magic Flute," and Beetho... Eighth Symphony.

Boston Transcript
24 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Light and Familiar Music in Which Conductor, Orchestra and Audience Take Their Pleasure

After their wrestlings with Strauss, Debussy, Brahms, and minor moderns and ultra-moderns, conductor, band and audience took their ease comparatively at the Symphony concert yesterday. For the second time in the course of the season, Dr. Muck chose his programme from music that was of the eighteenth century by date or in spirit. Two symphonies stood upon it—Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's eighth in F major—and each was very familiar. Between them was Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute," familiar too, but hardly in the dramatic accents that Dr. Muck gave to it. New, however, to the Symphony concerts, but not to those that know their Bach, was his "Brandenburg" concerto, in G major for strings, that began the list. From first to last the music bade the listeners to the pleasure of beautiful, ordered, flowing and expressive sound. It bade the conductor to heed of the curves, arabesques and ornaments of the tonal patterns he and his men were weaving, to a care of perfect euphony and brightness, to songful charm and serene simplicity. It bade the men to the delicate liveliness, the rippling fluidity of tone and the light spontaneous precision that has long been their custom in such music. In their playing yesterday it was hard to find, in spite of some keen-eared listeners in New York, any decline in these qualities. Rather Dr. Muck, and the men themselves under his stimulus, have given their tone a warmer brightness, and a more sparkling fluidity. The sheer suppleness of it was fascinating. It seemed to run of itself into the edgeless arabesques of the music. The pleasure of the performance matched the pleasure of the programme, and it was an immediate, serene and effortless pleasure. Therein, says the paradoxical Debussy, is the ideal purpose and attainment of music. Bach, he admits, achieved it. He is not so sure seemingly of the homely Haydn or the "unbuttoned" Beethoven of the eighth symphony. The audience yesterday was much surer than it is with Debussy himself.

H. T. P.

Boston Globe
28 March 10, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Yesterday's Symphony Offerings.

Bright Prospects for Coming Grand Opera Season.

Second Dolmetsch Recital —Current Gossip.

Last week's Symphony program was so modern that it seemed almost to lean forward; last night's, in grateful contrast, was of the powdered-hair period again; graceful music, powerful but simple music, the works of the great men who were inspired, not of experimental poets in tone.

No. 3 of the Bach "Brandenburg concertos" led the program, played for the first time in Symphony concerts. The work is arranged for the violins in three parts, the violas and celli in three, and basses. It is in two charming, breezy movements, and is Bach's own typical flowing contrapuntal development of simple themes. It called for a rearrangement of the players which brought an odd weight of tone at the left side of the hall, and demonstrated more than anything else could how very well the hall was designed for the orchestra in its ordinary arrangement.

The Haydn "military symphony" came next, beautiful and always carrying its surprises, in spite of familiarity; the wonderful andante movement played with a tenderness that made a strong contrast for the following rapid minuet, one of the best of all the symphonic minuets.

The theatrical, happy, excited overture to "The Magic Flute" made a pleasant resting place between two symphonies, and finally on the program was the great eighth symphony.

Of the performance there was as usual little to cause comment; the playing was perfect, the reading scholarly. The icy exactness, the almost military precision which was a characteristic of former conductors, seems to have been goodnaturedly shaded almost away, and the playing of the great band is the more spirited on that account.

No soloist is announced for this week's concert, any more than there was yesterday. The numbers for this week are Noskowski's overture, "The Steppe"; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad"; Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," and Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, the "pathetic symphony."

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., No. 69.
SUNDAY, MARCH 10, 1907.

17TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Plays Brandeburg Concerto for First Time.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Brandeburg concerto, No. 3.....Bach
Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2)..Haydn
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 7.....Beethoven

The concerto by Bach was played for the first time at these concerts. With the exception of this contrapuntal debauch the programme was made up of familiar and opproved compositions that have long been recommended as safe for family use. There is also safety in applauding music of this kind. As the old French song has it, "Just tell me when they come to Mozart's music, so that I may show publicly my pleasure."

There was much pleasure in listening last night, for Dr. Muck's interpretation was constantly engrossing. Let three or four able conductors lead a symphony by Haydn in successive years, and each will bring out something fresh and beautiful. There is in the music certain phrases or certain movements that appeal with special significance to A, while the other conductors, Messrs. B, C and D, are similarly incited to poetic interpretation by other passages which leave A cold.

Then music itself has a way of surprising even the hardened listener. A phrase will pass unnoticed by him for a dozen hearings and then suddenly reveal its beauty. No matter how poor a performance of "Carmen" may be, some exquisite detail of instrumentation will then be heard for the first time.

Critics Become Eulogists.

Criticism of the concert last night would resolve itself inevitably into eulogy of Dr. Muck. There might be discussion of subjects suggested by the nature of the programme, by the performance of Bach's music, by the manner of reading the andante of Haydn.

Should Bach's little chamber concerto be performed by a large, modern orchestra, and does it gain or lose thus performed? To what degree should a conductor modernize or "poetize" music of the 18th century, music that in itself is not emotional as we now understand emotion? Should a programme be made up of only classic works and another of only romantic compositions? A week ago last night the programme was ultra-modern, for Berlioz is still an ultra-modern. Last night it was rigidly classic. Next Saturday the compositions are Polish, Czech and Russian.

These questions, howevr, are subjects for essays of chief importance in a report of a concert.

It should be remembered, howevr, that all the pieces played last night were once new, and they no doubt, in turn, astonished or perplexed when they were first performed. Bach was a man far ahead of his period. Harmonically he, too, is an ultra-modern. Haydn visited London and bought out works, as Richard Strauss visited the United States to conduct pieces already composed by him and to produce his "Symphonia Dometsica," Mozart's music to "The Magic Flute" disappointed the Viennese at first. Beethoven's symphony did not please the audience when it was first performed.

Interpretation Admirable.

Dr. Muck treated the old music lovingly, but not in the spirit of an antiquarian, not with the piety which is sometimes called devotion, but is in fact dull, half-witted appreciation. He was fortunate with all the composers alike in his conception of their spirit. He was not pedantic, nor was he extravagant in the effort to show originality of treatment. His readings were sane, elastic, full of life.

The performance of Haydn's andante, of Beethoven's allegretto, and of Mozart's overture will linger in the memory, and if the impression made by these pieces was the most striking, it is because the music itself was inherently more effective, for his interpretation was admirable throughout the concert.

Paper	Union
City	Brooklyn
Date	State N Y

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22. The programme will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

Paper	Eagle
City	Brooklyn
Date	State N Y

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given in Baptist Temple on Friday evening, March 22. The programme will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique." This will in all probability be Dr. Muck's last appearance in Brooklyn.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
MARCH 11, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Bach. Brandenburg Concerto, for Strings.
Haydn. Symphony in D.
Mozart. "Magic Flute" overture.
Beethoven. Eighth Symphony.

Dr. Muck has had no half-measures in his programme. It is either all classical, or all modern, all Gallic, or all Teutonic, or all Slavonic. On this occasion it was entirely German and wholly classical. There was again no soloist. Of the last-named fact no one ought to complain, for our orchestra is sufficiently excellent, and our conductor sufficiently great, to be worth hearing quite by themselves.

We would have preferred the Brandenburg Concerto in a small hall and given with only ten or a dozen instruments. But even in its magnified state it had a beauty and indescribable dignity. Here is a symmetrical complexity that is built to last, which cannot be said of the modern 5-4 and 7-4 rhythms and zigzag modulations. There was much applause at its end, in fact a recall of the conductor.

We wonder whether Strauss, D'Indy, Debussy or Reger could create such a set of properly contrasted melodies as are found in a Haydn symphony! Haydn's first movements wear particularly well and his finales are almost always jovial and attractive in their rusticity. The formal variations which one often finds in his slow movements, and the set contrasts of tunes, in 3-4 rhythm, that form his Minuets, are less powerful to modern auditors. We found these two movements rather tepid on this occasion, not through any defect of interpretation, but simply because they represented a style that is tame to the modern listener.

But the "Magic Flute" overture made us sit up! It was the most original reading that we can remember. The introduction was taken so slow that it almost drop... apart. Per contra, the fugal exp... which constitutes the chief them... whipped up to a furious Presto. Th... in this subject were accented very s... ly (a full "sforzando" effect) which ... an entirely new result to the theme. ... do not dislike this effect but it is quite n... to us and, at first, it astonished us becaus... of its audacity.

The fugal matter shows what diverse results can be produced from the same tonal material, for if our readers will look up the Fugue No. 7, in the second part of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," they will find a very similar subject, in the same key, but leading to entirely different development. And this fugue happened to be Mozart's especial favorite among the shorter fugues of Bach.

We thought that the melodic subordinate theme of the overture suffered somewhat by being over-driven. The Prestissimo speed was maintained throughout the work. The Coda was urged to the point of fury.

There was nothing essentially new read into the Beethoven symphony, the most playful of the nine. The Bassoons deserve praise for excellence in their work which is most prominent in this composition. Beethoven loved this clown of the orchestra and used it as the best vehicle to express his merry moods, which often ran into the grotesque. In the second movement the charming dialogue between violins and violoncellos was daintily given and the brusquerie of the end was well portrayed. The horns played well in the trio of the Minuet. In the Finale there was an occasional desire to push "piano" effects to the "ppp" point and some parts were almost inaudible, but the flying leap from flutes to contrabasses, and the duet between kettle-drum and bassoon, were as sportive as could be wished. The contrabasses deserve especial mention.

But all in all, the Bach movements, even in their "arranged" state, were the finest part of the concert. In such noble music the true art-lover can hear calm and serene deities

"Who, as they sung, would take the prisoned soul
And lap it in Elysium."

Louis C. Elson.

Paper	Evening World
City	New York
Date	State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay their last visit to us for the season at two concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and the following Saturday afternoon. Claude Debussy's "La Mer," a novelty; Haydyn's symphony in D Major and Beethoven's eighth symphony are promised.

Paper	Globe
City	New York
Date	State NY

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Loudon Charlton's direction, starts on its annual spring tour the first of April. The itinerary, so far as arranged, includes Erie, Pa., April 3; Muncie, Ind., April 4; Ravinia Park, Ill., April 6 and 7;

[160]

...ston Street, Boston, Mass.

...ntered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, MARCH 11, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Concerts of Saturday

Even the Symphony concerts may not escape the New England conscience. If ever a programme was devised to give pure pleasure, it was that which Dr. Muck and the orchestra played on Friady and Saturday. It succeeded perfectly in its end. There was nothing, it seemed, for the reviewer to do but to testify to the pleasure that the two audiences received from programme and performance. Then, in the familiar form of the letter to the editor, enter the New England conscience that cannot take joy without questioning it. Should a concerto by Bach for a few stringed instruments in a small room be played in a large hall by the string choir of a modern orchestra? Should a programme of a Symphony concert consist entirely of music of the eighteenth century or of music that is akin to it in spirit? Should the overture to "The Magic Flute" be played with so much "operatic accent" as Dr. Muck gave it, and so forth. Clearly there are some among us that cannot take their pleasure for the pleasure's sake.

It is true that Bach wrote his concerto for the private orchestra and the music-room of the Margrave of Brandenburg. It is as true that were it to be played in a small hall by a small band, many a detail of its contrapuntal patterns might be finer than it was in the fuller voices of the string choir of our orchestra. So played, it would probably sound "quaint," and "quaintness," we suspect, is the unavowed desire of many of those who would have eighteenth century conditions. But they forget that this very concerto did not sound in the least "quaint" to the margrave and his guests. They came as naturally to it as we to the uncontroverted music of our own time. To them it was eloquent, fluent, brilliant, imaginative. The true aim of the conductor and the band who would play it today is to give it a similar eloquence and beauty to us. To do so he must use the instrumental means to which we are accustomed, or else he leaves us dawdling finically in the pretty and perilous meadow of "quaintness." And Bach was anything but "quaint." In fact, the vividest impression of this Brandenburg concerto is of the varied eloquence that Bach was drawing from a string choir in contrapuntal play. The moderns like to fancy that they have become exceedingly subtle and masterful in the manipulation of instrumental timbres. Yet it is hard to recall one of them who has attained such varied tonal color from a string choir as Bach obtains in this concerto, and so brilliantly and spontaneously. At moments it is like improvisation. After all Bach was the real parent of the fluency and the sensitiveness of line that is the goal of so much of our ultra-modern music. He accepted the musical paragraph that these moderns dislike, but within how supple and fleeting are his phrases and sentences.

Like or dislike for a concert of music of the eighteenth century is a personal taste about which argument is nearly futile. Such music quickly cloys some hearers. They resent its unemotional quality and its comparatively slender voice. They feel acutely its limitations—much more acutely than they do its characteristic beauties. A little suffices and they pine straightway for music that is more robustious of matter and manner. Others in their turn prefer a programme that keeps from beginning to end a mood, an atmosphere, a point of view. The surest way, they say, and reasonably, to dim and dull the essential qualities of eighteenth-century music is to sandwich it among the music of a later day. Does the discriminating collector hang his Watteaus and his Monets side by side? In the same way the discriminating conductor seeks to give each piece that he puts on his programme its peculiar quality unobscured by the appropriate qualities of its neighbors. Moreover, a distinctive virtue of this eighteenth century music is its insinuating charm. It penetrates the listener's fancy gradually, subtly, almost unconsciously. He passes from curiosity to interest, from interest to enjoyment, from enjoyment to exhilaration. He gains a new point of view and a new sort of pleasure by the magic of this music, and he is unaware of the spell until he is subject to it. The audience Saturday night listened to Beethoven's eighth symphony with the more zest because Bach, and Mozart and Haydn had been warming their ears and fancies to it.

And why should not the overture to "The Magic Flute" have all the "operatic accent" that Dr. Muck gave to it? If one sort of pedantic listener insists that all eighteenth century music shall sound "quaint," another sort—and still more pedantic—is as determined that it shall sound dry. As the true aim of a conductor with the Brandenburg concerto is to make it produce similar emotional effects upon us to those it produced upon the margrave's guests; so it should be the true aim of the conductor with the overture to "The Magic Flute" to make it sound emotionally to us as it sounded to the audience that first heard it in Schikaneder's little theatre in the suburbs of Vienna, nearly a century and a quarter ago. By every token of enduring human nature when it listens to music, those trombone chords must have been as irresistible as Dr. Muck made them on Friday and Saturday. They are thrilling. They are intended to thrill. The Mozart who wrote them was the Mozart who a few years before had brought the statue of the Commander stalking to the same instruments toward Don Juan's feast—the Mozart who could be musical dramatist. The thrill of the chords in a sense is obvious; but Dr. Muck went much further. He took the whole opening of the overture with new solemnity. Then in the sharpest of contrasts he flung the orchestra into the [illegible] through the [illegible]

...genuine ... that was ripening in Mozart. The overture was music of the theatre again, and by every sign Mozart intended it as nothing else.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date MAR 10 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last two Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain."

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be a classic one. It will comprise Brahms' Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra and Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 10 1907 State N Y

MUSICAL NOTES.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, March 22, at 3 o'clock. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, Opus 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major, Opus 99, and Mozart's quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola, and 'cello in A major, (K 581.) The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 10 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain." On Saturday evening the programme will be classic. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, Haydn's symphony in D major No. 2, Mozart's overture, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 11 1907 State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, March 22, at 3 o'clock. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, opus 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin and 'cello, in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, in A major (K 581). The assisting artists will be Madame Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 11 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain." On Saturday evening the programme will be classic. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 9 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse;

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 9 1907

will be Alwin Schroeder.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse;

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

The third and last concert of the Bost...

Paper Post
City New York
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Society will play at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn on Friday night. Thursday night's programme will be: "La Mer" (first time), Debussy; symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Converse; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, Bach; symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 2), Haydn; overture, "The Magic Flute," Mozart; symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven.

The Boston Journal

MARCH 16, 1907.

SOCIETY

Symphony Hall Is Again Filled

Rehearsal Devotees Turn Out in Large Numbers and Wear Their Fine Clothes.

Again Symphony Hall was filled with an audience of rehearsal devotees, the sunshine causing many to don their best attire. Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck were late in arriving, so that tardy ones were able to hear "The Steppe," a symphonic poem given here for the first time. Mrs. Muck, whose seat is near the Henry L. Higginsons, looked very attractive in black broadcloth and hat of blue felt. Others there were Mrs. Francis I. Amory and her tall young daughter, Mary Josephine; Miss Barbara Higginson, her youthful stepmother, Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson (Corinne Shattuck); Miss Colette Dumaresq, Miss Ethel Forbes, Miss Jackson, Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Mrs. Newton, Mrs. C. Lesne Wead, Miss Helen A. Whittier, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Mrs. Neal Hantoul and daughter, Mrs. James Jackson, Sr. and Jr., Mrs. William Bacon, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss Julia Lawrence, Mrs. E. B. Cowles, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. John L. Thorndike and daughter Olivia, Mrs. Charles F. Lyman, Miss Mary Fay, Mrs. Irving Wood, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mrs. Frederick Warren and Mrs. William P. Fay. On account of Good Friday, the next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon at the usual hour.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 16, 1907

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 18th rehearsal of our Symphony Orchestra consisted of an overture, "The Steppe," by Noskowski (first time); symphonic poem, "Vyschrad," Smetana; overture, "Husitka," Dvorak; and Tschaikowsky's sixth symphonic, the "Pathetic."

Noskowski's overture, if it had been written in Germany, would be called "kapellmeister" music. Honest, sincere music, it is in no wise particularly interesting or convincing, being modelled on a European plan of warranted convenience and respectability, while completely lacking pronounced originality. The customary slow introduction portrays the vast, silent Russian steppe. Reminiscences of war and slaughter—martial first theme. Songs of happier times—Cossack melody. The present, nature and time, the all-healer—coda. Return of introduction—Pax vobiscum. The only taste of a real live theme is provided by the Cossack tune, which is really and truly Cossack. Otherwise, let it be said that a man, however honest and well-meaning he may be, should beware of such a well worn formula when he has nothing particularly new to say.

Dr. Muck is a musician of broad experience in many fields, but of late he has been, if we are not mistaken, particularly active as a conductor of opera. As a natural consequence he possessed to an eminent degree those qualities essential to the successful filling of such a post; as remarkable elasticity of rhythm, a keen harmonic instinct and sense of color—a sense which leads him to secure interesting results by allowing various instruments to show out with their particular note or phrase in the harmonic scheme of things—and unusual ease in the deciphering of complex scores and the handling of a large body of men.

His interpretations have frequently betrayed an operatic tendency, and yesterday's highly-colored programme was one eminently calculated for the display of such faculties. So much so that Smetana's noble poem, which was given an imposing interpretation, communicated almost the impression of an overture to some great drama, rather than of a complete unit, perfect in itself. "Now," one felt, "the curtain rises!"

Dvorak's overture, to us his strongest work in this form, was given an individual and superbly dramatic performance.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN.
SUNDAY, MARCH 17, 1907

By Kent Perkins.

Personally conducted by Dr. Muck, with the inspiring company of the Symphony Orchestra, the big audience at Symphony Hall last night was taken on a musical "grand tour" of the Slavic nations, for the programme was made up entirely of music by Polish, Bohemian and Russian composers.

The travellers made the journey with joyous enthusiasm. Seldom have Symphony audiences shown keener pleasure on any special excursions to which they have been invited. They heard modern music; they listened to strains that were off the beaten track of the oft-repeated, orthodox classics; they were delighted with melodic, rythmic and harmonic inspiration that was a real, genuine, spontaneous facial, yet their ears were not vexed with the machine-made bash that is so often served as "ultra-modern" music, that is rapturously admired because it is new, extravagantly praised because no one can imagine what it is all about, and devoutly worshipped because it is not "obvious."

The orchestra was at its best. It never played with more enthusiasm, power, unity of purpose and artistic finish.

Poland's Plains Pictured.

"The Steppe," a symphonic poem in the form of an overture, by Siegmund Noskowski, a Pole, was played here for the first time. It purports to represent the feelings inspired by the boundless plains of Poland and Russia that undulate in fixed, eternal swells under the blue dome of the sky to infinity; now silent and dotted with flowers; again melodious with the pipes of shepherds; now traversed by jingling Cossack bands and then shaken by the tramp of armies and splashed with the blood of battles.

These varying scenes are forcefully and beautifully suggested by the music, while the vastness and sternness of the great plains are kept ever present in the underlying harmony of the work. It was warmly received and ought to be heard again.

Bohemia was represented first by the symphonic poem, "Vyschrad," by Smetana, which sings romantically with resounding harp, calling horn and glowing orchestra harmonies of the knightly legends, the glories and the fall of a famous fortress of Prague.

The land of the Czechs also furnished Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska," in which the solemn fanaticism, the wars and the triumphs of the Hussites are vividly portrayed.

Tschaikowsky's 'Obvious' Masterpiece.

The evening's tour ended in Russia with Tschaikowsky's immortal "Pathetic" symphony. In this Dr. Muck and the orchestra outdid themselves. Their hearers drank in with delight the splendid succession of "obvious" melodies and magnificent original harmonies. The music of this monumental work, though modern to the core, though fundamentally Slavic in its basic inspiration, is universal in its fully developed appeal. It is gloriously "obvious," as the Parthenon and the Cathedral of Notre Dame of Paris were "obvious," after they were conceived and executed by their inspired creators—and "obvious" for all time.

Every movement was greeted with great

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
MONDAY, MARCH 11, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Concerts of Saturday

Even the Symphony concerts may not escape the New England conscience. If ever a programme was devised to give pure pleasure, it was that which Dr. Muck and the orchestra played on Friady and Saturday. It succeeded perfectly in its end. There was nothing, it seemed, for the reviewer to do but to testify to the pleasure that the two audiences received from programme and performance. Then, in the familiar form of the letter to the editor, enter the New England conscience that cannot take joy without questioning it. Shou.d a concerto by Bach for a few stringed instruments in a small room be played in a large hall by the string choir of a modern orchestra? Should a programme of a Symphony concert consist entirely of music of the eighteenth century or of music that is akin to it in spirit? Should the overture to "The Magic Flute" be played with so much "operatic accent" as Dr. Muck gave it, and so forth. Clearly there are some among us that cannot take their pleasure for the pleasure's sake.

It is true that Bach wrote his concerto for the private orchestra and the music-room of the Margrave of Brandenburg. It is as true that were it to be played in a small hall by a small band, many a detail of its contrapuntal patterns might be finer than it was in the fuller voices of the string choir of our orchestra. So played, it would probably sound "quaint," and "quaintness," we suspect, is the unavowed desire of many of those who would have eighteenth century conditions. But they forget that this very concerto did not sound in the least "quaint" to the margrave and his guests. They came as naturally to it as we to the uncontroverted music of our own time. To them it was eloquent, fluent, brilliant, imaginative. The true aim of the conductor and the band who would play it today is to give it a similar eloquence and beauty to us. To do so he must use the instrumental means to which we are accustomed, or else he leaves us dawdling finically in the pretty and perilous meadow of "quaintness." And Bach was anything but "quaint." In fact, the vividest impression of this Brandenburg concerto is of the varied eloquence that Bach was drawing from a string choir in contrapuntal play. The moderns like to fancy that they have become exceedingly subtle and masterful in the manipulation of instrumental timbres. Yet it is hard to recall one of them who has attained such varied tonal color from a string choir as Bach obtains in this concerto, and so brilliantly and spontaneously. At moments it is like improvisation. After all Bach was the real parent of the fluency and the sensitiveness of line that is the goal of so much of our ultra-modern music. He accepted the musical paragraph that these moderns dislike, but within how supple and fleeting are his phrases and sentences.

Like or dislike for a concert of music of the eighteenth century is a personal taste about which argument is nearly futile. Such music quickly cloys some hearers. They resent its unemotional quality and its comparatively slender voice. They feel acutely its limitations—much more acutely than they do its characteristic beauties. A little suffices and they pine straightway for music that is more robustious of matter and manner. Others in their turn prefer a programme that keeps from beginning to end a mood, an atmosphere, a point of view. The surest way, they say, and reasonably, to dim and dull the essential qualities of eighteenth-century music is to sandwich it among the music of a later day. Does the discriminating collector hang his Watteaus and his Monets side by side? In the same way the discriminating conductor seeks to give each piece that he puts on his programme its peculiar quality unobscured by the appropriate qualities of its neighbors. Moreover, a distinctive virtue of this eighteenth century music is its insinuating charm. It penetrates the listener's fancy gradually, subtly, almost unconsciously. He passes from curiosity to interest, from interest to enjoyment, from enjoyment to exhilaration. He gains a new point of view and a new sort of pleasure by the magic of this music, and he is unaware of the spell until he is subject to it. The audience Saturday night listened to Beethoven's eighth symphony with the more zest because Bach, and Mozart and Haydn had been warming their ears and fancies to it.

And why should not the overture to "The Magic Flute" have all the "operatic accent" that Dr. Muck gave to it? If one sort of pedantic listener insists that all eighteenth century music shall sound "quaint," another sort—and still more pedantic—is as determined that it shall sound dry. As the true aim of a conductor with the Brandenburg concerto is to make it produce similar emotional effects upon us to those it produced upon the margrave's guests; so it should be the true aim of the conductor with the overture to "The Magic Flute" to make it sound emotionally to us as it sounded to the audience that first heard it in Schikaneder's little theatre in the suburbs of Vienna, nearly a century and a quarter ago. By every token of enduring human nature when it listens to music, those trombone chords must have been as irresistible as Dr. Muck made them on Friday and Saturday. They are thrilling. They are intended to thrill. The Mozart who wrote them was the Mozart who a few years before had brought the statue of the Commander stalking to the same instruments toward Don Juan's feast—the Mozart who could be musical dramatist. The thrill of the chords in a sense is obvious; but Dr. Muck went much further. He took the whole opening of the overture with slow solemnity. Then in the sharpest of contrasts he flung the orchestra into the fugue and sent it whirling through the [illegible] with sharp accent and tonal highlights. The effect was as stirring and brilliant as that of the chords had been intense and sombre. In it were the two moods of the opera and the genuine dramatic genius that was ripening in Mozart. The overture was music of the theatre again, and by every sign Mozart intended it as nothing else.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date MAR 10 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last two Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain."

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be a classic one. It will comprise Brahms' Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra and Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

MUSICAL NOTES.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, March 22, at 8 o'clock. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, Opus 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major, Opus 90, and Mozart's quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola, and 'cello in A major, (K 581.) The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain." On Saturday evening the programme will be classic. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, Haydn's symphony in D major No. 2, Mozart's overture, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, March 22, at 3 o'clock. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, opus 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin and 'cello, in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello, in A major (K 581). The assisting artists will be Madame Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." This is in three parts. The other items on the programme will be the symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Berlioz's "Carnival Romain." On Saturday evening the programme will be classic. It will comprise Bach's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 9 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N Y

will be Alwin Schroeder.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday, evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

The third and last concert of the Bost[illegible]

The Boston Journal
MARCH 16, 1907.

SOCIETY

Symphony Hall Is Again Filled

Rehearsal Devotees Turn Out in Large Numbers and Wear Their Fine Clothes.

Again Symphony Hall was filled with an audience of rehearsal devotees, the sunshine causing many to don their best attire. Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck were late in arriving, so that tardy ones were able to hear "The Steppe," a symphonic poem given here for the first time. Mrs. Muck, whose seat is near the Henry L. Higginsons, looked very attractive in black broadcloth and hat of blue felt. Others there were Mrs. Francis I. Amory and her tall young daughter, Mary Josephine; Miss Barbara Higginson, her youthful stepmother, Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson (Corinne Shattuck); Miss Colette Dumaresq, Miss Ethel Forbes, Miss Jackson, Mrs. Frederick Converse, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Mrs. Newton, Mrs. C. Leslie Wead, Miss Helen A. Whittier, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and daughter, Mrs. James Jackson, Sr. and Jr., Mrs. William Bacon, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss Julia Lawrence, Mrs. E B. Cowles, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. John L. Thorndike and daughter Olivia, Mrs. Charles F. Lyman, Miss Mary Fay, Mrs. Irving Wood, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mrs. Frederick Warren and Mrs. William P. Fay. On account of Good Friday, the next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon at the usual hour.

Paper Post
City New York
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Society will play at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn on Friday night. Thursday night's programme will be: "La Mer" (first time), Debussy; symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Converse; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; overture, "Roman Carnival," Berlioz. The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, Bach; symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2), Haydn; overture, "The Magic Flute," Mozart; symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven.

BOSTON POST.
MARCH 16, 1907

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 18th rehearsal of our Symphony Orchestra consisted of an overture, "The Steppe," by Noskowski (first time); symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana; overture, "Husitka," Dvorak; and Tschaikowsky's sixth symphonic, the "Pathetic."

Noskowski's overture, if it had been written in Germany, would be called "kapellmeister" music. Honest, sincere music, it is in no wise particularly interesting or convincing, being modelled on a European plan of warranted convenience and respectability, while completely lacking pronounced originality. The customary slow introduction portrays the vast, silent Russian steppe. Reminiscences of war and slaughter—martial first theme. Songs of happier times—Cossack melody. The present, nature and time, the all-healer—coda. Return of introduction—Pax vobiscum. The only taste of a real live theme is provided by the Cossack tune, which is really and truly Cossack. Otherwise let it be said that a man, however honest and well-meaning he may be, should beware of such a well worn formula when he has nothing particularly new to say.

Dr. Muck is a musician of broad experience in many fields, but of late he has been, if we are not mistaken, particularly active as a conductor of opera. As a natural consequence he possessed to an eminent degree those qualities essential to the successful filling of such a post; as remarkable elasticity of rhythm, a keen harmonic instinct and sense of color—a sense which leads him to secure interesting results by allowing various instruments to show out with their particular note or phrase in the harmonic scheme of things—and unusual ease in the deciphering of complex scores and the handling of a large body of men.

His interpretations have frequently betrayed an operatic tendency, and yesterday's highly-colored programme was one eminently calculated for the display of such faculties. So much so that Smetana's noble poem, which was given an imposing interpretation, communicated almost the impression of an overture to some great drama, rather than of a complete unit, perfect in itself. "Now," one felt, "the curtain rises!"

Dvorak's overture, to us his strongest work in this form, was given an individual and superbly dramatic performance.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, MARCH 17, 1907

By Kent Perkins.

Personally conducted by Dr. Muck, with the inspiring company of the Symphony Orchestra, the big audience at Symphony Hall last night was taken on a musical "grand tour" of the Slavic nations, for the programme was made up entirely of music by Polish, Bohemian and Russian composers.

The travellers made the journey with joyous enthusiasm. Seldom have Symphony audiences shown keener pleasure on any special excursions to which they have been invited. They heard modern music; they listened to strains that were off the beaten track of the oft-repeated, orthodox classics; they were delighted with melodic, rythmic and harmonic inspiration that was a real, genuine, spontaneous facial, yet their ears were not vexed with the machine-made hash that is so often served as "ultra-modern" music, that is rapturously admired because it is new, extravagantly praised because no one can imagine what it is all about, and devoutly worshipped because it is not "obvious."

The orchestra was at its best. It never played with more enthusiasm, power, unity of purpose and artistic finish.

Poland's Plains Pictured.

"The Steppe," a symphonic poem in the form of an overture, by Siegmund Noskowski, a Pole, was played here for the first time. It purports to represent the feelings inspired by the boundless plains of Poland and Russia that undulate in fixed, eternal swells under the blue dome of the sky to infinity; now silent and dotted with flowers; again melodious with the pipes of shepherds; now traversed by singing Cossack bands and then shaken by the tramp of armies and splashed with the blood of battles.

These varying scenes are forcefully and beautifully suggested by the music, while the vastness and sternness of the great plains are kept ever present in the underlying harmony of the work. It was warmly received and ought to be heard again.

Bohemia was represented first by the symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," by Smetana, which sings romantically with resounding harp, calling horn and glowing orchestral harmonies of the knightly legends, the glories and the fall of a famous fortress of Prague.

The land of the Czechs also furnished Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska," in which the solemn fanaticism, the wars and the triumphs of the Hussites are vividly portrayed.

Tschaikowsky's 'Obvious' Masterpiece

The evening's tour ended in Russia with Tschaikowsky's immortal "Pathetic" symphony. In this Dr. Muck and the orchestra outdid themselves. Their hearers drank in with delight the splendid succession of "obvious" melodies and magnificently original harmonies. The music of this monumental work, though modern to the core, though fundamentally Slavic in its basic inspiration, is universal in its fully developed appeal. It is gloriously "obvious," as the Parthenon and the Cathedral of Notre Dame of Paris were "obvious" after they were conceived and executed by their inspired creators—and "obvious" for all time.

Every movement was greeted with great applause, but after the third with its tumultuous vivacity the orchestra was forced to rise in order to acknowledge the tribute to its splendid work.

[161]

...ARCH 17, 1907.

SLAV MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"The Steppe" Is a Remarkable Tone Painting of a Battle Scene.

DVORAK OVERTURE IS TAME IN COMPARISON

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Is Forcefully Interpreted by Dr. Muck.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonic poem, "The Steppe"...Noskowski
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Dramatic overture, "Husitska".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"....Tschaikowsky

Noskowski's symphonic poem, in the form of an overture, was played here for the first time. Little of this Polish composer's music is known in Boston, although he is now over 40 years of age. Ten years ago the Adamowski quartet played his quartet in D minor.

The "Steppe" is programme music. The argument in short is as follows: The heath still remains calm and beautiful after the warriors who fought on it have become dust: it was as indifferent to the "drums and tramplings of three conquests" as it was to the shepherd's pipe or the songs of Cossacks.

And in like manner, when the strangest deeds were possible to Yeobright's mood after he had learned how Eustacia barred the door against his mother, he saw before him Egdon Heath: "Only the imperturbable countenance of the heath, which, having defied the cataclysmal onsets of centuries, reduced to insignificance by its seamed and antique features the wildest turmoil of a single man."

The fascinating monotony of an Asiatic steppe inspired Borodin to write an orchestral sketch which is familiar to our symphony audience. The piece was composed for performance at an exhibition of tableaux vivantes, and it pictures the approach and the passing of a caravan escorted by Russian soldiers.

Tone Painting of Battle.

Noskowski, some say, might have entitled his composition, "A Battle on the Steppe," for the greater part of it, according to them, is a painting in tones of a battle scene and the battle is not in this overture, merely an episode in the life of the heath.

This assertion is unreasonable, for the most striking portions of the work are the pages that may be considered as descriptive of the heath in its natural state, undisturbed by man, and the Cossack measures. Nor is the final impression one of stormy battle music. As Noskowski preferred to present his symphonic poem in the form of an overture he did not allow himself the fullest freedom in expression; the chief themes are developed, they reappear, as in any modern overture of orthodox nature, while the heath music serves as an introduction and also as an ending.

This introduction is the most original and individual portion of the work by reason of an unusual color effect obtained both by harmonic treatment and by orchestration. The introduction is impressive in this respect. The Cossack episode is melodically charming and it is also well colored. The other portions of the work are more conventional, but the interest is maintained throughout, with the exception of the battle pages, which are perfunctory.

Smetana's "Vyschrad," which is also programme music, has the splendor that falls on castle walls

And snowy summits old in story.

The musician, as well as the poet, saw the citadel of Libussa in its glory of gold-decked shrines and brave showing of warriors; he heard the sonorous chants of praise and knightly jubilation. He, too, saw the ravages of man crueller than Time, and heard the echo of Lumir's proud song. The music has simple majesty. It is Bardic in its rapt imaginative flight.

There is nothing that is pretentious or labored. There is no incongruous, disturbing detail. There are the superb lines of mural decoration and the glowing warmth of the canvas. This is music of which Smetana's countrymen may well be proud. The reproach that it is laboriously national cannot be brought against it. Especially worthy of remark is the singular euphony of the close.

Dvorak Suffers in Comparison.

Compared with this noble work, the overture by Dvorak seemed melodramatic and meretricious. The introduction has a certain force, but the main body of the overture is long drawn out, the chief musical ideas are of little worth and the treatment of them is conspicuous only for the fluency and the plausible but noisy brilliance that characterize so many of Dvorak's compositions.

It must be said, however, that the overture might have gained in effect, brutal as the effect might be, had it not followed two pieces that in a certain way had a somewhat similar mood—martial, chivalric, call it what you please. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony suffered inevitably from its immediate popularity. Its "particular and shaking motion" led some conductors to extravagant interpretation, while others, shrinking from the gloom and the despair of the music, endeavored to mitigate the message of woe. Tschaikowsky, as the late Vernon Blackburn finely said, was "the man in what appears to be the ultimate condition of culture [illegible]

...Dvorak. Dramatic Overture. "Husitska."
Tschaikowsky. Pathetic Symphony.

Again a concert without a soloist (which we regard as a merit), and again one of those unified programmes which Dr. Muck is constantly arranging. On this occasion it was a Slav-Czech affair and very "national" in its character. The first three works were all built upon the broad foundation of the folk song. The Noskowski work began impressively with that Muscovite melancholy that is so attractive. It is that sadness described by Longfellow—"that resembles sorrow only as the mist resembles rain."

The work, however, soon changed its character and turned to scenes of combat and war. Here there was a sketchy, unsustained treatment which did not compare with the military touches which came in the subsequent numbers of Smetana and Tschaikowsky. The Cossack dances brought the wild abandon of one phase of Russian music to the foreground. Noskowski is a Pole, but he has in this overture gone fairly into the Russian domain.

The mine of folk music that Russia possesses is the richest of any country except possibly Scotland. It is a guarantee that Russian music (even in the large orchestral forms) will remain melodic for a long time to come, while Germany and France are cherishing modulation rather than melody. And some day Scotland, too, will find a composer who is able to welo its wealth of little gems into a large musical art work. To return to the Steppe; the reading was a very broad and powerful one, the ending being especially vigorous.

The work of Smetana was the most sincere and the most masterly of the first part of the programme. Smetana had not the skill in scoring nor the contrapuntal knowledge of his pupil Dvorak, yet because of his great enthusiasm and his zeal for Bohemia, it is probable that some of his orchestral works will outrank those of his successor. One is plunged into a poetic atmosphere in the very first measures of "Vyselrad," when the harp begins its bardic prelude. Mr. Schuecker played this with a loftiness and power that deserves the most cordial recognition. The trumpets also gave their important passages with commendable vigor.

Dr. Muck read the work magnificently, working up its great climaxes with proper force and giving the free improvisational passages with an effective elasticity of tempo. It is evident that our conductor is not afraid of a "fortississimo" occasionally. At this concert he was determined that the brasses should earn their salary. That the fiery readings appealed to the audience was very evident, for we do not recall a symphony concert where the applause was so continuous and so evenly distributed, each work and each movement of the symphony being received with fervor.

Nevertheless, in the Dvorak overture, we began to be satiated with brass thunderings and we felt, with Shakespeare's Quince, that the lion had better roar more gently. For all its bombast this overture could not swell itself up to Smetana proportions. It was the weakest of the three national numbers that began the programme. It was written for the opening of a Bohemian theatre in Prague, which reminds us that Beethoven made a somewhat better "Dedication of the House" overture with less brass, less fortissimo and less gloom. Yet the overture has much ingenuity of figure development, a striking trumpet call being transformed into almost everything from muted horn bleatings to growls upon the deepest wood-wind. Dvorak dealt better by us when he took up American nationalism in music.

The concert ended with the "Symphonie Pathetique," which wears well. Even after we are familiar with all its manifestations of sorrow of all kinds (it presents about 16 different sorts of woe), we still find it an impressive work. Some of its orchestral combinations are the best that Tschaikowsky has given us. Its free form is not to be counted as a fault; Liszt, Schumann and others have demonstrated that "sonata form" need not became a fetish. Nor is its popularity to be considered a crime; it is not essential to remove a symphonic work from the comprehension of the ordinary auditor. And it has attractive melodies. But the Russian composers are all steeped in the crime of being melodic.

The first movement seems the least powerful. Dr. Muck made more of it than we had deemed possible. His freedom of tempo, his sharp contrasts, his touches of extreme slowness, were all very effective. The trombones played magnificently in this movement.

The beautiful 5-4 movement, with its restlessness and unease even in the midst of its galety, has been better done. We missed something of the lightness, daintiness and elasticity of some previous performances. It was not technically perfect. But the third movement was so entirely successful that it seemed almost a new work. The trumpet figure that finally develops into a triumphant march was superbly worked up. Dr. Muck made it a march such as an Attila, a world-conqueror might step to. It was the most inspiring performance of the concert and the audience showed how much the music had excited them. There had been applause at the end of each movement, and the usual bowed acknowledgements. But at the end of this march there was a great outburst which would not be quieted until Dr. Muck had bowed many times and finally the orchestra had arisen and also bowed.

The finale was also nobly read and performed. It is not as great a picture of death as Richard Strauss has created in his best work, but its development of a wailing figure which is much like the first phrase of "Ombra mai fu" by Handel, is striking, and the canonic dialogue on this is skillful as well. The dramatic content of the movement is obvious and was clearly expressed in the performance.

And so the concert which had been indulging in fortissimo effects almost all through restored the average by ending "ppppp."

Louis C. Elson.

...ed his symphony [illegible] ...ed with the [illegible] ...ed with the [illegible] ...ed with the

SUNDAY GLOBE
MARCH 17, 1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Once again the Symphony orchestra program was without a soloist, last week's concerts, like the two previous ones, being made up entirely of orchestral numbers. Three times in succession without assisting artists is rather unusual with this orchestra, whose 18th program consisted of a new symphonic poem by Noskowski, called "The Steppe"; "Vysehrad," by Smetana; Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Noskowski's poem was played here for the first time. The program was decidedly Slavic in its selections, for the four composers represented either were Russians or showed the influence of the Slav in musical ideas.

Noskowski in his last work essayed to depict scenes upon the "steppes," whose face had resounded with the tramp of armed horsemen and where shepherds with their flocks once roamed. Wild songs of the fighting Cossacks mingled with the simple music of the shepherds and by these strong contrasts the composer has developed a tone picture vivid in contour, but not overwhelmingly harsh and defeaning in its orchestration. The Cossack themes are melodious in a characteristic way, accentuated by tambourine, harp and strings in pizzicatto, and the battle episodes are sufficiently vigorus to suggest war's alarums in fortessimo measures.

In speaking of the performance by Dr Muck's orchestra general praise, the oft-reiterated phrase, suffices to indicate results. In the first number the contrasts were few compared to the Smetana poem, for in the latter there was not only conflict and the pastoral phases, but also the atmosphere of a festal day clouded at times by songs of lamentations and forebodings of disaster. Then in Dvorak's "Husitska" overture "war" is the principal theme, solemn, bold and impressive. In each of these somewhat sanguinary works about the only defect appeared to be in the brass contingent, which sometimes was faulty in attack.

The program closed with a fine interpretation of Tschaikowsky's grand "Pathetic" symphony. The exquisite second movement, the interrupted waltz theme, was notably well performed.

The orchestra will be away this week, and as Good Friday falls on March 29, the rehearsal next week will be given Thursday afternoon, March 28. Mrs Bertha Child, the soloist, will sing an aria from Rossi's "Mitrane" and an excerpt from "La Captive," by Berlioz. The orchestral pieces will include Cherubini's overture to "Les Abencerages," a double fugue by Oskar Fried for string orchestra and a repetition of the Strauss' "Symphonia Domes[tica]"

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 18, 1907.

SLAV PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Nowskowski's Novelty, "The Steppe," Outshone by the Tschaikowski "Pathetique."

Conductor Muck set forth another program without contrasts for the eighteenth Symphony concert. The music was all Slavic and Czech, and not only so, but at least three of the works thus placed side by side bore so clear and certain resemblances in thought and form that not one of them made the effect that it could have produced if there had been interspersed selections of a gentler school. It was in most respects a roaring concert, an expression of blood and fire and gloom that once more aroused serious doubts that Dr. Muck, great interpreter and master of an orchestra though he be, knows how to make a program that does justice to the composers he calls together.

The novelty came first. It was Nowskowski's "The Steppe," a symphonic poem depicting in tone colors the "majestic heath" of Russia, first in its beautiful serenity before man's passions vexed it, then resounding with the Cossack songs and the clash of arms, and again calm and untroubled. The work has charm and fascinating qualities, more especially in the early portion, where mystic and lovely orchestration really convinced of the sunlight brooding over the verdured plains. There was haunting rhythm and melody in the Cossack song, but the battle episode was merely noisy, and the finale seemed too flamboyant for the return of the "ever calm and beautiful" on the steppe. On the whole an interesting thing, but not a work that demands a re-hearing by any inherent greatness.

Smetana's "Vysebrad" and Dvorak's "Husitska" are familiar. The nobility and glorious simplicity of the former were admirably expressed by Dr. Muck and his men, while as much as possible was done for the latter, which is for the most part a dull and bombastic work. Dvorak in his least inspired moments. And each hurt the other, as has been said.

But nothing that had gone before could lessen the overwhelming effect of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, that somberly beautiful outburst of the pessimist's "vanity of vanities." It was read with consummate mastery of form and a dramatically tragic appreciation of its message that made the performance perhaps the most memorable ever heard here.

SUNDAY HERALD
MARCH 17, 1907.

SLAV MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"The Steppe" Is a Remarkable Tone Painting of a Battle Scene.

DVORAK OVERTURE IS TAME IN COMPARISON

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Is Forcefully Interpreted by Dr. Muck.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Smyphonic poem, "The Steppe"...Noskowski
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Dramatic overture, "Husitska".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"....Tschaikowsky

Noskowski's symphonic poem, in the form of an overture, was played here for the first time. Little of this Polish composer's music is known in Boston, although he is now over 60 years of age. Ten years ago the Adamowski quartet played his quartet in D minor.

The "Steppe" is programme music. The argument in short is as follows: The heath still remains calm and beautiful after the warriors who fought on it have become dust: it was as indifferent to the "drums and tramplings of three conquests" as it was to the shepherd's pipe or the songs of Cossacks.

And in like manner, when the strangest deeds were possible to Yeobright's mood after he had learned how Eustacia barred the door against his mother, he saw before him Egdon Heath: "Only the imperturbable countenance of the heath, which, having defied the cataclysmal onsets of centuries, reduced to insignificance by its seamed and antique features the wildest turmoil of a single man."

The fascinating monotony of an Asiatic steppe inspired Borodin to write an orchestral sketch which is familiar to our symphony audience. The piece was composed for performance at an exhibition of tableaux vivantes, and it pictures the approach and the passing of a caravan escorted by Russian soldiers.

Tone Painting of Battle.

Noskowski, some say, might have entitled his composition, "A Battle on the Steppe," for the greater part of it, according to them, is a painting in tones of a battle scene and the battle is not in this overture, merely an episode in the life of the heath.

This assertion is unreasonable, for the most striking portions of the work are the pages that may be considered as descriptive of the heath in its natural state, undisturbed by man, and the Cossack measures. Nor is the final impression one of stormy battle music. As Noskowski preferred to present his symphonic poem in the form of an overture he did not allow himself the fullest freedom in expression; the chief themes are developed, they reappear, as in any modern overture of orthodox nature, while the heath music serves as an introduction and also as an ending.

This introduction is the most original and individual portion of the work by reason of an unusual color effect obtained both by harmonic treatment and by orchestration. The introduction is impressive in this respect. The Cossack episods is melodically charming and it is also well colored. The other portions of the work are more conventional, but the interest is maintained throughout, with the exception of the battle pages, which are perfunctory.

Smetana's "Vysehrad," which is also programme music, has the splendor that falls on castle walls

And snowy summits old in story.

The musician, as well as the poet, saw the citadel of Libussa in its glory of gold-decked shrines and brave showing of warriors; he heard the sonorous chants of praise and knightly jubilation. He, too, saw the ravages of man crueller than Time, and heard the echo of Lumir's proud song. The music has ample majesty. It is Bardic in its rapt imaginative flight.

There is nothing that is pretentious or labored. There is no incongruous, disturbing detail. There are the superb lines of mural decoration and the glowing warmth of the canvas. This is music of which Smetana's countrymen may well be proud. The reproach that it is laboriously national cannot be brought against it. Especially worthy of remark is the singular euphony of the close.

Dvorak Suffers In Comparison.

Compared with this noble work, the overture by Dvorak seemed melodramatic and meretricious. The introduction has a certain force, but the main body of the overture is long drawn out, the chief musical ideas are of little worth and the treatment of them is conspicuous only for the fluency and the plausible but noisy brilliance that characterize so many of Dvorak's compositions.

It must be said, however, that the overture might have gained in effect, brutal as the effect might be, had it not followed two pieces that in a certain way had a somewhat similar mood—martial, chivalric, call it what you please.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony suffered inevitably from its immediate popularity. Its "particular and shaking motion" led some conductors to extravagant interpretation, while others, shrinking from the gloom and the despair of the music, endeavored to mitigate the message of woe. Tschaikowsky, as the late Vernon Blackburn finely said, was "the man in what appears to us as the ultimate condition of culture indissolubly united by the cohesion of a single brain to the man of primitive musical passion and savage musical de[sires]."

[illegible] ...ness, his [illegible] ...mes akin to childishness, his [illegible] ...which is that of the oriental, in [illegible] ...on and insistence, his passion for [illegible] ...nd rhythm, his groans and shrieks and [illegible] ...till more terrible mutterings—these are [illegible] ...ot to be softened or explained away. They call for no apology. The man of [illegible] ...he intimate journal and the letters to [illegible] ...rs. von Meck is the composer of the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia and of the fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies. He must be accepted as he is or not at all.

Dr. Muck's Interpretation.

There was naturally curiosity concerning Dr. Muck's interpretation of his remarkable work, which while it may be inferior as an artistic composition to Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in the logical continuity of musical thought and in its structure, is nevertheless a more intensely personal document.

The performance was forcible, poetic, dramatic. The expressive theme of the first movement, which is to some a tumbling-block, the theme that may perhaps typify the remembrance of youth with its transports and illusions of love, was not sentimentalized, and so throughout the symphony the dramatic contents were not emphasized, until passion became bombast.

On the other hand Dr. Muck's reading of the marcu-scherzo and of the mighty lamentation was highly dramatic without being theatrical. It is very easy to give a spectacular performance of the "Pathetic"; to out-Tschaikowsky Tschaikowsky; but Dr. Muck did not overstep the boundary of tragedy, and his passion was therefore the more moving and thrilling.

The second movement was played with musual grace and the trio with its wails of anguish for the gayety that precedes is after all half-hearted and its quiet and sinister tapping of the drum was extraordinarily impressive.

Dr. Muck not only brought out with great dramatic force the obviously dramatic pages; he was eloquent in matters of detail, in the innuendos and in the reminders that are peculiarly Tschaikowskian. Yet these points of detail did not assume undue importance. All in all, the performance was engrossing, deeply, not superficially, emotional, memorable in every way. Never has the threnody been performed here with such overpowering effect.

N. Y. Herald

March 12, 1907.

Boston Players in Concert.

De Bussey's "The Sea," a series of three orchestral pieces, was the chief novelty at the Boston Symphony concert last evening in Carnegie Hall, the other numbers of the programme being F. S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the overture "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz—all modern works.

It was not a scheme to merit entire approval, nor did it give unalloyed pleasure to the audience. Not one of the classical composers was represented—in fact, the programme of the musical feast lacked the main dish, the roast.

Dr. Karl Muck conducted the concert with authority and distinction. There is great economy of gesture in his method; he is dignified and obtains all his effects with ease. A fortissimo passage causes him no effort and his conducting is a profitable study, for notwithstanding his true comprehension of the modern romantic type of composition he has a certain austerity of manner.

Debussey's work bears the sub-titles "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea." It is a very interesting composition, which, paradoxically, contains no continuous melody, and the harmony changes so frequently that the listener is in a maze. His harmonic effects, though, are often very beautiful and surprising, and the composition abounds in chaste and delicate orchestral effects. The performance under Dr. Muck was everything that could be desired, but only scant applause followed.

Mr. Converse's piece is written to illustrate Walt Whitman's poem "The Mystic Trumpeter." It is a cleverly designed work, containing several beautiful melodies. It lacks continuity, and, although it has outline and color in abundance, symmetry and the perfect picture are lacking. The composer has at his command brilliant orchestration, especially as regards the brass instruments, effective climaxes and the inventive faculty, but the interest was not maintained, mere music making being obvious, even though the themes were treated with much dexterity.

Special mention must be made of the artistic manner in which Mr. Willy Hess played the beautiful violin melody in the first movement. The performance of the whole work, too, was magnificent. The remaining numbers, by Liszt and Berlioz, call for no special remark, their rendering being such as the Boston Orchestra has accustomed us to.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season the orchestra has enjoyed in this city. Dr. Karl Muck has in several ways made a deep impression here as conductor, though sometimes lacking in vigor. The orchestra has asked Emperor William to release Dr. Muck from his Berlin Royal Opera engagements for next year, but no answer has yet been received.

The programmes for next week require no soloist.

THURSDAY EVENING.

"The Sea," three orchestral sketches (new) .....Debussy
"The Mystic Trumpeter," orchestral fantasy .....F. S. Converse
(After the poem by Walt Whitman.)
"Mephisto Waltz" .....Liszt
Overture, "Carnaval Romain"....Berlioz

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Third Brandenburg concerto, for strings ..... Bach
Symphony in D major, B and H No. 2..... Haydn
Overture, "The Magic Flute"..... Mozart
Symphony in F major, op. 93 ..... Beethoven

ADVERTISER
CH 18, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Noskowski. Symphonic Poem. "The Steppe."
Smetana. Symphonic Poem. "Vysehrad."
Dvorak. Dramatic Overture. "Husitska."
Tschaikowsky. Pathetic Symphony.

Again a concert without a soloist (which we regard as a merit), and again one of those unified programmes which Dr. Muck is constantly arranging. On this occasion it was a Slav-Czech affair and very "national" in its character. The first three works were all built upon the broad foundation of the folk song. The Noskowski work began impressively with that Muscovite melancholy that is so attractive. It is that sadness described by Longfellow—"that resembles sorrow only as the mist resembles rain."

The work, however, soon changed its character and turned to scenes of combat and war. Here there was a sketchy, unsustained treatment which did not compare with the military touches which came in the subsequent numbers of Smetana and Tschaikowsky. The Cossack dances brought the wild abandon of one phase of Russian music to the foreground. Noskowski is a Pole, but he has in this overture gone fairly into the Russian domain.

The mine of folk music that Russia possesses is the richest of any country except possibly Scotland. It is a guarantee that Russian music (even in the large orchestral forms) will remain melodic for a long time to come, while Germany and France are cherishing modulation rather than melody. And some day Scotland, too, will find a composer who is able to welo its wealth of little gems into a large musical art work. To return to the Steppe; the reading was a very broad and powerful one, the ending being especially vigorous.

The work of Smetana was the most sincere and the most masterly of the first part of the programme. Smetana had not the skill in scoring nor the contrapuntal knowledge of his pupil Dvorak, yet because of his great enthusiasm and his zeal for Bohemia, it is probable that some of his orchestral works will outrank those of his successor. One is plunged into a poetic atmosphere in the very first measures of "Vysehrad," when the harp begins its bardic prelude. Mr. Schuecker played this with a loftiness and power that deserves the most cordial recognition. The trumpets also gave their important passages with commendable vigor.

Dr. Muck read the work magnificently, working up its great climaxes with proper force and giving the free improvisational passages with an effective elasticity of tempo. It is evident that our conductor is not afraid of a "fortississimo" occasionally. At this concert he was determined that the brasses should earn their salary. That the fiery readings appealed to the audience was very evident, for we do not recall a symphony concert where the applause was so continuous and so evenly distributed, each work and each movement of the symphony being received with fervor.

Nevertheless, in the Dvorak overture, we began to be satiated with brass thunderings and we felt, with Shakespeare's Quince, that the lion had better roar more gently. For all its bombast this overture could not swell itself up to Smetana proportions. It was the weakest of the three national numbers that began the programme. It was written for the opening of a Bohemian theatre in Prague, which reminds us that Beethoven made a somewhat better "Dedication of the House" overture with less brass, less fortissimo and less gloom. Yet the overture has much ingenuity of figure development, a striking trumpet call being transformed into almost everything from muted horn bleatings to growls upon the deepest wood-wind. Dvorak dealt better by us when he took up American nationalism in music.

The concert ended with the "Symphonie Pathetique," which wears well. Even after we are familiar with all its manifestations of sorrow of all kinds (it presents about 16 different sorts of woe), we still find it an impressive work. Some of its orchestral combinations are the best that Tschaikowsky has given us. Its free form is not to be counted as a fault; Liszt, Schumann and others have demonstrated that "sonata form" need not became a fetish. Nor is its popularity to be considered a crime; it is not essential to remove a symphonic work from the comprehension of the ordinary auditor. And it has attractive melodies. But the Russian composers are all steeped in the crime of being melodic.

The first movement seems the least powerful. Dr. Muck made more of it than we had deemed possible. His freedom of tempo, his sharp contrasts, his touches of extreme slowness, were all very effective. The trombones played magnificently in this movement.

The beautiful 5-4 movement, with its restlessness and unease even in the midst of its galety, has been better done. We missed something of the lightness, daintiness and elasticity of some previous performances. It was not technically perfect. But the third movement was so entirely successful that it seemed almost a new work. The trumpet figure that finally develops into a triumphant march was superbly worked up. Dr. Muck made it a march such as an Attila, a world-conqueror might step to. It was the most inspiring performance of the concert and the audience showed how much the music had excited them. There had been applause at the end of each movement, and the usual bowed acknowledgements. But at the end of this march there was a great outburst which would not be quieted until Dr. Muck had bowed many times and finally the orchestra had arisen and also bowed.

The finale was also nobly read and performed. It is not as great a picture of death as Richard Strauss has created in his best work, but its development of a wailing figure which is much like the first phrase of "Ombra mai fu" by Handel, is striking, and the canonic dialogue on this is skillful as well. The dramatic content of the movement is obvious and was clearly expressed in the performance.

And so the concert which had been indulging in fortissimo effects almost all through restored the average by ending "ppppp."

Louis C. Elson.

[162]

[illegible], Boston, Mass.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, MARCH 18, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Symphony Concert

With the Symphony concert of Saturday night, Dr. Muck completed three-quarters of the series, and in the six programmes that he has made, since he passed the mid-die concert in January, no one may fairly reproach him with neglect of music new to his audiences or with undue fondness for established classics. Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's sea-pieces, Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Tinel's Tone-Pictures" out of Corneille's "Polyeucte," Ritter's "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," and Noskowski's overture, "The Steppe," have all been played for the first times here, and each is modern or even ultra-modern music. Except for one programme from Beethoven and composers of the eighteenth century, and the overture and the concerto by Brahms that went with Strauss's "Domestica," modern and romantic composers in actual dates or in continuing and characteristic spirit have filled the lists—Berlioz, Tschaikovski, Liszt, Dukas, Smetana and Lvorak. Once, and presumably for all, Dr. Muck has removed the reproach of a lack of catholicity and modernity in his programmes, and in the remaining concerts of the year there is much new music to come. His hearers may not always have agreed with him in the choice of new compositions—with Ritter's dance, for example, or with Tinel's tone-pictures. Yet even in them Dr. Muck is keeping his public musically informed, while in the "Sinfonia Domestica" and "The Sea" he has brought the most recent compositions of two of the most individual and influential composers of our time to exceptionally sympathetic performance. His unified programmes—"all Slav," "all eighteenth century"—remain, and his hearers are interested or restless under them according to their moods, tastes or prejudices, but the conductor has broken away from what seemed a stereotyped order of overture, concerto, symphony. More miscellaneous pieces in the freer modern forms have varied them. Finally in the abundance of modern, ultra-modern, highly imaginative or highly romantic music, Dr. Muck has revealed more fully than hitherto the answering imagination and emotion in him and his ability to bring such compositions to as full and potent expression as any of the classics. By every title he is now a dramatic and a poetic conductor. From Mr. Converse's tone-poem and Dukas's scherzo, through the "Domestica" and the "Sea Pieces," to the overture to "The Magic Flute' a week ago and Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony last Saturday, performance after performance of glowing and significant beauty, of intense but ordered power has attested it.

In the pleasure and the emotion of the moment Dr. Muck's conducting of the "Pathetic" Symphony, and, indeed, of the whole concert, on Saturday evening seemed the climax for the time of all these things. On Friday afternoon he had been ill and depressed, conducting as one who struggles with untoward circumstances and yet making the symphony sound as it had never sounded here before. On Saturday strength and spirits returned, and the orchestra seemed to kindle with its conductor. Its voice at the beginning of Noskowski's "Steppe" had the melancholy of plains that were empty of everything but memories. Then it filled them with the battle, the march, the song of passing Cossacks. And again these images in tones faded into melancholy. Then the voice turned large and epic of Smetana's tone-poem of the Bohemian fortress. It sang as some glorified bard in a passion of pride and lament. The music sounded opulent with chivalric spirit or turned sombre and poignant with desolation. As nearly as they might, with music so faded, the conductor and his men would have ennobled Dvorak's "Husitska" overture. As it was they gave it moments of passionate and stirring glamor.

Yet all this was as preparation, in comparison, for their playing of Tschaikovski's symphony. It is easy to turn it into wild and whirling Tartar melodrama. In Mr. Safonoff's ability to do so lies one of his chief titles to note. It is not difficult to try to make it conscientiously emotional as we have oftenest heard it in Boston. Dr. Muck held his course clear and straight between either pitfall. Seemingly he made not a deliberate "effect" in the whole symphony. Not once did he make his hearers "sit up" and wonder; but he caught them up into the music and held them marching with it as with some mighty drama in tones of fate, disillusion and despair. Nowhere did the listener take approving thought of a particular mood brought to fitting utterance or of a detail duly individualized. He heard indeed details that he had never heard so vividly or so thrillingly before, like the mocking drum beat under the trio of the scherzo, like the hurtling of the march melody through the orchestra before it swings into final motion, or like the physical and mental torture—it is no less—with which parts of the lament fetch the very breath of despair. They and twenty like them were as the passing lights and shadows of the whole tragedy of despair that Tschaikovski wrote, and that Dr. Muck and his men were acting in tones that plucked and searched imagination as the acting of the theatre may very seldom do. H. T. P.

Paper Globe

City [illegible]w York

Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

N. Y. Globe

March 16,1907.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Paper Mail

City New York

Date [illegible] State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn hall on Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme is of more than ordinary interest, comprising Debussy's quartet in G minor, opus. 10; Schubert's Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello in A major.

The assisting artists will be Mme. Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, who will make her first appearance in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Paper Sun

City New York

Date [illegible] State N Y

Debussy's "La Mer," is new, with Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," Lizst's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," on Karl Muck's fifth and last Boston Symphony evening on Thursday in Carnegie Hall. For farewell matinée next Saturday he has a Bach suite in B minor, a Haydn symphony in D, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique" is to be Brooklyn's Boston Symphony farewell on Friday, with the "Mephisto" waltz again and one of those innumerable but honorable Beethoven overtures to "Leonore."

Debussy's quartet, op. 10, will share with Schubert and Mozart the third and final Friday matinée at Mendelssohn Hall by the Boston Symphony Quartet.

Paper Union

City Brooklyn

Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The usual lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), will be given at Association Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the "Brooklyn Daily Eagle," will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper Eagle

City Brooklyn

Date State N Y

MAR 16 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA; FAREWELL TO DR. MUCK

Concert at Baptist Temple Friday Will Be Chief Musical Event Next Week.

LEOPOLD WINKLER'S RECITAL.

Last Week of Metropolitan Opera Season—Fine Bills at the Manhattan.

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra another year. It is, of course, the hope of the management of the orchestra and of all its patrons that the unusual conductor may continue his stay in America, but it is far from certain either that he will be released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, or indeed, have his leave of absence extended for another season. For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the orchestra. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death does not make the symphony itself less pregnant with grief and despair, but these qualities instead of being personal are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest. The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. III," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture—Leonore No 3.....Beethoven
Mephisto Waltz (after Lenau's poem).....Liszt
Symphony in B flat minor, No. 6, Pathetique, Tschaikowsky

The usual lecture-recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper Citizen

City Brooklyn

Date State N Y

MAR 16 1907

The usual lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the Brooklyn "Daily Eagle," will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper World

City New York

Date [illegible] State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night will be conducted by Dr. Muck, and there will be no other soloist. The programme includes a novelty, Debussy's "The Sea." The remaining numbers are Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine."

* * *

The programme of the Saturday afternoon [illegible] of the Boston Sym-

---

Paper Union

City Brooklyn

Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra next year. It is, of course, the hope of the management of the orchestra and of all its patrons that this unusual conductor may continue his stay in America, but it is far from certain either that he will be released from his contract with the Berlin Opera; or, indeed, have his leave of absence extended for another season. The presence of Dr. Muck in this country has added largely to the importance of the musical season. With him at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained those temperamental qualities in its work, which it heretofore lacked and this without the sacrifice of any of its discipline for which it has always been so celebrated. Anything which affects for good or ill the work of the foremost orchestra in America is of great musical importance. Under Dr. Muck, it may be said without any reflection on any of his predecessors, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done the most splendid work of its career. For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the orchestra. The principal number will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan songs" of the great Russian genius, because it was finished and performed shortly before his untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death, does not make the symphony itself less pregnant with grief and despair, but these qualities, instead of being personal, are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest. The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. III," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Leonore, No. III"; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz" (after Lenau's Poem); Tschaikowsky, Symphony in B-flat minor No. 6, "Pathetique."

Paper Telegram

City New York

Date [illegible] State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season the orchestra has enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts seem, by common consent, to have been the highest in the twenty years the orchestra has been coming to New York, and the support given to the concerts has been more generous than ever before.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme for Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogues of the Wind and Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer.

Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Beaudenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphny.

Dora Becker will make her reappearance on the concert stage in a violin recital at Mendelssohn Hall, on Tuesday evening, assisted by Charles Norman Granville, barytone, and Gustav L. Becker, pianist, Max Hersberg at the piano.

Mr. Rafael Navas will give a piano recital at Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday afternoon. Simon Buchhalter follows in the evening, also with a piano recital.

[163]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
MONDAY, MARCH 18, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Symphony Concert

With the Symphony concert of Saturday night, Dr. Muck completed three-quarters of the series, and in the six programmes that he has made, since he passed the middle concert in January, no one may fairly reproach him with neglect of music new to his audiences or with undue fondness for established classics. Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's sea-pieces, Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Tinel's "Tone-Pictures" out of Corncille's "Polyeucte," Ritter's "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," and Noskowski's overture, "The Steppe," have all been played for the first times here, and each is modern or even ultra-modern music. Except for one programme from Beethoven and composers of the eighteenth century, and the overture and the concerto by Brahms that went with Strauss's "Domestica," modern and romantic composers in actual dates or in continuing and characteristic spirit have filled the lists—Berlioz, Tschaikovski, Liszt, Dukas, Smetana and Lvorak. Once, and presumably for all, Dr. Muck has removed the reproach of a lack of catholicity and modernity in his programmes, and in the remaining concerts of the year there is much new music to come. His hearers may not always have agreed with him in the choice of new compositions—with Ritter's dance, for example, or with Tinel's tone-pictures. Yet even in them Dr. Muck is keeping his public musically informed, while in the "Sinfonia Domestica" and "The Sea" he has brought the most recent compositions of two of the most individual and influential composers of our time to exceptionally sympathetic performance. His unified programmes—"all Slav," "all eighteenth century"—remain, and his hearers are interested or restless under them according to their moods, tastes or prejudices, but the conductor has broken away from what seemed a stereotyped order of overture, concerto, symphony. More miscellaneous pieces in the freer modern forms have varied them. Finally in the abundance of modern, ultra-modern, highly imaginative or highly romantic music, Dr. Muck has revealed more fully than hitherto the answering imagination and emotion in him and his ability to bring such compositions to as full and potent expression as any of the classics. By every title he is now a dramatic and a poetic conductor. From Mr. Converse's tone-poem and Dukas's scherzo, through the "Domestica" and the "Sea Pieces," to the overture to "The Magic Flute' a week ago and Tschaikovski's "Pathetic" symphony last Saturday, performance after performance of glowing and significant beauty, of intense but ordered power has attested it.

In the pleasure and the emotion of the moment Dr. Muck's conducting of the "Pathetic" Symphony, and, indeed, of the whole concert, on Saturday evening seemed the climax for the time of all these things. On Friday afternoon he had been ill and depressed, conducting as one who struggles with untoward circumstances and yet making the symphony sound as it had never sounded here before. On Saturday strength and spirits returned, and the orchestra seemed to kindle with its conductor. Its voice at the beginning of Noskowski's "Steppe" had the melancholy of plains that were empty of everything but memories. Then it filled them with the battle, the march, the song of passing Cossacks. And again these images in tones faded into melancholy. Then the voice turned large and epic of Smetana's tone-poem of the Bohemian fortress. It sang as some glorified bard in a passion of pride and lament. The music sounded opulent with chivalric spirit or turned sombre and poignant with desolation. As nearly as they might, with music so faded, the conductor and his men would have ennobled Dvorak's "Husitska" overture. As it was they gave it moments of passionate and stirring glamor.

Yet all this was as preparation, in comparison, for their playing of Tschaikovski's symphony. It is easy to turn it into wild and whirling Tartar melodrama. In Mr. Safonoff's ability to do so lies one of his chief titles to note. It is not difficult to try to make it conscientiously emotional as we have oftenest heard it in Boston. Dr. Muck held his course clear and straight between either pitfall. Seemingly he made not a deliberate "effect" in the whole symphony. Not once did he make his hearers "sit up" and wonder; but he caught them up into the music and held them marching with it as with some mighty drama in tones of fate, disillusion and despair. Nowhere did the listener take approving thought of a particular mood brought to fitting utterance or of a detail duly individualized. He heard indeed details that he had never heard so vividly or so thrillingly before, like the mocking drum beat under the trio of the scherzo, like the hurtling of the march melody through the orchestra before it swings into final motion, or like the physical and mental torture—it is no less—with which parts of the lament fetch the very breath of despair. They and twenty like them were as the passing lights and shadows of the whole tragedy of despair that Tschaikovski wrote, and that Dr. Muck and his men were acting in tones that plucked and searched imagination as the acting of the theatre may very seldom do. H. T. P.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

N. Y. Globe

March 16, 1907.

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme will comprise Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, in B flat major, op. 99, and Mozart's clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who will at this concert make her first appearance in New York, and George Grisez, principal clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 23. On Thursday evening the chief item on the programme will be a novelty by Claude Debussy, entitled "La Mer." The other items on the programme will be a symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Converse; Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture. Saturday afternoon the programme will be classical. It will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date State N Y

The third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn hall on Friday afternoon, March 22. The programme is of more than ordinary interest, comprising Debussy's quartet in G minor, opus 10; Schubert's Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola and 'cello in A major.

The assisting artists will be Mme. Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, who will make her first appearance in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, principal clarinet of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date State N Y

Debussy's "La Mer," is new, with Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," Lizst's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz "Roman Carnival," on Karl Muck's fifth and last Boston Symphony evening on Thursday in Carnegie Hall. For farewell matinée next Saturday he has a Bach suite in B minor, a Haydn symphony in D, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique" is to be Brooklyn's Boston Symphony farewell on Friday, with the "Mephisto" waltz again and one of those innumerable but honorable Beethoven overtures to "Leonore."

Debussy's quartet, op. 10, will share with Schubert and Mozart the third and final Friday matinée at Mendelssohn Hall by the Boston Symphony Quartet.

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The usual lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), will be given at Association Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the "Brooklyn Daily Eagle," will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y
MAR 16 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA; FAREWELL TO DR. MUCK

Concert at Baptist Temple Friday Will Be Chief Musical Event Next Week.

LEOPOLD WINKLER'S RECITAL.

Last Week of Metropolitan Opera Season—Fine Bills at the Manhattan.

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra another year. It is, of course, the hope of the management of the orchestra and of all its patrons that the unusual conductor may continue his stay in America, but it is far from certain either that he will be released from his contract with the Berlin Opera, or indeed, have his leave of absence extended for another season. For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the orchestra. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death does not make the symphony itself less pregnant with grief and despair, but these qualities instead of being personal are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest. The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. III," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture—Leonore No 3.....Beethoven
Mephisto Waltz (after Lenau's poem)....Liszt
Symphony in B flat minor, No. 6, Pathetique, Tschaikowsky

The usual lecture-recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the Brookyln Daily Eagle, will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y
MAR 16 1907

The usual lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) will be given at Association Hall on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock. Charles M. Skinner, of the Brooklyn "Daily Eagle," will contribute the lecture, and Robert Thallon, pianist, the musical interpretation of the programme.

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night will be conducted by Dr. Muck, and there will be no other soloist. The programme includes a novelty, Debussy's "The Sea." The remaining numbers are Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine."

* * *

The programme of the Saturday af-

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra next year. It is, of course, the hope of the management of the orchestra and of all its patrons that this unusual conductor may continue his stay in America, but it is far from certain either that he will be released from his contract with the Berlin Opera; or, indeed, have his leave of absence extended for another season. The presence of Dr. Muck in this country has added largely to the importance of the musical season. With him at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained those temperamental qualities in its work, which it heretofore lacked and this without the sacrifice of any of its discipline for which it has always been so celebrated. Anything which affects for good or ill the work of the foremost orchestra in America is of great musical importance. Under Dr. Muck, it may be said without any reflection on any of his predecessors, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done the most splendid work of its career. For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the orchestra. The principal number will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan songs" of the great Russian genius, because it was finished and performed shortly before his untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death, does not make the symphony itself less pregnant with grief and despair, but these qualities, instead of being personal, are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest. The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. III," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Leonore, No. III"; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz" (after Lenau's Poem); Tschaikowsky, Symphony in B-flat minor No. 6, "Pathetique."

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season the orchestra has enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts seem, by common consent, to have been the highest in the twenty years the orchestra has been coming to New York, and the support given to the concerts has been more generous than ever before.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme for Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogues of the Wind and Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer.

Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Beaudenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphny.

Dora Becker will make her reappearance on the concert stage in a violin recital at Mendelssohn Hall, on Tuesday evening, assisted by Charles Norman Granville, barytone, and Gustav L. Becker, pianist, Max Herzberg at the piano.

Mr. Rafael Navas will give a piano recital at Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday afternoon. Simon Buchhalter follows in the evening, also with a piano recital.

N. Y. Post.

March 16–07

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The antidote which Professor Hess administered so speedily after the dose of Debussy on Friday Dr. Muck postponed till yesterday, when the last afternoon concert for this season took place in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's sympathies are known (or, let us say, suspected), to be with the masters of the late lamented Romantic and Classical Schools of Music rather than with the modern Frenchmen, who run to the fascinating vagueness of musical utterance which opens the door so wide to verbal dreams, or the youthful Germans who find a fruitful field in philosophies and pathological perversities. It was therefore not a little surprising to have him follow up the "Symphonia domestica" of Richard Strauss with Debussy's "Sea" sketches, and to modulate through Converse and Liszt to Berlioz as a classic. Yesterday he sought to make the restoration of equilibrium complete by a drastic remedy. Debussy, Converse, Liszt and Berlioz on Thursday; Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—the merry wag Beethoven of the eighth symphony—yesterday. It was an abrupt transition, but the audience took to it kindly, nonplussed only by the contradictory announcement touching the opening number of the programme. The house bill said it was to be Bach's Suite in B minor; a printed notice slipped into the house bill corrected this to a concerto for string orchestra, in C minor, "known as the Brandenburg Concerto." What the orchestra played was the third of the Brandenburg concertos, that in G major, for three violins, three violas and three violoncellos, with basses and continuo. After it came Haydn's Symphony in D (the second of the Breitkopf and Härtel list), Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and the Beethoven symphony. The music was all played with superb spirit. There were moments when the value of the augmented wood-wind instruments in the Beethoven symphony seemed questionable, but the prevalent joyousness of the afternoon left no opportunity for querulousness. Dr. Muck, like a true conservative, chose the golden mean between the extremely rapid tempo indicated for the Tempo di Menuetto by the composer and the extremely slow tempo which many modern German conductors have used since Wagner gave them a hint to that effect. The news of an extension of Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his duties at the Court Opera in Berlin, which was made known yesterday, is extremely welcome to the many admirers which he has won in New York.

H. E. K.

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y
MAR 16 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Brooklyn for the last time this season on Friday evening of next week. At present it appears that this occasion will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck, who has conducted the orchestra this season with such admirable results, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra another year. A final decision has not been reached regarding the possibility of securing his release from his contract with the Berlin Opera, or of having his leave of absence extended for another season.

For this last Brooklyn concert Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal strongly. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death does not make the symphony itself less poignant with grief and despair, but these qualities instead of being personal are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest.

The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's Overture "Leonore, No. III.," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture Leonore No. III.....Beethoven
Mephisto Waltz (after Lenau's Poem)
Liszt
Symphony in B flat Minor No. 6, Pathetique.....Tschaikowsky

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

The last programme of the season of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be played in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who at this concert will make her debut in New York, and Georges Grisez, the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme comprises Debussy's Quartet in G minor, opus 10, a work which is characteristic of the genius of this French composer; Schubert's Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's seldom heard Quintet for clarinet and strings in A major (K. 581.) Mme. Goodson is an English pianist who came to this country in January. She has had a very considerable success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

GEORGE HENSCHEL MARRIED.

George Henschel, a musician and composer, married Miss Amy Louis, of this city, in the chantry of Grace Church, yesterday, the Rev. W. R. Huntington officiating. Only the immediate families were present. After a short absence from New York Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sail for their home at Allt-na-cricho, Aviemore, in the highlands of Scotland.

Mr. Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also established and was conductor for eleven years of the London Symphony Orchestra and was first conductor of the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is the composer of a number of vocal and instrumental works.

Paper Herald
City Washington D. C.
Date MAR 17 1907 State

[illegible] brought practically to an end [illegible] Tuesday afternoon, March 2[illegible] Boston Symphony Quartet [illegible] and [illegible] the ballroom of the New Willard. [illegible] the last concert, Prof. Hess [illegible] a programme which embraces [illegible] sic, the romantic, and the modern. [illegible] first number is a string quartet [illegible] Haydn, in C major, opus 33, No. [illegible] work which is in "Papa" Haydn's [illegible] best vein. Then comes two movements of a quartet, by a man who bulks large in the world of music.

Claude Debussy is regarded as a [illegible] original musical genius in Fran[illegible] the recognition that has been given [illegible] him in his native country is being found wherever his music is played. Debussy is a musical "impressionist." His [illegible] voices entirely moods and atmospheres. It has been said of Debussy that he [illegible] music differently from others, and certainly the strange fascination that his work exerts would seem to indicate this. Debussy gained world-wide [illegible] through his lyric setting of Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," which has had such a success at the Opera Comique in Paris. Charles M. Loeffler, the distinguished composer, has expressed it as his belief that Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" is the greatest opera since "Tristan und Isolde."

Last year, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played two short pieces by Debussy. The quartet, of which two numbers will be played, is one of the early works, having been written in 1893. The last number, typical of the romantic period of music, will be Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, and in this the assisting artist will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, [illegible] English pianist, who has had a [illegible] considerable success in this her [illegible] season in America.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 16 1907 State N Y

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THIS SEASON

Brilliant Programme, but No Soloist to Be Heard.

INSTITUTE LECTURE-RECITALS

Leopold Winkler to Give Piano Recital—Other Music Events in Brooklyn.

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the Orchestra another year. The presence of Dr. Muck in this country has added largely to the importance of the musical season. With him at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained those temperamental qualities in its work, which it heretofore lacked, and this without the sacrifice of any of its discipline for which it has always been so celebrated. Anything which affects for good or ill the work of the foremost orchestra in America is of great musical importance. Under Dr. Muck, it may be said without any reservation, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done the most splendid work of its career.

For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has selected a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the Orchestra. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera.

The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture, "Lenore, No. III." and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture Leonore No. III.....Beethoven
Mephisto Waltz (after Lenau's Poem)
Liszt
Symphony in B flat minor.....Tschaikowsky

N. Y. Press,

March 17– 07.

This week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts have probably been the highest in the twenty years of the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York, and the support given to the concerts has been the most generous on record. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and, while the patronage at the matinee concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed. The one disappointment of the season came from Paderewski's failure to come to America, but we are assured that next year he will be among the orchestra's soloists. However, an interesting feature of the present season has been the fact that the presence or absence of soloists made no difference in the attendance; indeed, the concerts in which no soloists appeared drew the biggest crowds.

The question of a conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management has not given up hopes to retain the services of Dr. Muck no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, where the German Emperor is giving the matter his personal consideration. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could effect an extension of his leave of absence for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on Thursday evening's programme are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz; those on Saturday's Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2 and will be heard for the first time in New York on Thursday. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, Chevillard conducting. Converse's work is the orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," which is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance in March, 1905, by the Philharmonic Orchestra. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and a Beethoven work.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The last programme of the season of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be played in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon, March 22, at 3 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who at this concert will make her debut in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, Opus 10, a work which is very characteristic of the striking genius of this French composer; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major, Opus 99, and Mozart's seldom heard quintet for clarinet and strings in A major, (K 581.) Mme. Goodson is an English pianist who came to this country in January. She has had a very considerable success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, and is regarded as an artist of first calibre.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has enjoyed in this city.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the managment that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York, Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt, and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean;" the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on Oct. 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chévillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer. Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-04, and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper American
City New York
Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

Three concerts will be given on Thursday. The Boston Symphony will begin its March brace of concerts on that day, with the first concert at Carnegie Hall at night, and the second and concluding concert, given on Saturday afternoon at the same hall. The St. Cecilian Society will entertain its friends at Mendelssohn Hall in the evening and Ralph Kellert will hold a violin recital in the afternoon at the same hall.

A concert of excellent chamber music has been arranged for by the Boston Symphony Quartet, and Mendelssohn Hall and Friday afternoon are the place and time for the entertainment.

The People's Symphony Society will give a concert at Carnegie Hall on Friday evening under the conductorship of Mr. Ahrens, and Miss Lillia Snelling offers a song recital at Mendelssohn Hall on the same evening.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its last concert in Mendelssohn Hall on March 22 at three o'clock. The chief numbers to be performed are Debussy's quartet in G minor, Schubert's trio for piano and strings in B flat, and Mozart's clarionet quintet. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katherine Goodson, pianiste, and Mr. George Grisez, principal clarionet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night will be conducted by Dr. Muck, and there will be no other soloist. The programme includes a novelty, Debussy's "The Sea." The remaining numbers are Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine."

Paper World
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 17 1907

The programme of the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall contains two symphonies, Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's [illegible]. Bach's Third Brandenburg [illegible] and Mozart's "The [illegible] overture complete the [illegible]. This concert concludes [illegible] the Boston [illegible] last appearance [illegible] its conductor.

[164]

N. Y. Post.

March 16-07

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The antidote which Professor Hess administered so speedily after the dose of Debussy on Friday Dr. Muck postponed till yesterday, when the last afternoon concert for this season took place in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's sympathies are known (or, let us say, suspected), to be with the masters of the late lamented Romantic and Classical Schools of Music rather than with the modern Frenchmen, who run to the fascinating vagueness of musical utterance which opens the door so wide to verbal dreams, or the youthful Germans who find a fruitful field in philosophies and pathological perversities. It was therefore not a little surprising to have him follow up the "Symphonia do-[illegible] of Richard Strauss with Debussy's "Sea" sketches, and to modulate through Converse and Liszt to Berlioz as a classic. Yesterday he sought to make the restoration of equilibrium complete by a drastic remedy. Debussy, Converse, Liszt and Berlioz on Thursday; Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—the merry wag Beethoven of the eighth symphony—yesterday. It was an abrupt transition, but the audience took to it kindly, nonplussed only by the contradictory announcement touching the opening number of the programme. The house bill said it was to be Bach's Suite in B minor; a printed notice slipped into the house bill corrected this to a concerto for string orchestra in C minor, "known as the Brandenburg Concerto." What the orchestra played was the third of the Brandenburg concertos, that in G major, for three violins, three violas and three violoncellos, with basses and continuo. After it came Haydn's Symphony in D (the second of the Breitkopf and Härtel list), Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and the Beethoven symphony. The music was all played with superb spirit. There were moments when the value of the augmented wood-wind instruments in the Beethoven symphony seemed questionable, but the prevalent joyousness of the afternoon left no opportunity for querulousness. Dr. Muck, like a true conservative, chose the golden mean between the extremely rapid tempo indicated for the Tempo di Menuetto by the composer and the extremely slow tempo which many modern German conductors have used since Wagner gave them a hint to that effect. The news of an extension of Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his duties at the Court Opera in Berlin, which was made known yesterday, is extremely welcome to the many admirers which he has won in New York.

H. E. K.

Paper Citizen

City Brooklyn

DMAR 16 1907 State N Y

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THIS SEASON

Brilliant Programme, but No Soloist to Be Heard.

INSTITUTE LECTURE-RECITALS

Leopold Winkler to Give Piano Recital—Other Music Events in Brooklyn.

The fifth and last of the present series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, March 22, at 8:15 o'clock. More than usual interest attaches to this concert since it is possibly the last one that Dr. Muck will conduct in Brooklyn, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the Orchestra another year. The presence of Dr. Muck in this country has added largely to the importance of the musical season. With him at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has gained those temperamental qualities in its work, which it heretofore lacked, and this without the sacrifice of any of its discipline for which it has always been so celebrated. Anything which affects for good or ill the work of the foremost orchestra in America is of great musical importance. Under Dr. Muck, it may be said without any reservation, the most splendid work of its career. Boston Symphony Orchestra has done the most splendid work o fits career.

For this last concert in Brooklyn Dr. Muck has selected a programme which will appeal to the largest patronage of the Orchestra. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera.

The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's overture, "Lenore, No. III." and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture, "Lenore, No. III";
Beethoven's overture, "Lenore, No. III";
Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony in B-flat minor No. 6.

Paper Times

City Brooklyn

Date State N Y

MAR 16 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Brooklyn for the last time this season on Friday evening of next week. At present it appears that this occasion will be the farewell appearance of Dr. Muck, who has conducted the orchestra this season with such admirable results, for it is not yet settled that he will be with the orchestra another year. A final decision has not been reached regarding the possibility of securing his release from his contract with the Berlin Opera, or of having his leave of absence extended for another season.

For this last Brooklyn concert Dr. Muck has made a programme which will appeal strongly. The principal item on the list will be the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetique," the so-called "swan song" of the great Russian genius, so-called because it was finished and performed shortly before Tschaikowsky's untimely death from the cholera. The fact that our greater knowledge of Tschaikowsky has destroyed the rapidly growing legend that in this last work he prefigured his approaching death does not make the symphony itself less poignant with grief and despair, but these qualities instead of being personal are now regarded as an expression of universal feeling. In view of the temperamental qualities which Dr. Muck has displayed in other modern works, his reading of the "Pathetique" will be awaited with great interest.

The other two works on the programme are Beethoven's Overture "Leonore, No [illegible]," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The order of the programme is as follows:

Overture Leonore No. III.....Beethoven
Mephisto Waltz (after Lenau's Poem)
Liszt
Symphony [illegible] B flat Minor No. 6, Pathetique .....Tschaikowsky

N. Y. Press,

March 17- 07.

This week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts have probably been the highest in the twenty years of the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York, and the support given to the concerts has been the most generous on record. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and, while the patronage at the matinee concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed. The one disappointment of the season came from Paderewski's failure to come to America, but we are assured that next year he will be among the orchestra's soloists. However, an interesting feature of the present season has been the fact that the presence or absence of soloists made no difference in the attendance; indeed, the concerts in which no soloists appeared drew the biggest crowds.

The question of a conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management has not given up hopes to retain the services of Dr. Muck no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, where the German Emperor is giving the matter his personal consideration. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could effect an extension of his leave of absence for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on Thursday evening's programme are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz; those on Saturday's Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2 and will be heard for the first time in New York on Thursday. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, Chevillard conducting. Converse's work is the orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," which is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance in March, 1905, by the Philharmonic Orchestra. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will comprise Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra, Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and a Beethoven work.

Paper World

City New York

Date State N Y

MAR 17 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night will be conducted by Dr. Muck, and there will be no other soloist. The programme includes a novelty, Debussy's "The Sea." The remaining numbers are Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine."

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date State N Y

MAR 17 1907

The last programme of the season of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be played in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who at this concert will make her début in New York, and Georges Grisez, the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme comprises Debussy's Quartet in G minor, opus 10, a work which is characteristic of the genius of this French composer; Schubert's Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in B flat major, opus 99, and Mozart's seldom heard Quintet for clarinet and strings in A major (K, 581.) Mme. Goodson is an English pianist who came to this country in January. She has had a very considerable success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston.

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date State N Y

MAR 17 1907

GEORGE HENSCHEL MARRIED.

George Henschel, a musician and composer, married Miss Amy Louis, of this city, in the chantry of Grace Church, yesterday, the Rev. W. R. Huntington officiating. Only the immediate families were present. After a short absence from New York Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sail for their home at Allt-na-cricho, Aviemoré, in the highlands of Scotland.

Mr. Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also established and was conductor for eleven years of the London Symphony Orchestra and was first conductor of the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is the composer of a number of vocal and instrumental works.

Paper Times

City New York

Date State N Y

MAR 17 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The last programme of the season of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be played in Mendelssohn Hall on next Friday afternoon, March 22, at 3 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, who at this concert will make her début in New York, and Mr. Georges Grisez, the first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme comprises Debussy's quartet in G minor, Opus 10, a work which is very characteristic of the striking genius of this French composer; Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major, Opus 99, and Mozart's seldom heard quintet for clarinet and strings in A major, (K 581.) Mme. Goodson is an English pianist who came to this country in January. She has had a very considerable success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, and is regarded as an artist of first calibre.

Paper American

City New York

Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

Three concerts will be given on Thursday. The Boston Symphony will begin its March brace of concerts on that day, with the first concert at Carnegie Hall at night, and the second and concluding concert given on Saturday afternoon at the same hall. The St. Cecilian Society will entertain its friends at Mendelssohn Hall in the evening and Ralph Kellert will hold a violin recital in the afternoon at the same hall.

A concert of excellent chamber music has been arranged for by the Boston Symphony Quartet, and Mendelssohn Hall and Friday afternoon are the place and time for the entertainment.

The People's Symphony Society will give a concert at Carnegie Hall on Friday evening under the conductorship of Mr. Ahrens, and Miss Lillia Snelling offers a song recital at Mendelssohn Hall on the same evening.

Paper Herald

City New York

Date MAR 1 [illegible] State N Y

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its last concert in Mendelssohn Hall on March 22 at three o'clock. The chief numbers to be performed are Debusey's quartet in G minor, Schubert's trio for piano and strings in B flat, and Mozart's clarionet quintet. The assisting artists will be Mme. Katherine Goodson, pianiste, and Mr. George Grisez, principal clarionet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Herald

City Washington

Date State D. C.

MAR 17 1907

The concert season of Washington will be brought practically to an end on Wednesday afternoon, March 20, when the Boston Symphony Quartet gives its third and last concert of chamber music in the ballroom of the New Willard. For the last concert, Prof. Hess has chosen a programme which embraces the classic, the romantic, and the modern. The first number is a string quartet by Haydn, in C major, opus 33, No. 3, a work which is in "Papa" Haydn's happiest vein. Then comes two movements of a quartet, by a man who bulks largely in the world of music.

Claude Debussy is regarded as a most original musical genius in France, and the recognition that has been given to him in his native country is being found wherever his music is played. Debussy is a musical "impressionist." His music voices entirely moods and atmosphere. It has been said of Debussy that he "hears" music differently from others, and certainly the strange fascination that his work exerts would seem to indicate this. Debussy gained world-wide reputation through his lyric setting of Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," which has had such a success at the Opera Comique in Paris. Charles M. Loeffler, the distinguished composer, has expressed it as his belief that Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" is the greatest opera since "Tristan und Isolde."

Last year, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played two short pieces by Debussy. The quartet, of which two numbers will be played, is one of the early works, having been written in 1893. The last number, typical of the romantic period of music, will be Schubert's trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, and in this the assisting artist will be Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who has had a very considerable success in this, her first season in America.

Paper Times

City New York

Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last pair of Boston Symphony Concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has enjoyed in this city.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the managment that, in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York, Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt, and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean;" the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on Oct. 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chévillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer. Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-04, and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper World

City New York

Date State N Y

MAR 17 1907

The programme of the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall contains two symphonies, Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's Eighth. Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and Mozart's "The Magic Flute" overture complete the list of numbers. This concert concludes the season of the Boston Orchestra. It is also the last appearance [illegible] the present of its conductor, Dr. Muck.

[164]

N. Y. Herald

March 17-07.

[illegible] pair of concerts of the [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] will be given on Thursday even- [illegible] Saturday afternoon of this week, [illegible]sic Hall. The programme for [illegible]y evening will comprise three or- [illegible]ral sketches by Debusey, which will [illegible]yed for the first time in New York. [illegible] are entitled, "From Dawn to Noon [illegible] the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and [illegible]logue of the Wind and Sea." Liszt [illegible] be represented by his Mephisto

[illegible]z and Berlioz by his overture "Car- [illegible]l Romain." An interesting number of [illegible] programme will be an orchestral fan- [illegible] "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Mr. F. [illegible] Converse, of Boston. The Saturday af- [illegible]noon concert will be quite classical. It [illegible] open with Bach's third Brandenburg [illegible]certo, the flute part of which will be [illegible]d by Mr. Andre Maquarre. Two sym- [illegible]s will be given. Haydn's in D major [illegible]nd Beethoven's in F major, op. 93. Mo- [illegible]'s beautiful overture to "The Magic Flute" will also be played.

Staats Zeitung

March 17, 1907.

[illegible] und Montag.

Die beiden letzten Konzerte des Bostoner [illegible]mphonie-Orchesters finden am kom- [illegible]den Donnerstag Abend und Samstag [illegible] Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Zur [illegible]raufführung gelangen am Donnerstag De- [illegible]bussy's Orchester-Skizzen "The Sea", die [illegible] Orchester-Phantasie "The Mystic Trum- [illegible]ter" von F. S. Converse, „Mephisto- [illegible]ger" von Liszt und Berlioz' „Römi- [illegible] Carneval". Für Samstag Nach- [illegible]tag lautet das Programm: Bach, drit- [illegible]s Brandenburg'sches Konzert für [illegible]treichorchester, Haydn, zweite Sympho- [illegible] Mozart, Ouverture zur „Zauberflöte", [illegible]o Beethoven, Symphonie in F-dur, [illegible]. 93. — Der letzte diesjährige

per	Press
y	Philadelphia
e	State Pa

[illegible] 17 '07

Now that the Philadelphia Orchestra has finished its season the only remaining orchestra concert of the year will be that by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fifth in the series, which will be given in the Academy of Music, to-morrow (Monday) evening, March 18. Unusual interest is attached to this because of the possibility of the appearance of Dr. Muck in this city. The question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year is still unsettled and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the Emperor personally for several weeks.

It has been the hope of the management that in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

It is Dr. Muck's purpose to play at the last concert as the initial number the "Masonic March," by Mozart in honor of Mr. Scheel's memory and Richard Strauss' gigantic "Symphonia Domestica" with which he and the orchestra recently won such signal success in Boston and New York. This will be the first work on the programme and as it lasts fifty-four minutes, patrons of these concerts are urgently requested to be promptly in their seats at the beginning of the concert as they will be seated during the performance of this work, which is played without pause.

The other works of importance figure on the program. One is Brahm's masterly "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," opus 56a and the other is Beethoven's "Leonore Overture, No. 3."

per	Times
y	New York
AR 22 1907	State N Y

AGAIN LENDS DR. MUCK

Kaiser Consents to His Staying Another Year in This Country.

BERLIN, March 21.—Emperor William a few days ago gave his consent that Dr. Muck, Director of the Royal Orchestra, who is now with Major Higginson in Boston, shall stay another year in the United States.

Dr. Muck's absence from Berlin is severely felt, and the Emperor only consented to his further stay abroad when he was assured that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained not for profit but for the benefit of musical culture.

Paper	Public Ledger
City	Philadelphia
Date MAR 17	State Pa

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

This week's list of musical affairs is long, though included in it are two concerts of first importance, the Boston Symphony tomorrow, and the Melba concert for the Bryn Mawr endowment fund on Tuesday afternoon.

The Boston Orchestra concludes its season here with tomorrow's concert. The concert will open with the Masonic funeral music of Mozart in memory of Fritz Scheel. Unusual interest is attached to this because of the possibility of its being the last appearance of Doctor Muck in this city. The question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next year is still unsettled, and, while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Doctor Muck, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Doctor Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season. As previously announced, the programme for this fifth and last concert includes Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

Paper	Sun
City	New York
Date MAR 17 1907	State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Programmes of the Last Concerts of Its Season in This City.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts seem by common consent to have been the highest in the twenty years the orchestra has been coming to New York, and the support given to the concerts has been more generous than ever before. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and while the patronage at the matinée concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed.

The one disappointment of the season came from the failure of Mr. Paderewski to come to America, but next year he will certainly be among the New York soloists of the orchestra, for he expects to reach America early in the season and stay until spring. An interesting feature of the orchestra's season in this city has been that the presence or absence of soloists has made no difference in the attendance, and as a matter of fact the concerts where the greatest number of patrons were unable to get seats have been those when there was no soloist.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in the event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves"; and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer.

Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute"; and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper	Tribune
City	New York
Date MAR 17 1907	State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and while the patronage at the matinee concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed. The one disappointment of the season came from the failure of Paderewski to come to America, but next year he will certainly be among the New York soloists of the orchestra, for he expects to reach America early in the season, and stay until spring. An interesting feature of the orchestra's season in this city has been that the presence or absence of the soloists has made no difference in the attendance, and, as a matter of fact, the concerts where the greatest number of patrons were unable to get seats have been those when there was no soloist.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in the event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer. Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-'04, and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper	Evening World
City	New York
Date MAR 18 1907	State N Y

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra make their last visit to New York for the season this week. It will be by the grace of the German Emperor only if the distinguished conductor is permitted to return to America next season. He has made such a deep impression upon local music lovers that his absence would be sorely felt. This splendid orchestra, under his leadership, has surpassed even itself in artistic achievement. At the Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall, Debussy's three orchestral sketches of "The Sea," and Converse's symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after Walt Whitman, will be the principal numbers. On Saturday afternoon, Haydn's symphony in D major and Beethoven's symphony on F major will be played.

Paper	Evening World
City	New York
Date MAR 18 1907	State N Y

The Boston Symphony Quartet, at the farewell concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, will have the assistance of Katherine Goodson, an English pianist, and George Grisez, first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper	Herald
City	Washington D.C.
Date MAR 21 1907	State

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its third concert at the New Willard yesterday afternoon. Only from the standpoint of the attendance was it other than a success. The music was exquisitely beautiful, dainty, and appealing. In Schubert's number, arranged for piano, violins, viola, and violoncello, in G minor, Miss Kathrine Goodson was the accompanist and was much appreciated. The programme consisted of selections from Haydn, Claude Du Bussy, and Schubert. Each number was enthusiastically received.

[165]

Paper	Public Ledger
City	Philadelphia
Date MAR 19 1907	State Pa

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO SCHEEL

Mozart's Masonic Funeral March Introduced at Last Concert of Season.

A SUPERB PROGRAMME.

Strauss Domestic Symphony Attracts Large Audience to the Academy.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of their 22d season at the Academy of Music last night to a very large audience. It is understood that this was also the last appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, who has conducted the orchestra this winter with great success, and has made a distinct impression as a musician of intellectual insight and authority, whose return would be warmly welcomed.

In recognition of the loss which Philadelphia and the world of music has just sustained, Doctor Muck introduced last evening's programme with a solemn and lovely elegy from Mozart's Masonic funeral music, in memory of Fritz Scheel.

The commemoration of Scheel had a particular pertinence at this concert, since it was devoted chiefly to the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, which Scheel was the first conductor to make known in America, two years ago, after a performance given under the composer's direction during his visit to New York. This curious and much-debated composition Scheel made so surprisingly interesting that in the vote for the "request performance" at the end of that season the "Sinfonia Domestica" was next to the head of the poll. Its repetition in Philadelphia could not fail to recall the personal memories thus associated with it.

Listened to again, after this interval, the music makes no very different impression and leaves the hearer no more certain than before of the final value of Strauss's "programme music." He has followed the same method of composition in his later "Salome," which has not been heard here, and has developed it with even more of his astounding cleverness. But the same questions do not arise in opera, where the "programme" is audibly and visibly set forth in verse and action and the "representative themes" accompany the concrete ideas they illustrate. In the symphony there is no such association. We are called on to imagine a series of domestic incidents which the music may be supposed to indicate. Sometimes it does this by obvious description or imitation, but usually we are left guessing at the precise significance of strange instrumental effects, uncertain what the story really is, or whether, if we knew it, we should find it worth the knowing.

The most, perhaps, that the music really does, or can do, is to express what may be called the emotions aroused by or associated with the incidents of family life. Where there are real emotions—the elementary emotions, as of love or of parental tenderness—or where the music suggests elementary ideas, as of repose or awakening of care or joy, then it makes simply a musical appeal and we listen to it quite indifferent to the programme, which becomes, indeed, an impertinence, since the music is of so much more importance in itself.

It is really very wonderful music, if we can set aside our conventional preconceptions of form, and of harmony, and of beauty, and follow it for what it has to give, of intellectual exercise and stimulus, of intervals of pure music separated by what seems mere prankishness, and of dazzling color that is entirely unique.

The performance was superb. Strauss writes for an unconscionable multiplication of unusual instruments that no ordinary orchestra can supply, but every possible demand of the score was fully met, and the great orchestra played with a splendor of tone that was in itself a delight. It is not music that often appeals to any very deep sentiment, but the curious mastery of the orchestra constantly asserted in it, an almost uncanny if also unmoving skill, makes it a work whose importance is not to be resisted.

Doctor Muck was two or three times recalled at its conclusion, and rightly joined the members of the orchestra with him in acknowledgment of the applause. The concert closed with Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and the unfading "Lenore, No. 3," which Doctor Muck plays with strongly marked contrasts and great precision, and also with finely sonorous effect. He has unquestionably imparted a new vitality to the great Boston organization.

Paper	Sun
City	New York
Date MAR 21 1907	State N Y

Willy Hess's third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall to-morrow afternoon will present Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio in B flat, op. 99, and a Mozart quintet in A major with clarinet.

Katharine Goodson, an English pianist, new to New York, and Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the Boston orchestra, are assisting artists.

N. Y. Herald

March 17-07.

The concluding pair of concerts of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week in Carnegie Hall. The programme for Thursday evening will comprise three orchestral sketches by Debusey, which will be played for the first time in New York. They are entitled, "From Dawn to Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea." Liszt will be represented by his Mephisto Waltz and Berlioz by his overture "Carneval Romain." An interesting number of the programme will be an orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," by Mr. F. S. Converse, of Boston. The Saturday afternoon concert will be quite classical. It will open with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, the flute part of which will be played by Mr. Andre Maquarre. Two symphonies will be given, Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's in F major, op. 93. Mozart's beautiful overture to "The Magic Flute" will also be played.

Staats Zeitung

March 17, 1907.

Konzerte und Konzerte.

Die beiden letzten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden am kommenden Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Zur Aufführung gelangen am Donnerstag Debussy's Orchester-Skizzen "The Sea", die Orchester-Phantasie "The Mystic Trumpeter" von F. S. Converse, „Mephisto-Walzer" von Liszt und Berlioz' „Römischer Carneval". Für Samstag Nachmittag lautet das Programm: Bach, drittes Brandenburg'sches Konzert für Streichorchester, Haydn, zweite Symphonie, Mozart, Ouverture zur „Zauberflöte, und Beethoven, Symphonie in F-dur, Op. 93. — Der letzte diesjährige

per Press

y Philadelphia

e State Pa

Now that the Philadelphia Orchestra has finished its season the only remaining orchestra concert of the year will be that by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fifth in the series, which will be given in the Academy of Music, to-morrow (Monday) evening, March 18. Unusual interest is attached to this because of the possibility of its being the last appearance of Dr. Muck in this city

The question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next year is still unsettled and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the Emperor personally for several weeks.

It has been the hope of the management that in event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

It is Dr. Muck's purpose to play at this last concert as the initial number the "Masonic March," by Mozart in honor of Mr. Scheel's memory and Richard Strauss' gigantic "Symphonia Domestica" with which he and the orchestra recently won such signal success in Boston and New York. This will be the first work on the program and as it lasts fifty-four minutes, the patrons of these concerts are urgently requested to be promptly in their seats at the beginning of the concert as none will be seated during the performance of this work, which is played without pause.

Two other works of importance figure on the program. One is Brahm's masterly "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," opus 56a and the other is Beethoven's "Leonore Overture, No. 3."

* * *

per Times

y New York

te MAR 2 2 1907 State N Y

AGAIN LENDS DR. MUCK.

Kaiser Consents to His Staying Another Year in This Country.

BERLIN, March 21.—Emperor William some days ago gave his consent that Dr. Muck, Director of the Royal Orchestra, who is now with Major Higginson in Boston, shall stay another year in the United States.

Dr. Muck's absence from Berlin is greatly felt, and the Emperor only consented to his further stay abroad when he was informed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained not for profit but for the benefit of musical culture.

Paper Public Ledger

City Philadelphia

Date MAR 1 State Pa

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

This week's list of musical affairs is long, though included in it are two concerts of first importance, the Boston Symphony tomorrow, and the Melba concert for the Bryn Mawr endowment fund on Tuesday afternoon.

The Boston Orchestra concludes its season here with tomorrow's concert. The concert will open with the Masonic funeral music of Mozart in memory of Fritz Scheel. Unusual interest is attached to this because of the possibility of its being the last appearance of Doctor Muck in this city. The question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next year is still unsettled, and, while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Doctor Muck, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in event it could not secure Doctor Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season. As previously announced, the programme for this fifth and last concert includes Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

* * *

Paper Sun

City New York

Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Programmes of the Last Concerts of Its Season in This City.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given on Thursday evening, March 21, and Saturday afternoon, March 23. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. The artistic results from the eight preceding concerts seem by common consent to have been the highest in the twenty years the orchestra has been coming to New York, and the support given to the concerts has been more generous than ever before. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and while the patronage at the matinée concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed.

The one disappointment of the season came from the failure of Mr. Paderewski to come to America, but next year he will certainly be among the New York soloists of the orchestra, for he expects to reach America early in the season and stay until spring. An interesting feature of the orchestra's season in this city has been that the presence or absence of soloists has made no difference in the attendance, and as a matter of fact the concerts where the greatest number of patrons were unable to get seats have been those when there was no soloist.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, a thing most desired, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in the event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves"; and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer.

Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-1904 and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute"; and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Tribune

City New York

Date MAR 17 1907 State N Y

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These concerts will bring to a close the most successful season that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in this city. At each one of the evening concerts the house has been absolutely "sold out," and while the patronage at the matinee concerts has not been so uniformly large, the difference in the gross receipts of the two series will be so trifling that it will scarcely be noticed. The one disappointment of the season came from the failure of Paderewski to come to America, but next year he will certainly be among the New York soloists of the orchestra, for he expects to reach America early in the season and stay until spring. An interesting feature of the orchestra's season in this city has been that the presence or absence of the soloists has made no difference in the attendance, and, as a matter of fact, the concerts where the greatest number of patrons were unable to get seats have been those when there was no soloist.

The question of conductor for next year is still unsettled, and while the management of the orchestra has not given up hope that it will be able to retain the services of Dr. Muck, no favorable reply has yet been received from Berlin, although the matter has been before the German Emperor personally for several weeks. It has been the hope of the management that, in the event it could not secure Dr. Muck's release from his contract with the Berlin Opera House, it could get his leave of absence extended for another season.

For his last concerts in New York Dr. Muck has arranged two strongly contrasted programmes. The composers represented on the programme of Thursday evening are Claude Debussy, Frederick S. Converse, Liszt and Berlioz. Those on Saturday's programme are Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

Debussy will be represented by three sketches grouped together under the name of "The Sea." They were played for the first time in America at the Boston concerts of March 1 and 2. The first part is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." These pieces were performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on October 15, 1905, this concert being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Concerts Lamoureux. Chevillard conducted. The sketches are impressionistic. The titles give the cue to the hearer. Mr. Converse's work is his orchestral fantasy entitled "The Mystic Trumpeter." The work is based on Walt Whitman's poem. It was composed in 1903-'04, and had its first performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra in March, 1905. It has also been played in Cincinnati and New York. The other works on this programme are Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain."

The programme for Saturday afternoon will begin with Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra. The second number will be Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 2; the third, the overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and the concert will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

Paper Evening World

City New York

Date State N Y

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra make their last visit to New York for the season this week. It will be by the grace of the German Emperor only if the distinguished conductor is permitted to return to America next season. He has made such a deep impression upon local music lovers that his absence would be sorely felt. This splendid orchestra, under his leadership, has surpassed even itself in artistic achievement. At the Thursday evening concert in Carnegie Hall, Debussy's three orchestral sketches of "The Sea," and Converse's symphonic poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after Walt Whitman, will be the principal numbers. On Saturday afternoon, Haydn's symphony in D major and Beethoven's symphony en F major will be played.

Paper Evening World

City New York

Date State N Y

1907

The Boston Symphony Quartet, at the farewell concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, will have the assistance of Katherine Goodson, an English pianist, and George Grisez, first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Herald

City Washington

Date MAR 21 1907 State D C

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its third concert at the New Willard yesterday afternoon. Only from the standpoint of the attendance was it other than a success. The music was exquisitely beautiful, dainty, and appealing. In Schubert's number, arranged for piano, violins, viola, and violoncello, in G minor, Miss Kathrine Goodson was the accompanist and was much appreciated. The programme consisted of selections from Haydn, Claude Du Bussy, and Schubert. Each number was enthusiastically received.

[165]

Paper Public Ledger

City Philadelphia

Date MAR 19 1907 State Pa

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO SCHEEL

Mozart's Masonic Funeral March Introduced at Last Concert of Season.

A SUPERB PROGRAMME

Strauss Domestic Symphony Attracts Large Audience to the Academy.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of their 22d season at the Academy of Music last night to a very large audience. It is understood that this was also the last appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, who has conducted the orchestra this winter with great success, and has made a distinct impression as a musician of intellectual insight and authority, whose return would be warmly welcomed.

In recognition of the loss which Philadelphia and the world of music has just sustained, Doctor Muck introduced last evening's programme with a solemn and lovely elegy from Mozart's Masonic funeral music, in memory of Fritz Scheel.

The commemoration of Scheel had a particular pertinence at this concert, since it was devoted chiefly to the "Sinfonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, which Scheel was the first conductor to make known in America, two years ago, after a performance given under the composer's direction during his visit to New York. This curious and much-debated composition Scheel made so surprisingly interesting that in the vote for the "request performance" at the end of that season the "Sinfonia Domestica" was next to the head of the poll. Its repetition in Philadelphia could not fail to recall the personal memories thus associated with it.

Listened to again, after this interval, the music makes no very different impression and leaves the hearer no more certain than before of the final value of Strauss's "programme music." He has followed the same method of composition in his later "Salome," which has not been heard here, and has developed it with even more of his astounding cleverness. But the same questions do not arise in opera, where the "programme" is audibly and visibly set forth in verse and action and the "representative themes" accompany the concrete ideas they illustrate. In the symphony there is no such association. We are called on to imagine a series of domestic incidents which the music may be supposed to indicate. Sometimes it does this by obvious description or imitation, but usually we are left guessing at the precise significance of strange instrumental effects, uncertain what the story really is, or whether, if we knew it, we should find it worth the knowing.

The most, perhaps, that the music really does, or can do, is to express what may be called the emotions aroused by or associated with the incidents of family life. Where there are real emotions—the elementary emotions, as of love or of parental tenderness—or where the music suggests elementary ideas, as of repose or awakening of care or joy, then it makes simply a musical appeal and we listen to it quite indifferent to the programme, which becomes, indeed, an impertinence, since the music is of so much more importance in itself.

It is really very wonderful music, if we can set aside our conventional preconceptions of form, and of harmony, and of beauty, and follow it for what it has to give, of intellectual exercise and stimulus, of intervals of pure music separated by what seems mere prankishness, and of dazzling color that is entirely unique.

The performance was superb. Strauss writes for an unconscionable multiplication of unusual instruments that no ordinary orchestra can supply, but every possible demand of the score was fully met, and the great orchestra played with a splendor of tone that was in itself a delight. It is not music that often appeals to any very deep sentiment, but the curious mastery of the orchestra constantly asserted in it, an almost uncanny if also unmoving skill, makes it a work whose importance is not to be resisted.

Doctor Muck was two or three times recalled at its conclusion, and rightly joined the members of the orchestra with him in acknowledgment of the applause. The concert closed with Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn and the unfading "Lenore, No. 3," which Doctor Muck plays with strongly marked contrasts and great precision, and also with finely sonorous effect. He has unquestionably imparted a new vitality to the great Boston organization.

Paper Sun

City New York

Date MAR 21 1907 State N Y

Willy Hess's third and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall to-morrow afternoon will present Debussy's quartet in G minor, op. 10; Schubert's trio in B flat, op. 99, and a Mozart quintet in A major with clarinet.

Katharine Goodson, an English pianist, new to New York, and Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the Boston orchestra, are assisting artists.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 21 1907 State N Y

[illegible] at Carnegie Hall is reviewed in advance in the current Harper's Weekly by Lawrence Gilman, who went over to the Hub to hear it first at the imminent peril of mal de mer on the Sound—not Debussy's sound but that which bathes Long Island. Rounding Little Rhody's Point Judith on the return trip, the author of "The Music of To-morrow" wrote thus concerning the novelty of to-day:

One's first impression of this music is of the manner in which it diverges from the too-familiar seascapes of orchestral tradition. We are not reminded, in listening to "La Mer," of the sea as it appealed to the imagination of Rimsky-Korsakoff, of Wagner, of Rubinstein, of Mendelssohn, of MacDowell. Nor is it the sea as Swinburne knew it—a sea which, as the echo of it lives in his verse, said W. E. Henley, convinces one of "its vastness and vehemency, the rapture of its inspiration, the palpitating, many-twinkling miracle of its light." Nor is it the thunderous and surging sea of Whitman—the sea "of brooding scowl and murk, of unloosed hurricanes"—that has quickened his spirit. The sea does not speak to him "with husky, haughty lips," as it did to that musician who uttered supremely its moods of sinister and terrible beauty, its majesty no less than its awe, its exhilaration no less than its allurement. For Debussy the sea is wholly a thing of dreams, a thing vaguely yet rhapsodically perceived, a bodiless thing of shapes that are gaunt or lovely, or fitful, or passionately insistent: but that always pertains to a supra-mundane world, a region altogether of the spirit. It is a sea which has its shifting and lucent surfaces, which even shimmers and traditionally mocks. But it is a sea that is shut away from too curious an inspection, to whose murmurs or imperious commands few have needed to pay heed; a sea whose eternal sonorities and immutable enchantments are hidden behind veils that open to few, and to none who attend without a certain rapt and curious eagerness.

Debussy's "three sea sketches"—the "Trois Esquisses Symphoniques," as he calls them—are thus entitled: (1) "De l'aube à midi sur mer"; (2) "Jeux de vagues"; (3) "Dialogue du vent et de la mer." They are scored for a full though not unusual orchestra.

The uncertainty of Dr. Muck's return to America is expected to lend a personal interest to this last Bostonian concert and the ensuing matinée.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 21 1907 State N Y

To-morrow afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet will present the following programme at Mendelssohn Hall: Debussy, quartet in G minor; Schubert, trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major; Mozart, clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, pianist, and George Grisez, clarinetist.

N. Y. Tribune
March 22, 1907.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Some of the music performed at the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to have been chosen by Dr. Muck to make his threatened parting easy. The Boston Orchestra's patrons are a loyal and affectionate folk, but their loyalty and affection were put to a severe strain by last night's programme, which began with a lot of impressionistic daubs of color smeared higgledy-piggledy on a tonal palette, with never a thought of form or outline or purpose (except to create new combinations of sounds) or logical procedure, but dignified with no less vast a title than "The Sea." There were three of these groups of daubs and splotches, which the composer, Debussy, designated respectively as "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," but, so far as a merely musical mind could determine, the order of the pieces might have been reversed and the music itself played backward without disturbing or changing in any way their significance, their effectiveness or the intellectual quality of the pretty rhapsodies of unmeaning words which the expositors of the French composer have superimposed upon all of his music. One thing only was obvious, and that was that Debussy's ocean was a frog pond, and that some of its denizens had got into the throat of every one of the brass instruments and stayed there from beginning to end, with woful results, especially to the first trumpet, which found no relief even after Debussy had been mercifully disposed of and Mr. Converse came on the scene with his "Mystic Trumpeter." This composition, which seemed to have some pith and moment when it was played at a concert of the short lived New Music Society, in Carnegie Hall last April, lost in effectiveness at the outset because of its imitation of the Frenchman's color scheme; but to those familiar with Whitman's poem, which it seeks to illustrate, it took on meaning later, and helped to make a rational transition to the music which wound up the concert—the overture "Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz. Between this [illegible] number and Mr. Converse's fantasy came [illegible] "Mephisto Waltz," which had previously been heard here this season at a concert of the [illegible] Society. Altogether the concert was [illegible] and edifying of any entertainment [illegible] in many moons.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck, who probably does not say his farewell to America at the end of this season, gave a curiously contrasted programme when he brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Baptist Temple last night, for he combined Beethoven, Liszt and Tschaikowsky in this bill, and while the beginning was strength and reasonable optimism, as exemplified in the third "Leonore" overture, the middle was mocking gayety betokened in the "Mephisto waltz," and the end was the deepest and most frank despair. The conventions would have directed the reversal of this order, so that the "Symphony Pathetique" should have come first and the overture brought affairs to a happy ending. As it was, the last sound from the great orchestra was Tschaikowsky's death groan.

Yet, it was all big, satisfying music, the first and last numbers being no doubt as well esteemed by our local audience as they certainly are by the Boston conductors, who have played the "Leonore" overture and the Pathetic symphony for us until we can whistle them. None have played them with deeper meaning, however, than Dr. Muck. The Beethoven overture, most familiar of its author's music, albeit scrappy, weak and rasping in spots, the rasps occurring in those dreadful scales near the close, was given with a fine appreciation of its larger elements, with mellow harmony and nimble melody, authoritative in its declamation, dramatic where that effect is signified, and wholly serious. The doctor's catholicity was instanced in the Mephisto waltz, for here he was delightfully diabolic in his reading. The piece was taken at a brisk tempo, with quaint shadings and accents and brilliant touches of orchestral color, the end being the spry and consistent one-spirited and bizarre, for Liszt wrote two and one may take his pick, the unplayed one fading into silence as Faust and the tavern wench disappear in the distance. It is hard to believe nowadays that the cacophanies and "diseased chords" vented on this theme by the Abbe could raise such a squall of protest, because in our own time Dr. Strauss is making the most impossible noises and calling them art. But music, like personalities, become swiftly obsolete in these restless times, in so far as its forms are concerned and when we have swung away from form as far as possible, when our music is all Brahms, Sibelius and Strauss, when our pictures are all Sisley and Monet, depend upon it we shall swing back again to comprehensibility and common sense, for the expression of the inexpressible is limited, after all.

The orchestra last night was at its best in the Tschaikowsky symphony—a work that has been played yearly here or hereabout since it was written and is likely to be played for many years to come, for this is one of the great utterances in music, and the greatest in the music of Russia. Here we had the weight and nobility of orchestral utterance, joined to a vastness of meaning before which Tschaikowsky himself seemed to shudder. It is denied that he intended this for his own requiem, but he was in the shadow of death when it was written, and it is the voice of one who, having flung open the gates of eternity, peers forth and finds all black. We do not find the funeral note struck deeply in the opening; the curious allegro in 5-4 time, allied to both the Spanish and the oriental dances has only an undertone of mourning; and the scherzo is a furious march that it should be unsafe to play in Moscow streets after dark; but the final adagio, the sum and purpose of this epic, grips the heart. Those swift upward runs in minors and diminished chords are questions that have no answer, the questions of one who has come to the end of things, who finds that life is without purpose, that faith is an accident of the human state, and that in the beyond is, nothing. Yet this music is as august as the Greek tragedy; it touches a theme at least as large as "Hamlet"; as mere expression it is Titanic, tremendous. The last despairing cry of the earth's last man will be Tschaikowsky's ending theme.

This was the last concert of our symphony season and it was heard by a great audience. During the winter the Boston orchestra has played the following numbers, in Brooklyn:

Overtue,r "Leonore" No. 3, concerto in D major, for violin	Beethoven
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements with viola solo	Berlioz
Symphony No. 1	Brahms
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5	Glazounoff
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Mephisto waltz	Liszt
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Variations and double fugue on a merry theme	George Schumann
Symphony No. 1	Sibelius
Tone-poem, "Don Juan"	Richard Strauss
Symphonie pathetique, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1	Tschaikowsky
"A Siegfried Idyl," prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 21.—The news that Emperor William has given permission to Dr. Carl Muck to remain another year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been received with general satisfaction in musical circles.

Among the patrons there are those who greatly admire Mr. Gericke's methods and who do not hesitate to express regret that he did not remain in Boston, but on the whole the feeling toward his successor is cordial.

Dr. Muck, who is in New York, said last night: "The notice is not official. I have heard it simply through a third person."

[166]

Staats Zeitung
March 22-07.

[illegible]

Das erste Konzert der [illegible] — leider! — letzten Serie der diesjährigen Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte hat gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor dem gewohnten ausverkauften Haus mit dem üblichen durchschlagenden Erfolg stattgefunden.

Das Programm wurde mit Debussy's hier zum ersten Mal gehörten drei Orchester-Skizzen eingeleitet, welchen der Komponist den Gesammtnamen „Das Meer" beigelegt hat. Die Skizzen heißen „Von Sonnenaufgang bis Mittag auf der See", „Spiel der Wellen" und „Dialog des Windes und der See". Man kennt die raffinirte Art der Neufranzosen, welche in ihrer Weise den französischen Kochkünstlern gleichend, aus geringem melodischen Material ein interessantes und pikantes musikalisches Gericht herzustellen verstehen. So hält es diesmal auch Debussy.

Die Motive sind klein, kurzathmig, wenig bedeutend, die Entwicklung hat sich der Komponist auch nicht schwer gemacht, das Hauptgewicht ist auf eine graziöse, pikante und fremdartig klingende Instrumentation und raffinirte Stimmungsmache gelegt. Die Bewegung des feuchten Elements ist durch häufige Harfenglissandi charakterisirt. Im zweiten Theil wäre fast etwas Ueberraschendes passirt: es schien zu einer wahrhaftigen Melodik zu kommen, doch schnappte auch dieser Anlauf unvermittelt ab. In Stizze No. 3 dialogisiren Wind und See als recht grobe Gesellen, machen einen Höllenspektakel und werfen einander die saftigsten Dissonanzen an den Kopf. Ueberraschenderweise kann auch dieses Geknatter noch überboten werden, denn es kommt zu einer regelrechten Schlußsteigerung, welche uns Gott danken läßt, daß wir diesen Dialog zwischen Wind und Meer vom sicheren Port aus genießen können. Daß auch reizvolle Episoden und harmonische Feinschmeckerstückchen unterlaufen, versteht sich bei Debussy von selbst. Das Stück wurde virtuos gespielt.

Die nun folgende Orchester-Phantasie von F. S. Converse „Der Mystische Trompeter", (neu) enttäuschte. Das Stück ist viel zu lang und ermüdend und verliert sich in unfruchtbaren Grübeleien und harmonischen Seichtigkeiten. Der erste Theil hebt mit einem hübschen Thema an, das im Finale vom ganzen Orchester recht effektvoll gebracht wird, aber die Inspiration hat bald ausgespielt, und auch die Instrumentation ist nur stellenweise geglückt. Dem Trompeter passirte ein böser Kicks — na, das kommt in den besten musikalischen Familien vor!

Liszt's „Mephisto"-Walzer und Berlioz' „Römischer Karneval" wurden unnachahmlich schön gespielt. Die Diskretion, Delikatesse und, wo es noththut, der Schwung waren bewunderungswürdig. Der Dirigent Dr. Muck hat gestern erwiesen, daß er auch hinreißende, blendende Farbentöne auf seiner Palette hat.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

"AND there was no more sea." After Debussy, no wonder! Nor would the jolly, jolly mariners have received the edict with protest or even regret. Dr. Muck will probably visit us next year at the head of the Boston orchestra. Surely he will not repeat his experiment of last night. Debussy has written music of haunting and unaccustomed beauty. None of it is in "The Sea" that woefully groaned and roared for a bad half-hour in Carnegie Hall yesterday. Even the first trumpet of a usually flawless band threatened to go on strike.

In Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" this player should have come into his own, but the memory of a stormy voyage [illegible] Debussy could not so soon be shaken off. Apart from slips in the title rôle, the Mystic Trumpeter" was superbly played, but the work (first produced here last April by the New Music Society) does not gain at a rehearing. In spite of good moments, it is as a whole long and tedious. After Debussy and Converse the bedizened blandishments of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" were a genuine relief, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture capped the climax like a work of towering genius. But what a concert! Dr. Muck as a maker of programmes is a law unto himself.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

PERMITS HERR MUCK TO STAY HERE.

Berlin, March 21.—Emperor William has given his consent that Herr Muck, director of the royal orchestra, shall stay another year in the United [illegible] Herr Muck's absence is greatly [illegible]

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

To return to our Chablis mousse. Debussy out-Strausses Strauss. "The Sea" and all that's in that painted mud-puddle was merely funny when it [illegible] whistling "Salome's" own shrill [illegible] your ears rebelled and the [illegible] cold shivers ran down the orchestra [illegible] along a belled celesta. Through "De[illegible] Noon at Sea," the young Frenchman blew soft soap bubbles, only to prick them at the moment when an evanescent iridescence might have shone out clear at last.

Now Debussy isn't an aimless fool. He is trying to see what can be done to articulate spineless tone and purely invertebrate sound. No set speeches, no solemn-eyed proposing and discussing of themes. Where D'Indy had form, Debussy has what the tone-deaf are pleased to call "color." No instrument was allowed to utter its natural voice. A piercing violin unison "above the bridge" was, frankly, the limit. A woman wished some one would "shut off the boiler valve."

Trickling drops from melting icebergs made "Sport of the Waves," but the final "Dialogue of Wind and Sea" would have sounded as sweet if played backwards or upside down. The water had a certain ground swell. The wind—well, the old Irish song has that to rights:

I've lived a long time, Mary,
In this wide world, my dear;
But the wind to whistle a tune like that
I never before did hear.

Whatever the F. S. Converse proposition of Walt Whitman's "Mystic Trumpeter" gained by following the Debussy wake it lost by having to be heard without several of its trumpet topnotes and all of its words, but the "Marching Through Georgia" tag. Mr. Carnegie's and Mr. Higginson's programme contracts continue to disagree. The public might as well be content if it's only our gloves that are blackened while our minds—for all programme information—are blank. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz with a Berlioz "Roman Carnival" was austere and tonic spring bitters.

Dr. Karl Muck, after a few such soulless and soulless bills, will need all of that second year of his to make America take him seriously. He dons the classic mask again to-morrow. Why can't he let these extremes meet on speaking terms occasionally?

Kaiser Wilhelm, the cables say, will yield another year of Dr. Muck to Boston because the orchestra stands for culture and not for cash. And this man is well worth the trouble taken to keep him.

The gorge rises at the spectacle of America going begging around the courts of Europe for its musical leaders. But where else are the Carusos of the bâton, save at Milan?

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given last evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Baptist Temple, and proved of commendable brevity. Three numbers constituted the entire programme, but, oh, what numbers! Beginning with the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, with but one dissenting phase—that of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," vaguely prophetic in its unmusical moments and disjointed ideas, of the "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks" of our time—the concert closed with the greatest symphony ever written, Tschaikowsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." The audience was very large, overflowing the seats, a ring of standees attesting to the general enthusiasm, and everybody was out of the building and on his way home before 10 o'clock. How happy shall we all be when the Academy is completed, for at the Temple, because of its limitations, we listen to a reduced orchestra, splendid though that may be.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, the third and finest of those written for his one opera, "Fidelio," was played in charming style with the emotional side of it kept somewhat in subjection, but none the less interesting on that account. Dr. Muck is not a Nikisch or a Seidl or a Safanoff, but he has many delightful qualities of his own, and Beethoven is open to more than one interpretation, his genius being well-nigh limitless, and inviting approach from various points of view. As of Tschaikowsky, that amazing voice of the Russian people of to-day, this is not altogether so true; it takes a certain emotional type to understand and interpret his strange, passionate harmonies with profound effect. There was too little variety and contrast in Dr. Muck's reading, particularly in the first two movements; the former was taken at much too slow a tempo, while the latter lacked that verve, that limpidity, without which the "allegro con grazia" borders on the commonplace. Played with its full significance, the extraordinary 5-4 time (with the [illegible] beat conspicuous, yet not detracting from the all-pervading grace), the second movement suggests Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, being very much in accord with its clear, lovely mood.

But the third movement went brilliantly enough, and the fourth, that sublime lamentoso, which contributes more than anything else to the grandeur of this masterpiece, was given in Dr. Muck's and the orchestra's best manner. In all the world there is no nobler threnody; the tug on the heart-strings as that impassioned cry throbs [illegible] 'cellos, is almost more than one can bear. Amidst the wonderful organ tones of the [illegible] basses and their allies, with the soaring of the orchestra in full fortissimo, a [illegible] truly to be passing beyond its earthly [illegible] ment.

It is understood that Dr. Muck is to remain with the Boston organization [illegible] His is a sane, scholarly temperament, continence to the fore and [illegible] ing characteristic, and his [illegible] be for good. At this [illegible] possess a certain [illegible]

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 21 1907 State N Y

To-night's second symphony production of Debussy's "La Mer" at Carnegie Hall is reviewed in advance in the current Harper's Weekly by Lawrence Gilman, who went over to the Hub to hear it first at the imminent peril of mal de mer on the Sound—not Debussy's sound but that which bathes Long Island. Rounding Little Rhody's Point Judith on the return trip, the author of "The Music of To-morrow" wrote thus concerning the novelty of to-day:

One's first impression of this music is of the manner in which it diverges from the too-familiar seascapes of orchestral tradition. We are not reminded, in listening to "La Mer," of the sea as it appealed to the imagination of Rimsky-Korsakoff, of Wagner, of Rubinstein, of Mendelssohn, of MacDowell. Nor is it the sea as Swinburne knew it—a sea which, as the echo of it lives in his verse, said W. E. Henley, convinces one of "its vastness and vehemency, the rapture of its inspiration, the palpitating, many-twinkling miracle of its light." Nor is it the thunderous and surging sea of Whitman—the sea "of brooding scowl and murk, of unloosed hurricanes"—that has quickened his spirit. The sea does not speak to him "with husky, haughty lips," as it did to that musician who uttered supremely its moods of sinister and terrible beauty, its majesty no less than its awe, its exhilaration no less than its allurement. For Debussy the sea is wholly a thing of dreams, a thing vaguely yet rhapsodically perceived, a bodiless thing of shapes that are gaunt or lovely, or fitful, or passionately insistent: but that always pertain to a supra-mundane world, a region altogether of the spirit. It is a sea which has its shifting and lucent surfaces, which even shimmers and traditionally mocks. But it is a sea that is shut away from too curious an inspection, to whose murmurs or imperious commands few have needed to pay heed; a sea whose eternal sonorities and immutable enchantments are hidden behind veils that open to few, and to none who attend without a certain rapt and curious eagerness.

Debussy's "three sea sketches"—the "Trois Esquisses Symphoniques," as he calls them—are thus entitled: (1) "De l'aube à midi sur mer"; (2) "Jeux de vagues"; (3) "Dialogue du vent et de la mer." They are scored for a full though not unusual orchestra.

The uncertainty of Dr. Muck's return to America is expected to lend a personal interest to this last Bostonian concert and the ensuing matinée.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date MAR 21 1907 State N Y

To-morrow afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet will present the following programme at Mendelssohn Hall: Debussy, quartet in G minor; Schubert, trio for piano, violin, and 'cello in B flat major; Mozart, clarinet quintet in A major. The assisting artists will be Mme Katharine Goodson, pianist, and George Grisez, clarinetist.

N. Y. Tribune
March 22, 1907.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Some of the music performed at the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night seemed to have been chosen by Dr. Muck to make his threatened parting easy. The Boston Orchestra's patrons are a loyal and affectionate folk, but their loyalty and affection were put to a severe strain by last night's programme, which began with a lot of impressionistic daubs of color smeared higgledy-piggledy on a tonal palette, with never a thought of form or outline or purpose (except to create new combinations of sounds) or logical procedure, but dignified with no less vast a title than "The Sea." There were three of these groups of daubs and splotches, which the composer, Debussy, designated respectively as "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea," but, so far as a merely musical mind could determine, the order of the pieces might have been reversed and the music itself played backward without disturbing or changing in any way their significance, their effectiveness or the intellectual quality of the pretty rhapsodies of unmeaning words which the expositors of the French composer have superimposed upon all of his music. One thing only was obvious, and that was that Debussy's ocean was a frog pond, and that some of its denizens had got into the throat of every one of the brass instruments and stayed there from beginning to end, with woful results, especially to the first trumpet, which found no relief even after Debussy had been mercifully disposed of and Mr. Converse came on the scene with his "Mystic Trumpeter." This composition, which seemed to have some pith and moment when it was played at a concert of the short lived New Music Society, in Carnegie Hall last April, lost in effectiveness at the outset because of its imitation of the Frenchman's color scheme; but to those familiar with Whitman's poem, which it seeks to illustrate, it took on meaning later, and helped to make a rational transition to the music which wound up the concert—the overture "Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz. Between this final number and Mr. Converse's fantasy came Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which had previously been heard here this season at a concert of the Philharmonic Society. Altogether the concert was the least gratifying and edifying of any entertainment given by the orchestra in many moons.

H. E. K.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck, who probably does not say his farewell to America at the end of this season, gave a curiously contrasted programme when he brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Baptist Temple last night, for he combined Beethoven, Liszt and Tschaikowsky in this bill, and while the beginning was strength and reasonable optimism, as exemplified in the third "Leonore" overture, the middle was mocking gayety betokened in the "Mephisto waltz," and the end was the deepest and most frank despair. The conventions would have directed the reversal of this order, so that the "Symphony Pathetique" should have come first and the overture brought affairs to a happy ending. As it was, the last sound from the great orchestra was Tschaikowsky's death groan.

Yet, it was all big, satisfying music, the first and last numbers being no doubt as well esteemed by our local audience as they certainly are by the Boston conductors, who have played the "Leonore" overture and the Pathetic symphony for us until we can whistle them. None have played them with deeper meaning, however, than Dr. Muck. The Beethoven overture, most familiar of its author's music, albeit scrappy, weak and rasping in spots, the rasps occurring in those dreadful scales near the close, was given with a fine appreciation of its larger elements, with mellow harmony and nimble melody, authoritative in its declamation, dramatic where that effect is signified, and wholly serious. The doctor's catholicity was instanced in the Mephisto waltz, for here he was delightfully diabolic in his reading. The piece was taken at a brisk tempo, with quaint shadings and accents and brilliant touches of orchestral color, the end being the spry and consistent one-spirited and bizarre, for Liszt wrote two and one may take his pick, the unplayed one fading into silence as Faust and the tavern wench disappear in the distance. It is hard to believe nowadays that the cacophanies and "diseased chords" vented on this theme by the Abbe could raise such a squall of protest, because in our own time Dr. Strauss is making the most impossible noises and calling them art. But music, like personalities, become swiftly obsolete in these restless times, in so far as its forms are concerned and when we have swung away from form as far as possible, when our music is all Brahms, Sibelius and Strauss, when our pictures are all Sisley and Monet, depend upon it we shall swing back again to comprehensibility and common sense, for the expression of the inexpressible is limited, after all.

The orchestra last night was at its best in the Tschaikowsky symphony—a work that has been played yearly here or hereabout since it was written and is likely to be played for many years to come, for this is one of the great utterances in music, and the greatest in the music of Russia. Here we had the weight and nobility of orchestral utterance, joined to a vastness of meaning before which Tschaikowsky himself seemed to shudder. It is denied that he intended this for his own requiem, but he was in the shadow of death when it was written, and it is the voice of one who, having flung open the gates of eternity, peers forth and finds all black. We do not find the funeral note struck deeply in the opening; the curious allegro in 5-4 time, allied to both the Spanish and the oriental dances has only an undertone of mourning; and the scherzo is a furious march that it should be unsafe to play in Moscow streets after dark; but the final adagio, the sum and purpose of this epic, grips the heart. Those swift upward runs in minors and diminished chords are questions that have no answer, the questions of one who has come to the end of things, who finds that life is without purpose, that faith is an accident of the human state, and that in the beyond is, nothing. Yet this music is as august as the Greek tragedy; it touches a theme at least as large as "Hamlet"; as mere expression it is Titanic, tremendous. The last despairing cry of the earth's last man will be Tschaikowsky's ending theme.

This was the last concert of our symphony season and it was heard by a great audience. During the winter the Boston orchestra has played the following numbers in Brooklyn:

Overtue,r "Leonore" No. 3, conecrto in D major, for violin.....Beethoven
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements with viola solo.....Berlioz
Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5....Glazounoff
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Mephisto waltz.....Liszt
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"..
.....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Variations and double fugue on a merry theme.....George Schumann
Symphony No. 1.....Sibelius
Tone-poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Symphonie pathetique, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1.....Tschaikowsky
"A Siegfried Idyl," prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 21.—The news that Emperor William has given permission to Dr. Carl Muck to remain another year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been received with general satisfaction in musical circles.

Among the patrons there are those who greatly admire Mr. Gericke's methods and who do not hesitate to express regret that he did not remain in Boston, but on the whole the feeling toward his successor is cordial.

Dr. Muck, who is in New York, said last night: "The notice is not official. I have heard it simply through a third person."

[166]

Staats Zeitung
March 22-07.

Bostoner Symphonie-Soirée.

Das erste Konzert der fünften und — leider! — letzten Serie der diesjährigen Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte hat gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall vor dem gewohnten ausverkauften Haus mit dem üblichen durchschlagenden Erfolg stattgefunden.

Das Programm wurde mit Debussy's hier zum ersten Mal gehörten drei Orchester-Skizzen eingeleitet, welchen der Komponist den Gesammtnamen „Das Meer" beigelegt hat. Die Skizzen heißen „Von Sonnenaufgang bis Mittag auf der See", „Spiel der Wellen" und „Dialog des Windes und der See". Man kennt die raffinirte Art der Neufranzosen, welche, in ihrer Weise den französischen Kochkünstlern gleichend, aus geringem melodischen Material ein interessantes und pikantes musikalisches Gericht herzustellen verstehen. So hält es diesmal auch Debussy.

Die Motive sind klein, kurzathmig, wenig bedeutend, die Entwicklung hat sich der Komponist auch nicht schwer gemacht, das Hauptgewicht ist auf eine graziöse, pikante und fremdartig klingende Instrumentation und raffinirte Stimmungsmache gelegt. Die Bewegung des feuchten Elements ist durch häufige Harfengliffandi charakterisirt. Im zweiten Theil wäre fast etwas Ueberraschendes passirt: es schien zu einer wahrhaftigen Melodik zu kommen, doch schnappte auch dieser Anlauf unvermittelt ab. In Skizze No. 3 dialogisiren Wind und See als recht grobe Gesellen, machen einen Höllenspektakel und werfen einander die saftigsten Dissonanzen an den Kopf. Ueberraschenderweise kann auch dieses Geknatter noch überboten werden, denn es kommt zu einer regelrechten Schlußsteigerung, welche uns Gott danken läßt, daß wir diesen Dialog zwischen Wind und Meer vom sicheren Port aus genießen können. Daß auch reizvolle Episoden und harmonische Feinschmeckerstückchen unterlaufen, versteht sich bei Debussy von selbst. Das Stück wurde virtuos gespielt.

Die nun folgende Orchester-Phantasie von F. S. Converse „Der Mystische Trompeter", (neu) enttäuschte. Das Stück ist viel zu lang und ermüdend und verliert sich in unfruchtbaren Grübeleien und harmonischen Seichtigkeiten. Der erste Theil hebt mit einem hübschen Thema an, das im Finale vom ganzen Orchester recht effektvoll gebracht wird, aber die Inspiration hat bald ausgespielt, und auch die Instrumentation ist nur stellenweise geglückt. Dem Trompeter passirte ein böser Kicks — na, das kommt in den besten musikalischen Familien vor!

Liszt's „Mephisto"-Walzer und Berlioz' „Römischer Karneval" wurden unnachahmlich schön gespielt. Die Diskretion, Delikatesse und, wo es noththut, der Schwung waren bewunderungswürdig. Der Dirigent Dr. Muck hat gestern erwiesen, daß er auch hinreißende, blendende Farbentöne auf seiner Palette hat.

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

"AND there was no more sea." After Debussy, no wonder! Nor would the jolly, jolly mariners have received the edict with protest or even regret. Dr. Muck will probably visit us next year at the head of the Boston orchestra. Surely he will not repeat his experiment of last night. Debussy has written music of haunting and unaccustomed beauty. None of it is in "The Sea" that woefully groaned and roared for a bad half-hour in Carnegie Hall yesterday. Even the first trumpet of a usually flawless band threatened to go on strike.

In Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" this player should have come into his own, but the memory of a stormy voyage of Debussy could not so soon be shaken off. Apart from slips in the title rôle, "The Mystic Trumpeter" was superbly played, but the work (first produced here last April by the New Music Society) does not gain at a rehearing. In spite of good moments, it is as a whole long and tedious. After Debussy and Converse the bedizened blandishments of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" were a genuine relief, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture capped the climax like a work of towering genius. But what a concert! Dr. Muck as a maker of programmes is a law unto himself.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

PERMITS HERR MUCK TO STAY HERE.

Berlin, March 21.—Emperor William has given his consent that Herr Muck, director of the royal orchestra, shall stay another year in the United States. Herr Muck's absence is greatly felt here, and the Emperor consented to his further stay abroad only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained not for profit

---

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

To return to our Chablis mouton: Debussy out-Strausses Strauss. "The Sea" and all that's in that painted mud-puddle was merely funny when it fell to whistling "Salome's" own shrill trill till your ears rebelled and the sympathetic cold shivers ran down the orchestra's back along a belled celesta. Through "Dawn to Noon at Sea," the young Frenchman blew soft soap bubbles, only to prick them at the moment when an evanescent iridescence might have shone out clear at last.

Now Debussy isn't an aimless fool. He is trying to see what can be done to articulate spineless tone and purely invertebrate sound. No set speeches, no solemn-eyed proposing and discussing of themes. Where D'Indy had form, Debussy has what the tone-deaf are pleased to call "color." No instrument was allowed to utter its natural voice. A piercing violin unison "above the bridge" was, frankly, the limit. A woman wished some one would "shut off the boiler valve."

Trickling drops from melting icebergs made "Sport of the Waves," but the final "Dialogue of Wind and Sea" would have sounded as sweet if played backwards or upside down. The water had a certain ground swell. The wind—well, the old Irish song has that to rights:

I've lived a long time, Mary,
In this wide world, my dear;
But the wind to whistle a tune like that
I never before did hear.

Whatever the F. S. Converse proposition of Walt Whitman's "Mystic Trumpeter" gained by following the Debussy wake it lost by having to be heard without several of its trumpet topnotes and all of its words but the "Marching Through Georgia" tag. Mr. Carnegie's and Mr. Higginson's programme contracts continue to disagree. The public might as well be content if it's only our gloves that are blackened while our minds—for all programme information—are blank. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz with a Berlioz "Roman Carnival" was austere and tonic spring bitters.

Dr. Karl Muck, after a few such sololess and soulless bills, will need all of that second year of his to make America take him seriously. He dons the classic mask again to-morrow. Why can't he let these extremes meet on speaking terms occasionally?

Kaiser Wilhelm, the cables say, will yield another year of Dr. Muck to Boston, because the orchestra stands for culture and not for cash. And this man is well worth the trouble taken to keep him.

The gorge rises at the spectacle of America going begging around the courts of Europe for its musical leaders. But where else are the Carusos of the bâton, save at Milan?

Paper Union
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given last evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Baptist Temple, and proved of commendable brevity. Three numbers constituted the entire programme, but, oh, what numbers! Beginning with the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, with but one disquieting phase—that of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," vaguely prophetic, in its unmusical moments and disjointed ideas, of the "Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks" of our time—the concert closed with the greatest symphony ever written, Tschaikowsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." The audience was very large, overflowing the seats, a ring of standees attesting to the general enthusiasm, and everybody was out of the building and on his way home before 10 o'clock. How happy shall we all be when the Academy is completed, for at the Temple, because of its limitations, we listen to a reduced orchestra, splendid though that may be.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, the third and finest of those written for his one opera, "Fidelio," was played in charming style, with the emotional side of it kept somewhat in subjection, but none the less interesting on that account. Dr. Muck is not a Nikisch or a Seidl or a Safanoff, but he has many delightful qualities of his own, and Beethoven is open to more than one interpretation, his genius being well-nigh limitless, and inviting approach from various points of view. But of Tschaikowsky, that amazing voice of the Russian people of to-day, this is not altogether so true: it takes a certain emotional type to understand and interpret his strange, passionate harmonies with profound effect. There was too little variety and contrast in Dr. Muck's reading, particularly in the first two movements; the former was taken at much too slow a tempo, while the latter lacked that verve, that limpidity, without which this "allegro con grazia" borders on the common place. Played with its full significance, in its extraordinary 5-4 time (with the redundant beat conspicuous, yet not detracting from the all-pervading grace), the second movement suggests Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, being very much in accord with its clear, lovely mood.

But the third movement went brilliantly enough, and the fourth, that sublime adagio lamentoso, which contributes more than anything else to the grandeur of this masterpiece, was given in Dr. Muck's and the orchestra's best manner. In all the world there is no nobler threnody; the tug on the heart-strings as that impassioned cry throbs among the 'cellos, is almost more than one can bear. Amidst the wonderful organ tone of the great basses and their allies, with the solemn beat of the orchestra in full fortissimo, a soul seems truly to be passing beyond its earthly tenement.

It is understood that Dr. Muck is to remain with the Boston organization another year. His is a sane, scholarly temperament, with continence to the fore and sincerity as a leading characteristic, and his influence cannot but be for good. At the same time, when he essays a certain order of music, such as the public craves in this year of Our Lord, a bit more of abandon would have an inspiring effect on those marvelous Boston strings.

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Dr. Muck to Stay.

It is greatly to be hoped that the report from Berlin concerning Dr. Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will prove true. This report is to the effect that the Emperor has consented to extend Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his post as director of the royal orchestra for another year, so that he may be able to continue his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is not because Dr. Muck's services are not needed in Berlin, but, according to the report, the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is maintained by Colonel Higginson as an educational force, and not as a source of revenue, was fully explained to the Emperor, and so pleased his Majesty that he was glad to contribute to the cause of musical culture here. He could not have made a finer contribution. As leader of the Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck is emphatically the right man in the right place. The oftener one hears him lead the more the power and breadth of the man as an interpretive musician, as well as his control of the splendidly disciplined band which Mr. Gericke turned over to him, become impressed upon the listener. The Boston Symphony has had many fine conductors, some strong in one direction and some in others, but certainly no man since Nikisch has so fully combined fire and strength with elegance and delicacy as does the present holder of the baton. We have been told that to-night would see the last appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor in Brooklyn. He will be all the more heartily welcomed to-night now that the prospect is excellent that he will come to us yet many times in the future. Dr. Muck ought to be an established American institution. Perhaps he may yet become so, if we will be a little patient. The Emperor of Germany has done many gracious things to America and Americans, but nothing more gracious or more helpful than this.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony.

THE programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was almost entirely modern, including Debussy's three orchestral sketches, called "The Sea," F. S. Converse's fantasy on Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's Mephisto Waltz and the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz.

The interest of the evening centred in the Debussy work, which was played here for the first time. It displays the peculiarities characteristic of this ultra-modern Frenchman—a leaning toward vagueness and a lack of stirring human emotions. Debussy is the Maeterlinck of musicians, and glories in the portrayal of indefinite and illusive vistas of tonal beauties, scorning the obvious melody and the persistence of any particular tonality. His music is a series ...swirling and kaleidoscopic tone ...pictures, surcharged with what we call "atmosphere" for want of a better word.

...The three pieces are named "From Dawn to Noontide on the Ocean," "The Frolic of the Waves" and "The Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." With the constant use of the pentatonic or Oriental scale of five, and the frequent introduction of unusual passages for the harp and muted trumpets, the effect produced was essentially eastern, and especially was descriptive of waves whispering or booming on the shores of Asia. Perhaps for this reason the New York audience received the work, splendidly interpreted as it was by Dr. Muck, with interest and attention, but not with enthusiasm. The taste for Debussy is an acquired one, and until next season, when we shall hear "Pelleas and Melisande," this public will not fall in line with the composer's many admirers in France. With fine judgment Dr. Muck introduced next on the programme a composition by an American, F. S. Converse, of Boston, the antithesis of Debussy, of Paris. The "Mystic Trumpeter" fantasy does not leave one in doubt as to its meaning. After reading the poem each movement and its mood is clearly, almost graphically portrayed, with brilliant and masterful orchestration and clever use of the original themes. Mr. Converse has the audacity to use a strain of "Marching Through Georgia" in the war picture, and consequently becomes dangerously humorous in his imposing climax. The Mephisto waltz of Liszt and the "Roman Carnival Remain" have been heard several times. Dr. Muck's reading and inspired

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA" AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

New but Unimpressive Composition Is Heard in New York for the First Time.

New York heard for the first time last night a new composition called "The Sea," and New York is probably wondering why yet. The work, played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, is by the most modern of modern Frenchmen, Debussy, and it consists of three orchestral sketches, which bear the titles "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea."

They have the distinction of being as nearly without themes as possible. The titles serve only as thin, weak pegs for the listener to hang his imagination upon, the music itself being sheerly moods that might mean a thousand things. Patches of tonal color spot the composer's canvas, and the thread of continuous idea is missing. Compared with this writing the most abstruse compositions of Richard Strauss are as primer stories to hear and to comprehend.

To the musician the compositions present opportunities for study, but to the average listener they suggest that they can only be classed as incidental music and that they cry for scenery and the theatre. Only an orchestra of virtuosi can possibly play these sketches, and even the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed in some of its departments to accomplish the task set before it.

The Debussy compositions were followed by "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestra fantasy by F. S. Converse, after Walt Whitman's poem. This has been heard here once before, and last night's hearing did not deepen the impression made by the work then. Liszt and Berlioz filled the remaining portion of the programme. Dr. Muck conducted with all the skill and artistic command he possesses.

Paper American
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

DR. MUCK HAS TWO CAUSES FOR JOY

Dr. Muck, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, was a proud man for two reasons. In the first place he took his orchestra through the mazes of a programme of the most difficult and intricate music, and in the next place he had just received from his imperial master, the War Lord of Germany, permission to stay another year in the highly cultivated atmosphere of Boston.

The concert began with three orchestral sketches called "The Sea," by Claude Debussy, given for the first time in New York. M. Debussy, in this group of descriptive tone poems, has contrived to break down every one of the old rules of harmony. In the order of progression of incomprehensibility, first comes Wagner; second, Strauss, and third, Debussy. He does not write for the person of ordinary healthy mind, but for the ultra psychic creature, and even the most highly cultured of Boston's music lovers found Debussy almost unintelligible.

After all, the best description of his mysteriously involved music is to be found in his commentator's mysteriously involved description of it, which says: "There are times when his melody verges upon obviousness." Few of the auditors found even the verging places.

After a ten-minute intermission Converse's musical setting to Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," was beautifully played. This composition was a noteworthy example of sweeping, continuous harmony. Most generous applause followed the Converse fantasy.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz, were the other two numbers on the programme, the waltz having been made familiar here by Theodore Thomas.

The usual crowded house greeted the Bostonians. The programme for to-morrow afternoon's concert will include a Bach suite, a Haydn symphony, a Beethoven symphony and the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

DR. MUCK TO REMAIN.

The Kaiser Consents in the Interests of Musical Culture Here.

BERLIN, Thursday. — Emperor William some days ago gave his consent that Dr. Muck, director of the Royal Orchestra, who is now with Major Higginson in Boston, shall stay another year in the United States. Dr. Muck's absence from Berlin is greatly felt and the Emperor consented to his further stay abroad only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

SOME encouragement of the hope, long entertained, of the founding of a really representative American national music school may be said to have been afforded to musicians and lovers of music on this side of the Atlantic by the decided success that was achieved by Frederick P. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," opus 18 (based upon the poem of the same cognomen by Walt Whitman), which had its second actual presentation, but the first it has enjoyed under fully and perfectly competent auspices last evening at Carnegie Hall. The work was included by Dr. Karl Muck, the Berlin Royal Opera conductor, in the programme selected by him for the first concert of the series that will close the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season.

Coming as it did, the second of the evening's offerings, the Converse fantasy, proved a delightful and exhilarating relief from the bewildering chaos and dissonant jumble of the imported novelty that preceded it—Debussey's suite of orchestral sketches entitled "Le Mer," which was given its premiere in this city by the aggregation from the Hub.

Of both the French and American works careful, discriminating, withal very effective readings were given by the director from Prussia's capital. The Debussey suite is divided into three parts—I., "From Dawn Until Noon on the Ocean"; II., "Frolics of Waves"; III., "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." Any one of these, however, impresses more by the labyrinth of technical means employed than by true poetic results attained. Dawn, noon, wave frolics and sighing wind and meaning sea—these have inspired the Gallic composer with little of harmonic and nothing of melodic invention or utilization that the illimitable vastness of the Sahara Desert, the lofty heights of the Andes or the fastnesses of the Afric forests also might not have suggested in precisely the same manner and with resort to the same mere mechanical tricks that have produced the "sea sketches." Seldom, if ever, in the score is there absolute music; substituted therefore is technique complicated to the extremest degree—a too concentrated essence of the psychic in music.

The composer of "The Mystic Trumpeter," on the contrary, at no time denies his hearers the benefit and pleasure—certainly their due—of logically, attractively formed music expression. His work abounds in dainty, bright effects that were well brought out by the Boston symphonists, while occasional intervals of lovely melody and a superbly built climax rounds out a tone poem in the veritable sense of that much abused phrase.

Liszt's Episode No. 2, from the Lenau "Faust," better known as the Mephisto Waltz, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" were the other numbers on Dr. Muck's programme. Both were performed with a verve and dash that captivated the very large audience present.

Paper Post
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Modern Music Vin Boston.

Boston is a conservative town, musically speaking, but last night the Symphony Orchestra of that town came to Carnegie Hall and rendered a programme in which there was not even a faint scent of classicism. Debussy, the leader of the French secessionists, led off with three orchestral sketches entitled "The Sea," which were followed by Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." To-morrow afternoon the orchestra will play pieces by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. For the sake of contrast, one of the cardinal virtues of programmes, it would have been better to mix old and new at each concert.

"The Sea" of Debussy does not call for many words of comment. The three parts of which it is composed are entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea"; but so far as any pictorial suggestiveness in them is concerned, they might as well have been entitled "On the Flat-iron Building," "Strumming in the Bowery," and "A Glimpse of Chinatown During a Raid." Debussy's music is the dreariest kind of rubbish; the Germans have two expressions which aptly characterize it: "Ein jammerliches Machwerk," betraying a "trostlose Impotenz." Does anybody for a moment doubt that Debussy would not write such chaotic, meaningless, cacophonous, ungrammatical stuff if he could invent a melody like those of his great countrymen, Auber or Boieldieu, or even Herold or Adam? And this is the man who calls Gluck a pedantic, bombastic bore, and Wagner insipid, vacuous, and unsupportable; and who refers to Berlioz in these words: "He is an exception, a monster. He is not at all a musician; he gives one the illusion of music with his methods borrowed from literature and painting. Furthermore, I do not see much in him that is particularly French." In these words Debussy really describes himself. Nothing could be more remote from the true French spirit than his want of directness, lucidity, pattern, aim, and style. Even his orchestration is not particularly remarkable. Mr. Loeffler of Boston is far more original from this point of view.

After this dose of Debussy, which evidently puzzled rather than pleased the audience, Mr. Converse's piece, which had been heard here before, came as a welcome relief. It has real melody and purpose, and its tone colors are beautiful rather than fantastic. But the gem of the concert was the Liszt "Mephisto Waltz," which Dr. Muck and his men rendered with delightful spirit and swing. A significant tribute was paid to the magic of this music. Just before it began, several of the critics left their seats to go down and hear the last half of the "Walküre"; but before they quite reached the door of the hall the siren strains of the Liszt music began, and they remained standing behind the rail till the echoes of the last bar had died away.

Boston Transcript

824 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

FRIDAY, MARCH 22, 1907

DR. MUCK REMAINS

It is the eminent fitness of Dr. Muck for his post as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra that makes the imperial clearing of the way for his continuance in it through another musical year the more welcome. With the hundred and more concerts that the orchestra gives each season, in and out of Boston, it is a post that asks long capacity for work and scrupulous conscientiousness in the doing of it. Dr. Muck has both these qualities, and the latter almost to excess. However long he may remain in Boston, no year's work can be as taxing as that of the season now nearing its end. From the beginning, in October, he has bent himself to the understanding of his orchestra and his public, and he has learned the temper of both more quickly than did any of his predecessors. In the same spirit, with each piece that he has put on his programme, he has re-marked the orchestral parts with his own indications of expression—a task of minute and exacting labor that a layman might hardly appreciate, and that repetitions of pieces already played under his guidance will diminish in succeeding years. His lamp, as his friends know, has often burned far into the morning while he worked at this revision, and time and again he has denied himself any distraction from it.

Our orchestra, long ago, attained a technical excellence and unity with which few bands in Europe and none in America may compare. It is necessary that each succeeding conductor shall have the "feeling" as painters say, for the qualities of tone, the euphony and the precision that are the audible tokens of this excellence. Dr. Muck quickly proved that he possessed that feeling, and, in spite of the misgivings that lingered for a while in some doubting quarters, he has maintained the technical qualities of the band at the familiar standard. More; he has made them the means to a finer elasticity and a larger and warmer pregnancy of expression than the orchestra has always attained in the past. He has made its voices, singly or in mass, more poignant, potent, and emotionally significant. By these tokens, he has proved himself a dramatic conductor, as the phrase goes, who imparts not only the substance and the form, but the mood, the spirit, the peculiar passion and individuality of the music that he plays. Yet his cooler traits of intellect and insight have steadily guided and ordered this imagination and responsive emotion, and thus he has united and held in balance the qualities that are essential to a conductor, who is to give forty-eight concerts in six months to a single public. He has worn well; he has ripened with the progress of the season, into ampler, finer, and more stirring achievements, and into a larger catholicity in the choice of his music. Throughout he has been all for his work and not at all for himself, except as the excellence of it was reward and praise, understanding and appreciation. He has won equally his men and his audiences, in the city that maintains the orchestra and in the cities that receive its visits gladly.

[167]

Paper Eagle
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

Dr. Muck to Stay.

It is greatly to be hoped that the report from Berlin concerning Dr. Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will prove true. This report is to the effect that the Emperor has consented to extend Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his post as director of the royal orchestra for another year, so that he may be able to continue his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is not because Dr. Muck's services are not needed in Berlin, but, according to the report, the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is maintained by Colonel Higginson as an educational force, and not as a source of revenue, was fully explained to the Emperor, and so pleased his Majesty that he was glad to contribute to the cause of musical culture here. He could not have made a finer contribution. As leader of the Boston orchestra, Dr. Muck is emphatically the right man in the right place. The oftener one hears him lead the more the power and breadth of the man as an interpretive musician, as well as his control of the splendidly disciplined band which Mr. Gericke turned over to him, become impressed upon the listener. The Boston Symphony has had many fine conductors, some strong in one direction and some in others, but certainly no man since Nikisch has so fully combined fire and strength with elegance and delicacy as does the present holder of the baton. We have been told that to-night would see the last appearance of Dr. Muck as conductor in Brooklyn. He will be all the more heartily welcomed to-night now that the prospect is excellent that he will come to us yet many times in the future. Dr. Muck ought to be an established American institution. Perhaps he may yet become so, if we will be a little patient. The Emperor of Germany has done many gracious things to America and Americans, but nothing more gracious or more helpful than this.

Paper Evening World
City New York
MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony.

THE programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was almost entirely modern, including Debussy's three orchestral sketches, called "The Sea," F. S. Converse's fantasy on Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's Mephisto Waltz and the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz.

The interest of the evening centred in the Debussy work, which was played here for the first time. It displays the peculiarities characteristic of this ultra-modern Frenchman—a leaning toward vagueness and a lack of stirring human emotions. Debussy is the Maeterlinck of musicians, and glories in the portrayal of indefinite and illusive vistas of tonal beauties, scorning the obvious melody and the persistence of any particular tonality. His music is a series of baffling and kaleidoscopic tone changes, surcharged with what we call "atmosphere" for want of a better word.

The three pieces are named "From Dawn to Noontide on the Ocean," "The Frolic of the Waves" and "The Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." With the constant use of the pentatonic or Oriental scale of five, and the frequent introduction of unusual passages for the reeds and muted trumpets, the effect produced was essentially eastern, and probably was descriptive of waves whispering or booming on the shores of Araby. Perhaps for this reason the New York audience received the work, splendidly interpreted as it was by Dr. Muck, with interest and attention, but not with enthusiasm. The taste for Debussy is an acquired one, and until next season, when we shall hear "Pelleas and Melisande," this public will not fall in line with the composer's ardent admirers in France. With fine judgment, Dr. Muck introduced next on the programme a composition by an American. F. S. Converse, of Boston, is the antithesis of Debussy, of Paris. "The Mystic Trumpeter" fantasy does not leave one in doubt as to its meaning. After reading the poem each episode and its mood is clearly, almost obviously, portrayed, with brilliant and effective orchestration and clever use of really original themes. Mr. Converse does not hesitate to use a strain of Marching Thro' Georgia in the war picture, and frequently becomes dangerously Wagnerian in his imposing climaxes. The Mephisto waltz of Liszt and Berlioz's "Carneval Romain" have been heard here several times. Dr. Muck gave intellectual and inspired readings of all the numbers, and the orchestra sustained its reputation for [illegible] and ensemble. The [illegible] as is usual

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA" AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

New but Unimpressive Composition Is Heard in New York for the First Time.

New York heard for the first time last night a new composition called "The Sea," and New York is probably wondering why yet. The work, played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, is by the most modern of modern Frenchmen, Debussy, and it consists of three orchestral sketches, which bear the titles "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea."

They have the distinction of being as nearly without themes as possible. The titles serve only as thin, weak pegs for the listener to hang his imagination upon, the music itself being sheerly moods that might mean a thousand things. Patches of tonal color spot the composer's canvas, and the thread of continuous idea is missing. Compared with this writing the most abstruse compositions of Richard Strauss are as primer stories to hear and to comprehend.

To the musician the compositions present opportunities for study, but to the average listener they suggest that they can only be classed as incidental music and that they cry for scenery and the theatre. Only an orchestra of virtuosi can possibly play these sketches, and even the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed in some of its departments to accomplish the task set before it.

The Debussy compositions were followed by "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestra fantasy by F. S. Converse, after Walt Whitman's poem. This has been heard here once before, and last night's hearing did not deepen the impression made by the work then. Liszt and Berlioz filled the remaining portion of the programme. Dr. Muck conducted with all the skill and artistic command he possesses.

Paper American
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

DR. MUCK HAS TWO CAUSES FOR JOY

Dr. Muck, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, was a proud man for two reasons. In the first place he took his orchestra through the mazes of a programme of the most difficult and intricate music, and in the next place he had just received from his imperial master, the War Lord of Germany, permission to stay another year in the highly cultivated atmosphere of Boston.

The concert began with three orchestral sketches called "The Sea," by Claude Debussy, given for the first time in New York. M. Debussy, in this group of descriptive tone poems, has contrived to break down every one of the old rules of harmony. In the order of progression of incomprehensibility, first comes Wagner; second, Strauss, and third, Debussy. He does not write for the person of ordinary, healthy mind, but for the ultra psychic creature, and even the most highly cultured of Boston's music lovers found Debussy almost unintelligible.

After all, the best description of his mysteriously involved music is to be found in his commentator's mysteriously involved description of it, which says: "There are times when his melody verges upon obviousness." Few of the auditors found even the verging places.

After a ten-minute intermission Converse's musical setting to Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," was beautifully played. This composition was a noteworthy example of sweeping, continuous harmony. Most generous applause followed the Converse fantasy.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz, were the other two numbers on the programme, the waltz having been made familiar here by Theodore Thomas.

The usual crowded house greeted the Bostonians. The programme for to-morrow afternoon's concert will include a Bach suite, a Haydn symphony, a Beethoven symphony and the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute."

Paper Herald
City New York
Date State N Y

DR. MUCK TO REMAIN.

The Kaiser Consents in the Interests of Musical Culture Here.

BERLIN, Thursday. — Emperor William some days ago gave his consent that Dr. Muck, director of the Royal Orchestra, who is now with Major Higginson in Boston, shall stay another year in the United States. Dr. Muck's absence from Berlin is greatly felt and the Emperor consented to his further stay abroad only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture.

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall.

SOME encouragement of the hope, long entertained, of the founding of a really representative American national music school may be said to have been afforded to musicians and lovers of music on this side of the Atlantic by the decided success that was achieved by Frederick P. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," opus 19 (based upon the poem of the same cognomen by Walt Whitman), which had its second actual presentation, but the first it has enjoyed under fully and perfectly competent auspices last evening at Carnegie Hall. The work was included by Dr. Karl Muck, the Berlin Royal Opera conductor, in the programme selected by him for the first concert of the series that will close the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season.

Coming as it did, the second of the evening's offerings, the Converse fantasy, proved a delightful and exhilarating relief from the bewildering chaos and dissonant jumble of the imported novelty that preceded it—Debussey's suite of orchestral sketches entitled "Le Mer," which was given its premiere in this city by the aggregation from the Hub.

Of both the French and American works careful, discriminating, withal very effective readings were given by the director from Prussia's capital. The Debussey suite is divided into three parts—I., "From Dawn Until Noon on the Ocean"; II., "Frolics of Waves"; III., "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." Any one of these, however, impresses more by the labyrinth of technical means employed than by true poetic results attained. Dawn, noon, wave frolics and sighing wind and moaning sea—these have inspired the Gallic composer with little of harmonic and nothing of melodic invention or utilization that the illimitable vastness of the Sahara Desert, the lofty heights of the Andes or the fastnesses of the Afric forests also might not have suggested in precisely the same manner and with resort to the same mere mechanical tricks that have produced the "sea sketches." Seldom, if ever, in the score is there absolute music substituted therefore is technique complicated to the extremest degree—a too concentrated essence of the psychic in music.

The composer of "The Mystic Trumpeter," on the contrary, at no time denies his hearers the benefit and pleasure—certainly their due—of logically, attractively formed music expression. His work abounds in dainty, bright effects that were well brought out by the Boston symphonists, while occasional intervals of lovely melody and a superbly built climax rounds out a tone poem in the veritable sense of that much abused phrase.

Liszt's Episode No. 2, from the Lenau "Faust," better known as the Mephisto Waltz, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" were the other numbers on Dr. Muck's programme. Both were performed with a verve and dash that captivated the very large audience present.

Paper Post
City New York
Date State N Y

Modern Music Via Boston.

Boston is a conservative town, musically speaking, but last night the Symphony Orchestra of that town came to Carnegie Hall and rendered a programme in which there was not even a faint scent of classicism. Debussy, the leader of the French secessionists, led off with three orchestral sketches entitled "The Sea," which were followed by Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." To-morrow afternoon the orchestra will play pieces by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. For the sake of contrast, one of the cardinal virtues of programmes, it would have been better to mix old and new at each concert.

"The Sea" of Debussy does not call for many words of comment. The three parts of which it is composed are entitled "From Dawn 'Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea"; but so far as any pictorial suggestiveness in them is concerned, they might as well have been entitled "On the Flat-iron Building," "Slumming in the Bowery," and "A Glimpse of Chinatown During a Raid." Debussy's music is the dreariest kind of rubbish; the Germans have two expressions which aptly characterize it: "Ein jämmerliches Machwerk," betraying a "trostlose Impotenz." Does anybody for a moment doubt that Debussy would not write such chaotic, meaningless, cacophonous, ungrammatical stuff if he could invent a melody like those of his great countrymen, Auber or Boieldieu, or even Herold or Adam? And this is the man who calls Gluck a pedantic, bombastic bore, and Wagner insipid, vacuous, and unsupportable; and who refers to Berlioz in these words: "He is an exception, a monster. He is not at all a musician; he gives one the illusion of music with his methods borrowed from literature and painting. Furthermore, I do not see much in him that is particularly French." In these words Debussy really describes himself. Nothing could be more remote from the true French spirit than his want of directness, lucidity, pattern, aim, and style. Even his orchestration is not particularly remarkable. Mr. Loeffler of Boston is far more original from this point of view.

After this dose of Debussy, which evidently puzzled rather than pleased the audience, Mr. Converse's piece, which had been heard here before, came as a welcome relief. It has real melody and purpose, and its tone colors are beautiful rather than fantastic. But the gem of the concert was the Liszt "Mephisto Waltz," which Dr. Muck and his men rendered with delightful spirit and swing. A significant tribute was paid to the magic of this music. Just before it began, several of the critics left their seats to go down and hear the last half of the "Walküre"; but before they quite reached the door of the hall the siren strains of the Liszt music began, and they remained standing behind the rail till the echoes of the last bar had died away.

Boston Transcript

WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

FRIDAY, MARCH 22, 1907

DR. MUCK REMAINS

It is the eminent fitness of Dr. Muck for his post as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra that makes the imperial clearing of the way for his continuance in it through another musical year the more welcome. With the hundred and more concerts that the orchestra gives each season, in and out of Boston, it is a post that asks long capacity for work and scrupulous conscientiousness in the doing of it. Dr. Muck has both these qualities, and the latter almost to excess. However long he may remain in Boston, no year's work can be as taxing as that of the season now nearing its end. From the beginning, in October, he has bent himself to the understanding of his orchestra and his public, and he has learned the temper of both more quickly than did any of his predecessors. In the same spirit, with each piece that he has put on his programme, he has re-marked the orchestral parts with his own indications of expression —a task of minute and exacting labor that a layman might hardly appreciate, and that repetitions of pieces already played under his guidance will diminish in succeeding years. His lamp, as his friends know, has often burned far into the morning while he worked at this revision, and time and again he has denied himself any distraction from it.

Our orchestra, long ago, attained a technical excellence and unity with which few bands in Europe and none in America may compare. It is necessary that each succeeding nductor shall have the "feeling" as painters say, for the qualities of tone, the euphony and the precision that are the audible tokens of this excellence. Dr. Muck quickly proved that he possessed that feeling, and, in spite of the misgivings that lingered for a while in some doubting quarters, he has maintained the technical qualities of the band at the familiar standard. More; he has made them the means to a finer elasticity and a larger and warmer pregnancy of expression than the orchestra has always attained in the past. He has made its voices, singly or in mass, more poignant, potent, and emotionally significant. By these tokens, he has proved himself a dramatic conductor, as the phrase goes, who imparts not only the substance and the form, but the mood, the spirit, the peculiar passion and individuality of the music that he plays. Yet his cooler traits of intellect and insight have steadily guided and ordered this imagination and responsive emotion, and thus he has united and held in balance the qualities that are essential to a conductor, who is to give forty-eight concerts in six months to a single public. He has worn well; he has ripened with the progress of the season, into ampler, finer, and more stirring achievements, and into a larger catholicity in the choice of his music. Throughout he has been all for his work and not at all for himself, except as the excellence of it was reward and praise, understanding and appreciation. He has won equally his men and his audiences, in the city that maintains the orchestra and in the cities that receive its visits gladly.

[167]

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PAYS LAST VISIT

Its Concert in Carnegie Hall Devoted to Modern Music.

IN DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA"

First Performance Here of His Latest Work for Orchestra — Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" Given.

When Dr. Muck announced his first programmes for his season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even before he came to this country last Autumn, there was an ominous shaking of heads. He was too conservative; he was imagining that this barbarous country needed education in the musical classics. Whether he changed this opinion or never held it, he has surely not acted upon it so far as his New York programmes are concerned. The orchestra is making its fifth and last visit to New York, and the summary of the music given this season as it is displayed in the programme book shows a large preponderance of music that is included in the widest definition of the term "modern." The programme of last evening's concert was made up entirely of such music in its most uncompromising form, from Berlioz and Liszt to Debussy and F. S. Converse. It was a mistake, for a whole evening of such music without the more lucid and substantial strains of what was mentioned in the programme book as "the elder codes" wearies and satiates.

Weariness and satiety set in early in the orchestral piece of Claude Debussy entitled "The Sea," which began the programme. This set of three "orchestral sketches," as the composer calls them, is the latest work for orchestra that appears in the list of his productions; and, though it is dated two years back, it may be assumed to represent the present stage in the development of one who has been called the cleverest of the contemporaneous French school. But "The Sea" is likely to cause perplexity if not dismay to many who have admired his earlier music, and who see in it whither his methods of mannerisms are leading him.

The "sketches" are entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." They are meant to be, evidently, impressionistic depictions of sound, of sights and sounds and sensations, vague and indefinable, perhaps, as to outline, but summoning up the essential quality of the sea. His signal failure in this, his failure to attain any real suggestiveness except in a few passages, or to convey any charm, is all the more striking after his signal success in such pieces as "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Three Nocturnes that have been several times heard here. There is beauty in them, intangible, to be sure, but of a searching kind; imagination, glimpses, now dim and shadowy, now sharp, though fleeting, of things seen and heard in an inner vision.

But "The Sea" is persistently ugly, in its substance as well as in its orchestral investiture, which with Debussy are so nearly one, and it is prosaic in its reiteration of inert formulas of melodic and harmonic progression that are no longer filled with creative imagination. He fails to give any impression of the sea, either in mood or in pictorial suggestion. There is nothing of its vastness, of its mystery, of its tranquility, next to nothing of its turbulence or of its broad sweep. There is more of barnyard cackle in it than anything else. There is not much of Debussy's delicacy, richness, or subtlety of orchestration any longer discernible here. A mania for stopped horns, stopped trumpets, the staccato crepitation of oboes, seems to have seized him. There are patches of color now and again, and some sweeping phrases in a true instrumental idiom, but they are fleeting, and they lead nowhere.

The audience was so bewildered after the first sketch that it almost forgot its manners, but there was polite clapping of the hands after the others, and, so far as a wonderfully skillful performance of a difficult and thankless task was concerned, it was well deserved.

Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," which he composed two or three years ago, was given here last Spring; or was more or less lamely attempted. It was magnificently played last evening, and its strength as music and as a delineation of what Walt Whitman has put into his poem was amply set forth. It is full of imagination, and of a sustained power of musical expression, and it shows Mr. Converse at his best. It is not to be denied that there are passages that sound commonplace where he has not maintained the height of his inspiration. It may be doubted whether his representation of "arm'd men hastening" has not a little too much easy realism. But the finer sections of his work are finely felt and strongly knit, and it is music that is a credit to the school to which it belongs.

Mr. Converse puts a difficult and perilous task upon the trumpeter, who met it with success almost complete. Likewise wonderfully brilliant was the performance of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," that had been heard here before this Winter, but with a difference, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" is a piece in which the orchestra can revel.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

CLAUDE DEBUSSY SAILS ON A TROUBLED SEA.

Three New Orchestral Sketches by the Impressionistic French Composer—The Audience Seems to Be Somewhat Puzzled—Berlioz Sounds Good to It.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that there was no soloist there was a large audience. The programme consisted of three new orchestral sketches by Debussy grouped under the general title of "The Sea." Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," the Mephisto waltz from Liszt's episodes of Lenau's Faust and Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" overture.

The Debussy composition is in three parts. They have these descriptive titles: "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and the Sea." The first of these three parts so amazed the audience that there was hardly any applause at its conclusion. The fact is that the audience did not seem to know just when the end had been reached, for certainly no hearer could keep track of the tonality of such a work.

The second movement of the three is the clearest and most intelligible in its tone painting. But if Mr. Debussy would go and sit him down in the Neue Pinakothek at Munich in front of Arnold Böcklin's "Sport in the Waves" he would learn a good deal about the effective union of breadth and expression in pure line with a rich color scheme and a transparent and coherent harmony.

Mr. Debussy is a man of indisputable talent, and his mastery of the technics of orchestral is exceptional even in these days when every composer is expected to have perfect command of instrumentation. Furthermore his purpose is perfectly recognizable. He endeavors to avoid the old processes of thematic proposition and discussion and to substitute for them a plan of harmonic illustration with instrumental painting superimposed upon it.

His music is the logical outgrowth of the school of impressionistic composition. Mr. Debussy's artistic forerunners sought to employ the older processes but to add to them a pretentiously complicated scheme of harmonic expression and a palette of tonal color, of which the tendency was to substitute tints for form. It would be idle to deny that composition along these lines has certain possibilities. But when a composer abolishes from his outfit all the elementary units which have existed in music since its inception as an art form, when he kicks the diatonic scale into the street and puts his curse upon the major triad he asks us to give up all those points of basic structure on which we have been accustomed to rest our troubled souls.

Just why Dr. Muck should have put himself to the trouble of rehearsing these three cacophonous examples of morbidity it is impossible to explain. The second had a certain charm and bizarre fascination, but the three gave the impression of no one of the seven seas known to man. Mr. Debussy's sea is not even that over which the dawn comes up like thunder. It is more like the unexplored Saragossa Sea, full of decay and mystery and unknown horrors. Debussy can write and has written more inspiring things.

The orchestra played these three sea pictures wonderfully, and yet there were more technical slips than the Boston men have made in all the winter gone. The first trumpet and the first horn were both full of trouble, but the former reserved his choicest breaks for the Converse composition. There was nothing mystic about this particular trumpeter. He was prosaic to distraction.

The Converse work does not wear very well. It seemed at its first hearing to give promise of lasting attraction, but last night its arid spaces stood out strongly and it proved to be [illegible] a trifle wearisome. After all this the Berlioz overture certainly did sound good.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The Boston Symphony Quartette," of which Professor Wiley Hess is the first violin, gave a most attractive concert yesterday at Mendelssohn Hall. The most valuable portion of the programme was the Debussy Quartette, which was, as quartette music, as original and delicately conceived as it was artistically and poetically executed.

The literature of quartette music is not a very rich one, and the ablest composers of latter days have not written much in this style that excites the interest of modern audiences, but Claude Debussy has certainly shown that it is possible to write modern music for quar[illegible] directly and under

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Players in Concert.

De Bussey's "The Sea," a series of three orchestral pieces, was the chief novelty at the Boston Symphony concert last evening in Carnegie Hall, the other numbers of the programme being F. S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Lisst's "Mephisto" waltz and the overture "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz—all modern works.

It was not a scheme to merit entire approval, nor did it give unalloyed pleasure to the audience. Not one of the classical composers was represented—in fact, the programme of the musical feast lacked the main dish, the roast.

Dr. Karl Muck conducted the concert with authority and distinction. There is great economy of gesture in his method; he is dignified and obtains all his effects with ease. A fortissimo passage causes him no effort and his conducting is a profitable study, for notwithstanding his true comprehension of the modern romantic type of composition he has a certain austerity of manner.

Debussey's work bears the sub-titles "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea." It is a very interesting composition, which, paradoxically, contains no continuous melody, and the harmony changes so frequently that the listener is in a maze. His harmonic effects, though, are often very beautiful and surprising, and the composition abounds in chaste and delicate orchestral effects. The performance under Dr. Muck was everything that could be desired, but only scant applause followed.

Mr. Converse's piece is written to illustrate Walt Whitman's poem "The Mystic Trumpeter." It is a cleverly designed work, containing several beautiful melodies. It lacks continuity, and, although it has outline and color in abundance, symmetry and the perfect picture are lacking. The composer has at his command brilliant orchestration, especially as regards the brass instruments, effective climaxes and the inventive faculty, but the interest was not maintained, mere music making being obvious, even though the themes were treated with much dexterity.

Special mention must be made of the artistic manner in which Mr. Willy Hess played the beautiful violin melody in the first movement. The performance of the whole work, too, was magnificent. The remaining numbers, by Liszt and Berlioz, call for no special remark, their rendering being such as the Boston Orchestra has accustomed us to.

Paper Press
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Debussy Music by Boston Players.

Special interest in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall—the fifth and last evening performance of the season—centred in a new work by Debussy, a man whose originality and individuality of utterance are recognized generally, even by those who do not find his music to their taste. The composition brought forward (to the horror no doubt of a few critics obstinately opposed to anything they fail to comprehend) was a set of three "orchestral sketches" comprised under the name of "The Sea." They were strange, haunting tone paintings, exquisite in suggestiveness, delicious in effect, for those at least who have an ear for unaccustomed combinations of sounds.

After a single hearing of such unusual music impressions must be somewhat vague. It may be doubted, moreover, whether the Frenchman is anxious to convey such clearly defined messages as Richard Strauss seeks to attain in his tone-poems. But vague impressions are not to be scoffed at, provided they exercise an influence upon the emotions. Indeed, the very quality that raises music above other arts is its elusiveness.

Thus it is with these three sketches, called respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." Though their influence upon the senses defies analysis, it is none the less real and delightful. Debussy's art is essentially different from that of any living composer. His effects seldom are produced by melody, in the usually understood sense of the word, though there are moments in "The Sea" when something akin to melody is lifted above the kaleidoscopically shifting orchestral tints. His themes, unimportant in themselves, are distinguished by their movement, outline, rhythm and harmonic association, not by their innate expressiveness. There is little polyphony. Such a thing as definite tonality is deliberately avoided, and even the mode frequently is uncertain. Throwing aside what has been considered the fundamental and indispensable grammar of music, this remarkable Frenchman accomplishes his end chiefly through harmonic colors, instrumental tints, movement and rhythm. Simply wonderful are the imagination and fertility of invention he shows in orchestration. But cleverness does not account for this music. It not only conveys fantastic pictures of the scenes it represents, but gives to those pictures an emotional tinge that is personal. We hear the sea, see it, feel it, in listening to this masterpiece. Debussy presents orchestral images that are far from abstract in their effect. There are the huge heave and fall of the ocean, now calm, now fretful, the crashing of waves, the whistling of the wind and the varied struggles between the elements.

Were we to give preference to any of the sketches, the second would come first to mind. The work, as a whole, must be set down as one of the most original efforts by a living composer. It was played under Muck's leadership with technical mastery and a beautiful sympathy for its poetic contents.

The other numbers on the programme were Converse's admirable orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter" (opus 19), which the New Music Society of America presented for the first time in New York last year; the second episode from Liszt's setting of Lenau's "Faust" and Berlioz's overture "Carneval Romain." Dr. Muck showed his bigness as a leader and interpreter throughout the programme.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON QUARTET'S MUSICAL MATINÉE

Visiting Instrumentalists Play Delightfully During an Afternoon's Programme in Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its third concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. The string instruments were heard in a quartet by Mr. Claude Debussy, a rambling composition, rather bare of melodic interest, but very well scored. It was excellently interpreted by the four artists—Messrs. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emil Ferir and Heinrich Warnke.

Schubert's beautiful trio in B flat was a welcome relief after the Debussy quartet, and its clear and fascinating themes probably never sounded better than on the present occasion. Mme. Katherine Goodson played the piano part with discrimination and effectiveness.

The concert finished with a capital performance of Mozart's noble quintet for clarinet and strings, in which the members of the quartet had the assistance of Mr. Georges Grisez. The larghetto was exquisitely played, and Mr. Grisez's fine technique and power of imparting tone color made its performance particularly enjoyable.

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the final one of its present series of chamber music concerts yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The programme began with a Debussy quartet, and it brought to mind, if not to ear, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which occurred the night before, and at which a marvelously incoherent set of compositions by Debussy were performed.

Following Debussy came a Schubert number which enlisted the services of Katherine Goodson, a pianiste, who played in New York for the first time. The work was the Trio, Op. 99, and the pianist proved to be a very clear player, technically well equipped and one who has a keen sense for ensemble values. The concluding number was Mozart's quintet for strings and a clarinet, and the assisting artist was George Grisez, who played exquisitely. The playing of the Quartet still invites criticism in that it seems to betray a tendency on the part of its members to play solo.

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Mme. Katharine Goodson Plays Charmingly in Shubert's Trio.

The Boston Symphony Quartet at its third and last concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon followed the lead of its parent organization in putting the name of Claude Debussy first upon its programme. The Frenchman's string quartet had been heard here before, but seldom, and yet it is more worth hearing than his latest symphonic piece that was played the evening before. It is more musical and is a more lucid and consecutive presentation of really musical ideas. They are couched in the formulas of the French school, and they are slight, but there is charm and an individual atmosphere in the work, especially in the two middle movements, a scherzo-like allegro and an andantino. In the former is developed a strongly rhythmed theme that appears in different guises, according to the custom of the modern French, in the other movements of the quartet. The composition requires the utmost precision in ensemble and accuracy of intonation for its effect, and both present difficulties that were not wholly overcome by Mr. Hess and his associates.

In the second number, Schubert's piano trio in B flat, Mme. Katharine Goodson was introduced to this public, an English pianist who has won admiration elsewhere as a solo player, and who here showed the most charming qualities in ensemble performance. There was much spirit and buoyancy under the restraint with which she fitted her performance in with string players, toward whom she was exactly the right relation, and she played with crisp fluency and delicately [illegible] feeling. The programme contained as final number Mozart's quintet for clarinet and strings, in which Mr. Georges Grisez of the Boston orchestra played the clarinet part skillfully. Mozart has obtained entrancing tonal effects in his union of the wind instrument with the strings, and the work is one of serene and [illegible] beauty. It was played with [illegible] elation.

[168]

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PAYS LAST VISIT

Its Concert in Carnegie Hall Devoted to Modern Music.

IN DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA"

First Performance Here of His Latest Work for Orchestra — Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" Given.

When Dr. Muck announced his first programmes for his season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even before he came to this country last Autumn, there was an ominous shaking of heads. He was too conservative; he was imagining that this barbarous country needed education in the musical classics. Whether he changed this opinion or never held it, he has surely not acted upon it so far as his New York programmes are concerned. The orchestra is making its fifth and last visit to New York, and the summary of the music given this season as it is displayed in the programme book shows a large preponderance of music that is included in the widest definition of the term "modern." The programme of last evening's concert was made up entirely of such music in its most uncompromising form, from Berlioz and Liszt to Debussy and F. S. Converse. It was a mistake, for a whole evening of such music without the more lucid and substantial strains of what was mentioned in the programme book as "the elder codes" wearies and satiates.

Weariness and satiety set in early in the orchestral piece of Claude Debussy entitled "The Sea," which began the programme. This set of three "orchestral sketches," as the composer calls them, is the latest work for orchestra that appears in the list of his productions; and, though it is dated two years back, it may be assumed to represent the present stage in the development of one who has been called the cleverest of the contemporaneous French school. But "The Sea" is likely to cause perplexity if not dismay to many who have admired his earlier music, and who see in it whither his methods of mannerisms are leading him.

The "sketches" are entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves," "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." They are meant to be, evidently, impressionistic depictions of sound, of sights and sounds and sensations, vague and indefinable, perhaps, as to outline, but summoning up the essential quality of the sea. His signal failure in this, his failure to attain any real suggestiveness except in a few passages, or to convey any charm, is all the more striking after his signal success in such pieces as "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Three Nocturnes that have been several times heard here. There is beauty in them, intangible, to be sure, but of a searching kind; imagination, glimpses, now dim and shadowy, now sharp, though fleeting, of things seen and heard in an inner vision.

But "The Sea" is persistently ugly, in its substance as well as in its orchestral investiture, which with Debussy are so nearly one, and it is prosaic in its reiteration of inert formulas of melodic and harmonic progression that are no longer filled with creative imagination. He fails to give any impression of the sea, either in mood or in pictorial suggestion. There is nothing of its vastness, of its mystery, of its tranquility, next to nothing of its turbulence or of its broad sweep. There is more of barnyard cackle in it than anything else. There is not much of Debussy's delicacy, richness, or subtlety of orchestration any longer discernible here. A mania for stopped horns, stopped trumpets, the staccato crepitation of oboes, seems to have seized him. There are patches of color now and again, and some sweeping phrases in a true instrumental idiom, but they are fleeting, and they lead nowhere.

The audience was so bewildered after the first sketch that it almost forgot its manners, but there was polite clapping of the hands after the others, and, so far as a wonderfully skillful performance of a difficult and thankless task was concerned, it was well deserved.

Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," which he composed two or three years ago, was given here last Spring; or was more or less lamely attempted. It was magnificently played last evening, and its strength as music and as a delineation of what Walt Whitman has put into his poem was amply set forth. It is full of imagination, and of a sustained power of musical expression, and it shows Mr. Converse at his best. It is not to be denied that there are passages that sound commonplace where he has not maintained the height of his inspiration. It may be doubted whether his representation of "arm'd men hastening" has not a little too much easy realism. But the finer sections of his work are finely felt and strongly knit, and it is music that is a credit to the school to which it belongs.

Mr. Converse puts a difficult and perilous task upon the trumpeter, who met it with success almost complete. Likewise wonderfully brilliant was the performance of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," that had been heard here before this Winter, but with a difference, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" is a piece in which the orchestra can revel.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

CLAUDE DEBUSSY SAILS ON A TROUBLED SEA.

Three New Orchestral Sketches by the Impressionistic French Composer—The Audience Seems to Be Somewhat Puzzled—Berlioz Sounds Good to It.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that there was no soloist there was a large audience. The programme consisted of three new orchestral sketches by Debussy grouped under the general title of "The Sea." Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," the Mephisto waltz from Liszt's episodes of Lenau's Faust and Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" overture.

The Debussy composition is in three parts. They have these descriptive titles: "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and the Sea." The first of these three parts so amazed the audience that there was hardly any applause at its conclusion. The fact is that the audience did not seem to know just when the end had been reached, for certainly no hearer could keep track of the tonality of such a work.

The second movement of the three is the clearest and most intelligible in its tone painting. But if Mr. Debussy would go and sit him down in the Neue Pinakothek at Munich in front of Arnold Böcklin's "Sport in the Waves" he would learn a good deal about the effective union of breadth and expression in pure line with a rich color scheme and a transparent and coherent harmony.

Mr. Debussy is a man of indisputable talent, and his mastery of the technics of orchestral is exceptional even in these days when every composer is expected to have perfect command of instrumentation. Furthermore his purpose is perfectly recognizable. He endeavors to avoid the old processes of thematic proposition and discussion and to substitute for them a plan of harmonic illustration with instrumental painting superimposed upon it.

His music is the logical outgrowth of the school of impressionistic composition. Mr. Debussy's artistic forerunners sought to employ the older processes but to add to them a pretentiously complicated scheme of harmonic expression and a palette of tonal color, of which the tendency was to substitute tints for form. It would be idle to deny that composition along these lines has certain possibilities. But when a composer abolishes from his outfit all the elementary units which have existed in music since its inception as an art form, when he kicks the diatonic scale into the street and puts his curse upon the major triad he asks us to give up all those points of basic structure on which we have been accustomed to rest our troubled souls.

Just why Dr. Muck should have put himself to the trouble of rehearsing these three cacophonous examples of morbidity it is impossible to explain. The second had a certain charm and bizarre fascination, but the three gave the impression of no one of the seven seas known to man. Mr. Debussy's sea is not even that over which the dawn comes up like thunder. It is more like the unexplored Saragossa Sea, full of decay and mystery and unknown horrors. Debussy can write and has written more inspiring things.

The orchestra played these three sea pictures wonderfully, and yet there were more technical slips than the Boston men have made in all the winter gone. The first trumpet and the first horn were both full of trouble, but the former reserved his choicest breaks for the Converse composition. There was nothing mystic about this particular trumpeter. He was prosaic to distraction.

The Converse work does not wear very well. It seemed at its first hearing to give promise of lasting attraction, but last night its arid spaces stood out strongly and it proved to be just a trifle wearisome. After all this the Berlioz overture certainly did sound good.

Paper Telegraph
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The Boston Symphony Quartette, of which Professor Wiley Hess is the first violin, gave a most attractive concert yesterday at Mendelssohn Hall. The most valuable portion of the programme was the Debussy Quartette, which was, as quartette music, as original and delicately conceived as it was artistically and poetically executed.

The literature of quartette music is not a very rich one, and the ablest composers of latter days have not written much in this style that excites the interest of modern audiences, but Claude Debussy has certainly shown that it is possible to write modern music for quartettes that will appeal directly and undeniably to modern taste.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

Boston Players in Concert.

De Bussey's "The Sea," a series of three orchestral pieces, was the chief novelty at the Boston Symphony concert last evening in Carnegie Hall, the other numbers of the programme being F. S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the overture "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz—all modern works.

It was not a scheme to merit entire approval, nor did it give unalloyed pleasure to the audience. Not one of the classical composers was represented—in fact, the programme of the musical feast lacked the main dish, the roast.

Dr. Karl Muck conducted the concert with authority and distinction. There is great economy of gesture in his method; he is dignified and obtains all his effects with ease. A fortissimo passage causes him no effort and his conducting is a profitable study, for notwithstanding his true comprehension of the modern romantic type of composition he has a certain austerity of manner.

Debussey's work bears the sub-titles "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea." It is a very interesting composition, which, paradoxically, contains no continuous melody, and the harmony changes so frequently that the listener is in a maze. His harmonic effects, though, are often very beautiful and surprising, and the composition abounds in chaste and delicate orchestral effects. The performance under Dr. Muck was everything that could be desired, but only scant applause followed.

Mr. Converse's piece is written to illustrate Walt Whitman's poem "The Mystic Trumpeter." It is a cleverly designed work, containing several beautiful melodies. It lacks continuity, and, although it has outline and color in abundance, symmetry and the perfect picture are lacking. The composer has at his command brilliant orchestration, especially as regards the brass instruments, effective climaxes and the inventive faculty, but the interest was not maintained, mere music making being obvious, even though the themes were treated with much dexterity.

Special mention must be made of the artistic manner in which Mr. Willy Hess played the beautiful violin melody in the first movement. The performance of the whole work, too, was magnificent. The remaining numbers, by Liszt and Berlioz, call for no special remark, their rendering being such as the Boston Orchestra has accustomed us to.

Paper Press
City New York
Date MAR 22 1907 State N Y

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Debaussy Music by Boston Players.

Special interest in last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall—the fifth and last evening performance of the season—centred in a new work by Debussy, a man whose originality and individuality of utterance are recognized generally, even by those who do not find his music to their taste. The composition brought forward (to the horror no doubt of a few critics obstinately opposed to anything they fail to comprehend) was a set of three "orchestral sketches" comprised under the name of "The Sea." They were strange, haunting tone paintings, exquisite in suggestiveness, delicious in effect, for those at least who have an ear for unaccustomed combinations of sounds.

After a single hearing of such unusual music impressions must be somewhat vague. It may be doubted, moreover, whether the Frenchman is anxious to convey such clearly defined messages as Richard Strauss seeks to attain in his tone-poems. But vague impressions are not to be scoffed at, provided they exercise an influence upon the emotions. Indeed, the very quality that raises music above other arts is its elusiveness.

Thus it is with these three sketches, called respectively "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," "Frolics of Waves" and "Dialogue of Wind and Sea." Though their influence upon the senses defies analysis, it is none the less real and delightful. Debussy's art is essentially different from that of any living composer. His effects seldom are produced by melody, in the usually understood sense of the word, though there are moments in "The Sea" when something akin to melody is lifted above the kaleidoscopically shifting orchestral tints. His themes, unimportant in themselves, are distinguished by their movement, outline, rhythm and harmonic association, not by their innate expressiveness. There is little polyphony. Such a thing as definite tonality is deliberately avoided, and even the mode frequently is uncertain. Throwing aside what has been considered the fundamental and indispensable grammar of music, this remarkable Frenchman accomplishes his end chiefly through harmonic colors, instrumental tints, movement and rhythm. Simply wonderful are the imagination and fertility of invention he shows in orchestration. But cleverness does not account for this music. It not only conveys fantastic pictures of the scenes it represents, but gives to those pictures an emotional tinge that is personal. We hear the sea, see it, feel it, in listening to this masterpiece. Debussy presents orchestral images that are far from abstract in their effect. There are the huge heave and fall of the ocean, now calm, now fretful, the crashing of waves, the whistling of the wind and the varied struggles between the elements.

Were we to give preference to any of the sketches, the second would come first to mind. The work, as a whole, must be set down as one of the most original efforts by a living composer. It was played under Muck's leadership with technical mastery and a beautiful sympathy for its poetic contents.

The other numbers on the programme were Converse's admirable orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (opus 19), which the New Music Society of America presented for the first time in New York last year; the second episode from Liszt's setting of Lenau's "Faust" and Berlioz's overture "Carneval Romain." Dr. Muck showed his bigness as a leader and interpreter throughout the programme.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON QUARTET'S MUSICAL MATINEE

Visiting Instrumentalists Play Delightfully During an Afternoon's Programme in Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its third concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. The string instruments were heard in a quartet by Mr. Claude Debussy, a rambling composition, rather bare of melodic interest, but very well scored. It was excellently interpreted by the four artists—Messrs. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emil Ferir and Heinrich Warnke.

Schubert's beautiful trio in B flat was a welcome relief after the Debussy quartet, and its clear and fascinating themes probably never sounded better than on the present occasion. Mme. Katherine Goodson played the piano part with discrimination and effectiveness.

The concert finished with a capital performance of Mozart's noble quintet for clarinet and strings, in which the members of the quartet had the assistance of Mr. Georges Grisez. The larghetto was exquisitely played, and Mr. Grisez's fine technique and power of imparting tone color made its performance particularly enjoyable.

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the final one of its present series of chamber music concerts yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The programme began with a Debussy quartet, and it brought to mind, if not to ear, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which occurred the night before, and at which a marvelously incoherent set of compositions by Debussy were performed.

Following Debussy came a Schubert number which enlisted the services of Katherine Goodson, a pianiste, who played in New York for the first time. The work was the Trio, Op. 99, and the pianist proved to be a very clean player, technically well equipped and one who has a keen sense for ensemble values. The concluding number was Mozart's quintet for strings and a clarinet, and the assisting artist was George Grisez, who played exquisitely. The playing of the Quartet still invites criticism in that it seems to betray a tendency on the part of its members to play solo.

Paper Times
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Mme. Katharine Goodson Plays Charmingly in Shubert's Trio.

The Boston Symphony Quartet at its third and last concert in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon followed the lead of its parent organization in putting the name of Claude Debussy first upon its programme. The Frenchman's string quartet had been heard here before, but seldom, and yet it is more worth hearing than his latest symphonic piece that was played the evening before. It is more musical and is a more lucid and consecutive presentation of really musical ideas. They are couched in the formulas of the French school, and they are slight, but there is charm and an individual atmosphere in the work, especially in the two middle movements, a scherzo-like allegro and an andantino. In the former is developed a strongly rhythmed theme that appears in different guises, according to the custom of the modern French, in the other movements of the quartet. The composition requires the utmost precision in ensemble and accuracy of intonation for its effect, and both present difficulties that were not wholly overcome by Mr. Hess and his associates.

In the second number, Schubert's piano trio in B flat, Mme. Katharine Goodson was introduced to this public, an English pianist who has won admiration elsewhere as a solo player, and who here showed the most charming qualities in ensemble performance. There was much spirit and buoyancy under the restraint with which she fitted her performance in with string players, toward whom she was in exactly the right relation, and she played with crisp fluency and delicately poetic feeling. The programme contained as its final number Mozart's quintet for clarinet and strings, in which Mr. Georges Grisez of the Boston orchestra played the clarinet part skillfully. Mozart has obtained entrancing tonal effects in his union of the wind instrument with the strings, and the work is one of serene and uplifted beauty. It was played with full appreciation.

[168].

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

C AND THE OPERA

DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA"

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

BOSTON, March 3, 1907.

FOR a certain small but (let us hope) honorable minority in the world of music, the emergence of a new work by the Frenchman Claude Debussy is an artistic event of prime importance. Within a few years this singular tone-poet has impressed himself upon the minds of those who are more concerned with music as a living voice than as a completed record, as one of the three most interesting living musicians—and the word is used here in its important, its creative sense. We have already discussed in this place, at some length, the art of Debussy in its general aspects, so it would be superfluous to advert now to its characteristics. It may be as well to recall, however, that until the present season Debussy has been known to the musical public of this country as the composer of but two works for orchestra: the "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune" (after the poem of Mallarmé); and the three "Nocturnes." We had not heard his "Danse Sacrée" and "Danse Profane" (for chromatic harp or piano with orchestra), or his newest and most imposing instrumental utterance: the "Trois Esquisses Symphoniques"—as he calls them—"La Mer." These "sketches," published in 1905, were produced at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, on October 15 of that year, under M. Camille Chevillard's direction. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, performed them last night at Symphony Hall for the first time in America. The performance would have delighted the fastidious and hyper-sensitive Debussy, for it was in the last degree revealing and eloquent. Seldom has this astonishing orchestra so covered itself with glory as in its exposition of this fantastic, perturbing, whimsical, and most exacting score—one of the most unconfined and unpredictable essays in orchestral writing that have ever been put upon paper. Dr. Muck's reading was exquisitely lucid, yet admirably plastic and imaginative.

It is doubtful if the music made a very definite impression upon many of those who heard it; for it is nothing if not elusive, and it wears none of the hall-marks which long convention has associated with music which assumes to express the sea. It has none of the expected furies and obvious calms of the traditional seascape—how well one knows the precise orchestral methods by which the average music-maker will depict his waves and tempests, his moderating winds, and the long roll and swell of his waves! There are prescriptions—do we not all know them?—for denoting easily the shriek of the gale (chromatic runs in the wood wind); the swirl and roar of the storm (pompous figures in the brass under string tremolos); recovered gladness and serenity (an evenly rhythmed and gliding passage for the horns). These things are as unvarying, as inevitable, as painfully cliché, as the oboe and muted strings of the pastoral, the diatonic trombone harmonies of the chorale. Debussy, unostentatiously and without affectation, has eschewed them. He has contemplated his theme from a wholly novel standpoint, a standpoint unobstructed by tradition or prepossession. To begin with, he has chosen for expression phases of the subject whose freshness and novelty of suggestion strike one at once. His "three sketches" are thus entitled: (1) "De l'aube à midi sur la mer"; (2) "Jeux de vagues"; (3) "Dialogue du vent et de la mer." They are scored for a full, though not an unusual, orchestra; in the second movement ("Jeux de vagues"), a célesta is named as an alternative for the glockenspiel, and the former and more delicate instrument was used last night with delicious effect. One's first impression of this music, as has been said, is of the manner in which it diverges from the too-familiar seascapes of orchestral tradition. We are not reminded, in listening to "La Mer," of the sea as it appealed to the imagination of Rimsky-Korsakoff, of Wagner, of Rubinstein, of Mendelssohn, of MacDowell. Nor is it the sea as Swinburne knew it—a sea which, as the echo of it lives in his verse, said W. E. Henley, convinces one of "its vastness and vehemency, the rapture of its inspiration, the palpitating, many-twinkling miracle of its light." Nor is it the thunderous and surging sea of Whitman—the sea "of brooding scowl and murk, of unloosed hurricanes"—that has quickened his spirit. The sea does not speak to him "with husky, haughty lips," as it did to that musician who uttered supremely its moods of sinister and terrible beauty, its majesty no less than its awe, its exhilaration no less than its allurement. For Debussy the sea is wholly a thing of dreams, a thing vaguely yet rhapsodically perceived, a bodiless thing, a thing of shapes that are gaunt or lovely, wayward or capricious; visions that are full of bodement, or fitful, or passionately insistent: but that always pertain to a supra-mundane world, a region altogether of the spirit. It is a sea which has its shifting and lucent surfaces, which even shimmers and traditionally mocks. But it is a sea that is shut away from too-curious an inspection, to whose murmurs or imperious commands few have needed to pay heed; a sea whose eternal sonorities and immutable enchantments are hidden behind veils that open to few, and to none who attend without, it may be, a certain rapt and curious eagerness.

From an exclusively musical standpoint, "The Sea" is cast in a mould that differs rather strikingly from that which shaped the inspiration of Debussy's earlier orchestral writing. At the risk of being misunderstood, one is moved to say of it that it is more vigorous, more emphatic in accent, more dynamically various. It is less fluid in movement, less shadowy in profile, than the Mallarmé piece or the "Nocturnes": it has, musically, a more obvious body. One does not mean to imply by this that it owns more admirable traits than its predecessors: we are not exalting mere energy, mere dynamic effectiveness, at the expense of a static beauty and eloquence—indeed, this music seems, because of its greater palpability, less characteristically a product of Debussy's brain than does such earlier writing of his as the "Nocturnes" or "Pelléas et Mélisande." Yet it is unmistakably his: it is full of his rich flavor, and it grips and sways the imagination in an exceeding degree. Structurally, it is crowded with exquisite and ingenious detail, and it is put upon the orchestra with a resourcefulness, a variety and fertility of invention, a sensitiveness, a restraint, a mastery of effect, both interior and external, that compel fervent praise.

As Mr. Philip Hale has remarked, to those who have amusingly charged Debussy with a lack of "virility" this music is a complete answer; yet it was an answer that need not have been made, at least as a rejoinder; for such a thing as his earlier "Nuages," evanescent and shadowy as it is, is yet not less truly "virile" because it is less firmly articulated. There is a virility of the spirit which rather avoids than seeks emphatic utterance.

A characteristic Portrait of Dr. Karl Muck
CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

MUSICAL.

Last Concert of Boston Orchestra Largely Attended—Dr. Muck to Conduct Next Season.

Three orchestral numbers made up the programme of the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night, and the series closed as it began, without the assistance of any solo feature. Dr. Muck conducted with even more distinction than he has thus far shown in the rendering of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, Liszt's Second Episode (Mephisto Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust," and the Tschaikowsky Symphony, No 6 in B minor, commonly known as the "Pathetic." Presenting no element of novelty in the ordinary sense, each of these works represents a pronounced individualism in musical thought that has had a large influence in proclaiming the exalted mission of music.

So far as Brooklyn is concerned the Beethoven overture and Tschaikowsky symphony have been heard often enough to have established in the minds of local music lovers their standing in the front rank of orchestral products. The less familiar Liszt pieces, as its name implies, episodic in character as a specimen of programme music, and not exemplifying as do the other, a recognised, typical form of expression. Dr. Muck brought out the characteristics of each with a finely poised ample conception of their respective qualities, yet with a restrained absence of emotional warmth in the symphony that prevented the fullest voicing of the passionate pleading of the last movement. Or was it that the Temple auditorium did not permit the ears of the listener to apprehend the intensity of feeling in this movement, of which it is possible? A concert in this church always suggests a doubt in such matters, and positive convictions as to the why and wherefore of certain limitations is not in order under the circumstances.

There could be no doubt, however, of the broad scope of Dr. Muck's musical understanding, and of his very effective command of both force and refinement of expression in his control of the orchestra. There is the fine art of conducting, which distinguishes itself from ordinary time-beating as the playing of a virtuoso differs from that of the players of average competence. There can be no doubt that during the season Dr. Muck has demonstrated what is meant by a virtuoso conductor, and has done it in the most convincing way, by the exposition of an ideal apart from any obtrusion of his own personality to catch the fancy of the ever-susceptible hero-worshippers. And he had not conducted many concerts before the management of the Boston orchestra wisely concluded that it would be well to have him continue with the orchestra beyond the present season if possible.

As one of the conductors of the royal opera at Berlin, Dr. Muck has obtained leave of absence for only the present season, and negotiations have been under way for some time with a view to having him continue his work in America for at least another season. Word has just been received that Emperor William has consented to this proposition and that Dr. Muck will remain at the head of the Boston Orchestra for another year. This announcement will no doubt be gratifying to the many who have noted what he has accomplished in one season with this company of musicians. The association of the finest of orchestras with one of the finest conductors has been highly productive and it is reasonable to anticipate even greater achievements for next season. The Baptist Temple was completely filled last night.

Paper Post
City New York
Date MAR 23 1907 State N Y

A First-class Pianist from England.

Yesterday's Mendelssohn Hall co[illegible] of the Boston Symphony Quartet was by far the best ever given in this town by that organization, not only because MM. Hess, Roth, Ferir, and Warnke played with more finish than heretofore, but because they had, in the second number—Schubert's magnificent B flat major trio—the assistance of Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist who has made such a sensation lately. Arthur Nikisch has placed her among the half-dozen greatest living pianists, and if she is as admirable in solo as in ensemble work, it will be hard to gainsay that judgment. Of the art of blending the tones of the piano with those of the strings, and always preserving the proper balance, she is a mistress—and a rare art it is. She applies her pedaling to the musical ideas rather than the notes—another rare art. No subtlety of expression escapes her—alto-gether, her playing was of ravishing purity, and the audience was stirred to real enthusiasm. Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke also distinguished themselves. [illegible] Shakespearean dialogue between [illegible] cello that andante is! Truly, [illegible] the greatest of all chamber [illegible], and we need him to-day [illegible] the secessionist music [illegible] Here is the

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

DEBUSSY, whose idea of the sea gave painful interest to a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night, headed the programme of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. His contribution was his string quartet, which, unlike his latest orchestral piece, is typical of the more ingratiating side of his talent. This quartet is inexorable in its demands on the players, and the performance left something to be desired in precision of ensemble and purity of intonation.

More enjoyable was Schubert's B flat trio for violin, 'cello, and piano, which was played by Prof. Hess, Mr. Warnke, and Mme Katharine Goodson. Mme Goodson showed herself an admirable ensemble pianist, playing with fluency, grace, and charm. The concert closed with Mozart's beautiful clarinet quintet, in which Prof. Hess and his men had the assistance of Georges Grisez, first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Post
City New York
Date State N Y

Concerning Claude Debussy, whom some consider the greatest contemporary composer, and one of whose larger works was played on Thursday in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. W. H. Hadow writes [illegible] Edinburgh Review:

It may well be that we have here but another instance of that keen individual vitality which can transmute as well as absorb the ideas of its generation. In any case he is a true artist, a master of half-lights and delicate shadows, of colors that shift and intertwine and baffle our gaze, of a kind of beauty that is as inexplicable as it is literally beyond question. We may take it or leave it, but we cannot analyze or discuss. . . . In the Introduction to "Pelléas et Mélisande" the most familiar passage is one of consecutive fifths balanced by one of consecutive sevenths; the rest is a tangle of semitones falling together in shapes and patterns that own allegiance to no recognized harmonic system. It never modulates, for it is without tonality; it never rests on a cadence, for it is without punctuation; its key-signature is a mere concession to the printer, and in its phraseology the laws of syntax are ignored. Yet the effect of it, as of the whole opera, is indescribably charming. Soft in tone, subtle in workmanship, exquisitely scored, it has all the delicate loveliness of Maeterlinck's play: the silent [illegible] lake, the transparent night[illegible] the dim castle with its tiny peace[illegible] the gentle hesitating figures [illegible] speak in the voices of the island.

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

Boston Organization Ends Its Best Season at Carnegie Hall.

The final Boston Symphony Concert of the season took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was devoted to the classics, in contrast to Thursday's programme, when the moderns had their musical innings. Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven came in for adoration at the hands and ears of the audience yesterday and under the baton of that prince of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck. He is to remain with the Boston Symphony Orchestra another season, the German Emperor having granted him leave of absence.

Yesterday's concert was one of great interest, and the playing of the orchestra was again superb. Instead of the Bach suite, announced on the programme, the concert began with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, in G major. Haydn's D major Symphony, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture completed the list of numbers. The concert closed the most successful season—financially and artistically—that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had in years.

[169]

Paper Telegram
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 23 1907

C AND THE OPERA

DEBUSSY'S "THE SEA"

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

BOSTON, March 3, 1907.

FOR a certain small but (let us hope) honorable minority in the world of music, the emergence of a new work by the Frenchman Claude Debussy is an artistic event of prime importance. Within a few years this singular tone-poet has impressed himself upon the minds of those who are more concerned with music as a living voice than as a completed record, as one of the three most interesting living musicians—and the word is used here in its important, its creative sense. We have already discussed in this place, at some length, the art of Debussy in its general aspects, so it would be superfluous to advert now to its characteristics. It may be as well to recall, however, that until the present season Debussy has been known to the musical public of this country as the composer of but two works for orchestra: the "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune" (after the poem of Mallarmé); and the three "Nocturnes." We had not heard his "Danse Sacrée" and "Danse Profane" (for chromatic harp or piano with orchestra), or his newest and most imposing instrumental utterance: the "Trois Esquisses Symphoniques"—as he calls them—"La Mer." These "sketches," published in 1905, were produced at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, on October 15 of that year, under M. Camille Chevillard's direction. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, performed them last night at Symphony Hall for the first time in America. The performance would have delighted the fastidious and hyper-sensitive Debussy, for it was in the last degree revealing and eloquent. Seldom has this astonishing orchestra so covered itself with glory as in its exposition of this fantastic, perturbing, whimsical, and most exacting score—one of the most unconfined and unpredictable essays in orchestral writing that have ever been put upon paper. Dr. Muck's reading was exquisitely lucid, yet admirably plastic and imaginative.

It is doubtful if the music made a very definite impression upon many of those who heard it; for it is nothing if not elusive, and it wears none of the hall-marks which long convention has associated with music which assumes to express the sea. It has none of the expected furies and obvious calms of the traditional seascape—how well one knows the precise orchestral methods by which the average music-maker will depict his waves and tempests, his moderating winds, and the long roll and swell of his waves! There are prescriptions—do we not all know them?—for denoting easily the shriek of the gale (chromatic runs in the wood wind); the swirl and roar of the storm (pompous figures in the brass under string tremolos); recovered gladness and serenity (an evenly rhythmed and gliding passage for the horns). These things are as unvarying, as inevitable, as painfully cliché, as the oboe and muted strings of the pastoral, the diatonic trombone harmonies of the chorale. Debussy, unostentatiously and without affectation, has eschewed them. He has contemplated his theme from a wholly novel standpoint, a standpoint unobstructed by tradition or prepossession. To begin with, he has chosen for expression phases of the subject whose freshness and novelty of suggestion strike one at once. His "three sketches" are thus entitled: (1) "De l'aube à midi sur la mer"; (2) "Jeux de vagues"; (3) "Dialogue du vent et de la mer." They are scored for a full, though not an unusual, orchestra; in the second movement ("Jeux de vagues"), a célesta is named as an alternative for the glockenspiel, and the former and more delicate instrument was used last night with delicious effect. One's first impression of this music, as has been said, is of the manner in which it diverges from the too-familiar seascapes of orchestral tradition. We are not reminded, in listening to "La Mer," of the sea as it appealed to the imagination of Rimsky-Korsakoff, of Wagner, of Rubinstein, of Mendelssohn, of MacDowell. Nor is it the sea as Swinburne knew it—a sea which, as the echo of it lives in his verse, said W. E. Henley, convinces one of "its vastness and vehemency, the rapture of its inspiration, the palpitating, many-twinkling miracle of its light." Nor is it the thunderous and surging sea of Whitman—the sea "of brooding scowl and murk, of unloosed hurricanes"—that has quickened his spirit. The sea does not speak to him "with husky, haughty lips," as it did to that musician who uttered supremely its moods of sinister and terrible beauty, its majesty no less than its awe, its exhilaration no less than its allurement. For Debussy the sea is wholly a thing of dreams, a thing vaguely yet rhapsodically perceived, a bodiless thing, a thing of shapes that are gaunt or lovely, wayward or capricious; visions that are full of bodement, or fitful, or passionately insistent; but that always pertain to a supra-mundane world, a region altogether of the spirit. It is a sea which has its shifting and lucent surfaces, which even shimmers and traditionally mocks. But it is a sea that is shut away from too-curious an inspection, to whose murmurs or imperious commands few have needed to pay heed; a sea whose eternal sonorities and immutable enchantments are hidden behind veils that open to few, and to none who attend without, it may be, a certain rapt and curious eagerness.

From an exclusively musical standpoint, "The Sea" is cast in a mould that differs rather strikingly from that which shaped the inspiration of Debussy's earlier orchestral writing. At the risk of being misunderstood, one is moved to say of it that it is more vigorous, more emphatic in accent, more dynamically various. It is less fluid in movement, less shadowy in profile, than the Mallarmé piece or the "Nocturnes": it has, musically, a more obvious body. One does not mean to imply by this that it owns more admirable traits than its predecessors; we are not exalting mere energy, mere dynamic effectiveness, at the expense of a static beauty and eloquence—indeed, this music seems, because of its greater palpability, less characteristically a product of Debussy's brain than does such earlier writing of his as the "Nocturnes" or "Pelléas et Mélisande." Yet it is unmistakably his: it is full of his rich flavor, and it grips and sways the imagination in an exceeding degree. Structurally, it is crowded with exquisite and ingenious detail, and it is put upon the orchestra with a resourcefulness, a variety and fertility of invention, a sensitiveness, a restraint, a mastery of effect, both interior and external, that compel fervent praise.

As Mr. Philip Hale has remarked, to those who have amusingly charged Debussy with a lack of "virility" this music is a complete answer; yet it was an answer that need not have been made, at least as a rejoinder; for such a thing as his earlier "Nuages," evanescent and shadowy as it is, is yet not less truly "virile" because it is less firmly articulated. There is a virility of the spirit which rather avoids than seeks emphatic utterance.

A characteristic Portrait of Dr. Karl Muck
CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paper Times
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

MUSICAL.

Last Concert of Boston Orchestra Largely Attended—Dr. Muck to Conduct Next Season.

Three orchestral numbers made up the programme of the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night, and the series closed as it began, without the assistance of any solo feature. Dr. Muck conducted with even more distinction than he has thus far shown in the rendering of the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, Liszt's Second Episode (Mephisto Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust," and the Tschaikowsky Symphony, No 6 in B minor, commonly known as the "Pathetic." Presenting no element of novelty in the ordinary sense, each of these works represents a pronounced individualism in musical thought that has had a large influence in proclaiming the exalted mission of music.

So far as Brooklyn is concerned the Beethoven overture and Tschaikowsky symphony have been heard often enough to have established in the minds of local music lovers their standing in the front rank of orchestral products. The less familiar Liszt pieces, as its name implies, episodic in character as a specimen of programme music, and not exemplifying as do the other, a recognized, typical form of expression. Dr. Muck brought out the characteristics of each with a finely poised ample conception of their respective qualities, yet with a restrained absence of emotional warmth in the symphony that prevented the fullest voicing of the passionate pleading of the last movement. Or was it that the Temple auditorium did not permit the ears of the listener to apprehend the intensity of feeling in this movement, of which it is possible? A concert in this church always suggests a doubt in such matters, and positive convictions as to the why and wherefore of certain limitations is not in order under the circumstances.

There could be no doubt, however, of the broad scope of Dr. Muck's musical understanding, and of his very effective command of both force and refinement of expression in his control of the orchestra. There is the fine art of conducting, which distinguishes itself from ordinary time-beating as the playing of a virtuoso differs from that of the players of average competence. There can be no doubt that during the season Dr. Muck has demonstrated what is meant by a virtuoso conductor, and has done it in the most convincing way, by the exposition of an ideal apart from any obtrusion of his own personality to catch the fancy of the ever-susceptible hero-worshippers. And he had not conducted many concerts before the management of the Boston orchestra wisely concluded that it would be well to have him continue with the orchestra beyond the present season if possible.

As one of the conductors of the royal opera at Berlin, Dr. Muck has obtained leave of absence for only the present season, and negotiations have been under way for some time with a view to having him continue his work in America for at least another season. Word has just been received that Emperor William has consented to this proposition and that Dr. Muck will remain at the head of the Boston Orchestra for another year. This announcement will no doubt be gratifying to the many who have noted what he has accomplished in one season with this company of musicians. The association of the finest of orchestras with one of the finest conductors has been highly productive and it is reasonable to anticipate even greater achievements for next season. The Baptist Temple was completely filled last night.

Paper Post
City New York
Date 1907 State N Y

A First-class Pianist from England.

Yesterday's Mendelssohn Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was by far the best ever given in this town by that organization, not only because MM. Hess, Roth, Ferir, and Warnke played with more finish than heretofore, but because they had, in the second number—Schubert's magnificent B flat major trio—the assistance of Mme. Katharine Goodson, the English pianist who has made such a sensation lately. Arthur Nikisch has placed her among the half-dozen greatest living pianists, and if she is as admirable in solo as in ensemble work, it will be hard to gainsay that judgment. Of the art of blending the tones of the piano with those of the strings, and always preserving the proper balance, she is a mistress—and a rare art it is. She applies her shading to the musical ideas rather than the notes—another rare art. No subtle trait of expression escapes her—altogether, her playing was of ravishing beauty, and the audience was stirred to great enthusiasm. Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke also distinguished themselves. What a Shakespearean dialogue between violin and 'cello that andante is! Truly, Schubert is the greatest of all chamber music composers, and we need him to-day as an antidote to the secessionist music with its cold taboo melody. Here is the

Paper Globe
City New York
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

DEBUSSY, whose idea of the sea gave painful interest to a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night, headed the programme of the Boston Symphony Quartet at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. His contribution was his string quartet, which, unlike his latest orchestral piece, is typical of the more ingratiating side of his talent. This quartet is inexorable in its demands on the players, and the performance left something to be desired in precision of ensemble and purity of intonation.

More enjoyable was Schubert's B flat trio for violin, 'cello, and piano, which was played by Prof. Hess, Mr. Warnke, and Mme Katharine Goodson. Mme Goodson showed herself an admirable ensemble pianist, playing with fluency, grace, and charm. The concert closed with Mozart's beautiful clarinet quintet, in which Prof. Hess and his men had the assistance of Georges Grisez, first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paper Post
City New York
Date State N Y

Concerning Claude Debussy, whom some consider the greatest contemporary composer, and one of whose larger works was played on Thursday in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. W. H. Hadow writes in the Edinburgh Review:

It may well be that we have here but another instance of that keen individual vitality which can transmute as well as absorb the ideas of its generation. In any case he is a true artist, a master of half-lights and delicate shadows, of colors that shift and intertwine and baffle our gaze, of a kind of beauty that is as inexplicable as it is literally beyond question. We may take it or leave it, but we cannot analyze or discuss. . . . In the Introduction to "Pelléas et Mélisande" the most familiar passage is one of consecutive fifths balanced by one of consecutive sevenths; the rest is a tangle of semitones falling together in shapes and patterns that own allegiance to no recognized harmonic system. It never modulates, for it is without tonality; it never rests on a cadence, for it is without punctuation; its key-signature is a mere concession to the printer, and in its phraseology the laws of syntax are ignored. Yet the effect of it, as of the whole opera, is indescribably charming. Soft in tone, subtle in workmanship, exquisitely scored, it has all the delicate loveliness of Maeterlinck's play: the silent, shadowy lake, the transparent nightfall, the dim castle with its tiny beacon fire, the gentle hesitating figures that speak in the voices of dreamland.

Paper World
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

Boston Organization Ends Its Best Season at Carnegie Hall.

The final Boston Symphony Concert of the season took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was devoted to the classics, in contrast to Thursday's programme, when the moderns had their musical innings. Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven came in for adoration at the hands and ears of the audience yesterday and under the baton of that prince of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck. He is to remain with the Boston Symphony Orchestra another season, the German Emperor having granted him leave of absence.

Yesterday's concert was one of great interest, and the playing of the orchestra was again superb. Instead of the Bach suite, announced on the programme, the concert began with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, in G major. Haydn's D major Symphony, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture completed the list of numbers. The concert closed the most successful season—financially and artistically—that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had in years.

[169]

Paper American
City New York
Date Mar 24 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY BIDS FAREWELLS

Turns Back to the Old Masters for Programme of the Closing Concerts.

In the last two concerts of their season Herr Muck and his Boston Orchestra made what may be called a musical somersault. On Thursday night the musicians bowed and blew and thumped their way through the bewildering mazes of tone poems, impressionistic thingumies and modulated whatucallums. Yesterday afternoon they played the solid harmonies of Bach, the well-sustained themes of Haydn, the master melodies of Mozart and the gracious gentle joys of Beethoven.

In consequence there was no display of emotion by the hearers. At no time when applause was expected did they forget to respond as they did once or twice on Thursday night. It is very evident that the extreme "new" schools of French and German music have not touched the hearts of the New York music lovers, for the programmes, made up of compositions from these schools are never as enthusiastically received as, say an aria from "The Magic Flute" or a Handel Largo.

The concert began with the "Brandenburg Concerto" in C minor, for strings, by Bach. This was the only heavy number of the afternoon and was substituted at the last moment for the "Suite No. 2," in seven movements, by the same composer.

Haydn's Symphony in D major, the twelfth symphony from the pen of this most versatile musician and composer, was played in a most brilliant manner. The first movement is a trifle long, but abounds in beautiful passages and wonderfully worked out themes. The other movements were the andante, minuet—a charming part of the symphony—and the spirited last movement, full of unexpected turns and lovely nuances.

The overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" was next on the programme, and this was followed by Beethoven's Symphony in F major.

The hall was crowded to the doors, and for the first time in twenty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it closes its season with a very comfortable balance in the bank.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 24 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The antidote which Professor Hess administered so speedily after the dose of Debussy on Friday Dr. Muck postponed till yesterday, when the last afternoon concert for this season took place in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's sympathies are known (or, let us say, suspected), to be with the masters of the late lamented Romantic and Classical Schools of Music rather than with the modern Frenchmen, who run to the fascinating vagueness of musical utterance which opens the door so wide to verbal dreams, or the youthful Germans who find a fruitful field in philosophies and pathological perversities. It was therefore not a little surprising to have him follow up the "Symphonia domestica" of Richard Strauss with Debussy's "Sea" sketches, and to modulate through Converse and Liszt to Berlioz as a classic. Yesterday he sought to make the restoration of equilibrium complete by a drastic remedy. Debussy, Converse, Liszt and Berlioz on Thursday; Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—the merry wag Beethoven of the eighth symphony—yesterday. It was an abrupt transition, but the audience took to it kindly, nonplussed only by the contradictory announcement touching the opening number of the programme. The house bill said it was to be Bach's Suite in B minor; a printed notice slipped into the house bill corrected this to a concerto for string orchestra in C minor, "known as the Brandesburg Concerto." What the orchestra played was the third of the Brandenburg concertos, that in G major, for three violins, three violas and three violoncellos, with basses and continuo. After it came Haydn's Symphony in D (the second of the Breitkopf and Härtel list), Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and the Beethoven symphony. The music was all played with superb spirit. There were moments when the value of the augmented wood-wind instruments in the Beethoven symphony seemed questionable, but the prevalent joyousness of the afternoon left no opportunity for querulousness. Dr. Muck, like a true conservative, chose the golden mean between the extremely rapid tempo indicated for the Tempo di Menuetto by the composer and the extremely slow tempo which many modern German conductors have used since Wagner gave them a hint to that effect. The news of an extension of Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his duties at the Court Opera in Berlin, which was made known yesterday, is extremely welcome to the many admirers which he has won in New York.

H. E. K.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

FINE FAREWELL CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Appearance—Dr. Muck to Conduct Another Year.

Brooklyn had the fifth and last of this season's series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday evening at the Baptist Temple, and happily the farewell does not mean that Dr. Muck, the German conductor, was heard here for the last time. Yesterday morning the good news was received that the German Emperor has extended Dr. Muck's leave of absence another year, though no mention was made of the fact at last evening's concert.

After a season of some vicissitudes and disappointments as to soloists, or their non-appearance when expected, the season of 1906-7 is closing with more genuine interest in the Boston Orchestra than the previous one.

Music for music's sake is coming to have a stronger hold on the symphony concert goers in this borough than ever, despite the fact that sincere appreciation of so masterful a performance as Dr. Muck and his musicians gave, at this final event of the year, was expressed only in mild applause, where such outbursts as came in the music of Tschaikowsky's great symphony would not have accorded too much praise.

Dr. Muck strikes a vigorous chord that seems to have electrified the Boston players, and without sacrificing any finish, they have played with more warmth and color, and transmitted it to the audience, of late than in the past.

Three numbers constituted last evening's programme, which was more than usually interesting. Fine as each is of itself, a less finished rendering would have detracted from the appreciation of any of them. The selections were Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, opus 72; Lisbt's episode No. 2, from Lenau's "Faust"—the scene in the tavern, with the "Mephisto Waltz"; and lastly Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony—the "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74.

To the first, Dr. Muck gave a most illuminating reading; while the second is a brilliant tone drama, with weird, seductive rythmic measures that a prominent critic well describes as "devilish." The score presents great difficulties for the musicians, but the same is still more true of the symphony. The breadth of meaning which the Russian composer wrote into this, his master work, called forth fullness and breadth of interpretation. The harmonies and their intricate developments were exquisitely produced by the various instruments, while the rich themes stood out with striking impressiveness, for whatever story one may weave into the movements, the funeral lament of the finale is ample reason for the attribute—"Pathetic."

There was a large attendance at this concert, and the few scatetring seats not regularly secured by subscribers were occupied last night.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Professor Willy Hess and his confrères of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Friday afternoon followed the example set by Dr. Muck at the orchestra concert of the evening before and offered their tribute to the precious musical aesthetes who have found that the elder codes of procedure in composition produce music that is quite too rude and palpable for their exquisitely sensitive souls, longing as they do for emotions awakened by things which are sweetly vague, neither here nor there, as it were, but just hovering, or floating, in the tenuous clouds, as they exhale from the alembic of the indednable. In other words, they played a string quartet by Claude Debussy. But this quartet, in G miner, is made of less tenuous material than the last of its composer's orchestral lucubrations with which Dr. Muck befogged the minds of his audience on Thursday. It has been heard here before, at concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, and when the last two movements were played here two years ago they stirred the hearers into real enthusiasm, very different from the timid, furtive, half-ashamed pattering of hands which followed the first and second movements of "La Mer." The music is moody food for the fancy in the slow movement and supernaturally fantastic in the sort of Danse Macabre which follows; but it is music in which design is not wholly supplanted by color, and its processes are not mere erraticism. Nevertheless, Professor Hess seemed eager to get back on firmer ground with as many feet as possible, and followed up the quartet with Schubert's Trio in B flat and Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A major. In the trio he had the help of Katharine Goodson (Mrs. Arthur Hinton), and in the quintet of Georges Grisez, of the Boston Orchestra. Miss Goodson is an English woman, whose artistic training, begun in London, was completed under the eyes of Leschetisky in Vienna. Her skill is most admirable, but more gratifying by far is her sound and sweet musicianship. That spoke out of every measure of her performance, sometimes to the momentary confusion of her fellows. There was more spirit than finish in the playing of the first and last numbers, though the fluent playing of Mr. [illegible]

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 24 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert Devoted to Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York for this season were brought to an end yesterday afternoon with a programme as exclusively devoted to the classics as Thursday evening's was to the modern. A delightful programme it was, without a soloist, and Dr. Muck left his New York audience, who have become his friends and admirers, with a benison in the strong and exhilarating strains of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. He has left them also, doubtless, with the hope on their part that the reports of the extension of his leave of absence from his Emperor and his re-engagement by the management of the orchestra are true. For he has carried on the orchestra in this season, during which he has had charge of it, in the spirit in which such an organization should be carried on. He has been hospitable toward the new, yet conservative, of the classics; and for them he has displayed not only reverence, but also affection. The standard of the orchestra and of its perfection of playing has suffered little if at all under his guidance. In Dr. Muck his New York audiences have learned to know a musician of the highest aims and the fullest powers, a man whose whole thought is toward his art, and whose indifference toward personal display, toward impressing the audience, toward gaining for himself anything in the way of attention and applause that did not rightfully belong to him has been repeatedly attested at the conductor's stand.

The programme announced Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, but this was changed. A succession of printed slips announced first a Brandenburg concerto in C minor, and then one in G minor. There being none in either of these keys it finally turned out that the third in G major was meant. It is in two movements only, and is written for violins, violas, and violoncellos in three parts each, and basses, differing thus from its companions in having no solos or "concertino" parts, and, therefore, presenting none of the characteristics of a "concerto" at all, even in the older sense that attached to a "concerto grosso."

It is a most splendid and majestic piece, as strong and vital to-day as when the manuscript left Bach's hands. It has much that is modern about it, as so many of Bach's compositions have, especially in its harmonies and certain of the harmonic progressions. Superb sonority and close-knit muscularity in the string tone, and rhythmic firmness characterized the performance, which was magnificent. And how well the composition bears the enlargement of its scale to that of the modern orchestra from that of the score of fiddlers that Bach knew! The only result is to enhance its effect of amplitude and bigness.

Not quite so well does the symphony by Haydn—the third that has been played here in a fortnight—bear the change, and yet Dr. Muck so skillfully maintained the balance between the parts that there was a minimum of distortion and a maximum of euphony. There was, too, a keen appreciation of all the effects of rhythm and accent and dynamic nuance of which the work is capable. It might be said Dr. Muck modernized the minuet and its trio, but he at any rate secured unceasing beauty and warmth of expression from it. And in the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" he imparted life and brilliancy—here, too, with a certain exuberance of accent and emphasis.

The concert was closed with Beethoven's eighth symphony, in which Dr. Muck took no revolutionary stand about the disputed tempo of the third movement, but conceived it in the way that seems native to the music. The symphony was played with fire and animation and with a very evident sympathy with its spirit.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their farewell concert for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon to a crowded house. In contrast to the programme of Thursday evening, which was modern of the moderns, this was entirely classic. It consisted of Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto in G major, Haydn's D major symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's delightful eighth symphony. All were admirably played by this superb band. Dr. Muck's delay in beginning the last movement of the Beethoven symphony, while he waited for the noisily departing few to get out of the auditorium, was a pointed rebuke. That the conductor, by the grace of the German Emperor, is to remain in charge of the orchestra for another season, on every side was held to be cause for congratulation.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date MAR 25 1907 State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston orchestra played their farewell on Saturday afternoon, and a fine audience listened to Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven music with enthusiasm. Dr. Muck will return next season.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

DR. MUCK INTERPRETS SOME CLASSIC MASTERS.

Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Get On Very Well Without the Help of a Soloist—The Eighth Symphony and the "Magic Flute" Overture Well Played.

After the cacophonous diapason of Mr. Debussy's marine brainstorm heard on Thursday night the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon fell upon the troubled soul like a benison. Dr. Carl Muck was wise enough to bid New York au revoir with a programme of purest classic beauty. The four morning stars—Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—sang together, and it was good to be there. The first number performed (but not on the programme and incorrectly described on the announcement slips) was the third Brandenburg concerto, that in G major. Haydn was represented by his D major symphony, No. 2 in the Breitkopf and Hartel catalogue; Mozart by the overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven by the eighth symphony.

This is a programme which calls for no disputation. It was arranged, as music lovers can see, with a view to exhibiting the historical advance in the development of orchestral writing. It did this with admirable certainty, and with a lovely and compelling influence. That the splendid strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would play the Bach number well was to be expected, and it is comment of routine kind to add that the Haydn music sounded smooth and mellifluous. In the rich and subdued sonority with which Dr. Muck caused the famous brass chords in the Mozart overture to be played there was a lesson for ambitious conductors who believe in tearing these portentous phrases to tatters. The whole overture went beautifully.

Perhaps the treatment of the Beethoven symphony aroused the liveliest pleasure of the afternoon. Dr. Muck upset no traditions in the matter of tempi. He hurried nothing, he dragged nothing. He permitted the music to sing itself. He had, like old Habeneck of the Conservatoire, found Beethoven's melody and disclosed it to the hearers. The allegretto scherzando was given with exquisite delicacy, clarity and daintiness of accent. Without sacrificing a jot of the piquancy of the movement Dr. Muck did not find it necessary to press so heavily on its accentuation as Von Bülow did in his desire to make clear his purpose.

In the matter of the tempo di menuetto the conductor steered a middle course. The metronome mark on this movement, which calls for 126 quarter notes to the minute, is now disregarded. Thayer has told us that it is incorrect, and both Wagner and von Bülow gave weighty reasons why it should be left out of consideration. Dr. von Bülow, however, used to play the movement at the rate of ninety-eight quarter notes, which was, to say the least, an extreme reading. Dr. Muck took a tempo about that of average custom, and since with it he was able to give the movement its proper atmosphere his tempo justified itself.

By another merciful dispensation of Boston the concert was without soloist. The public seemed to take no small delight in this fact, for the audience was a large one and the applause was hearty, if not excited. But one thing is beyond question. Those who heard the concert went home with a finer and more valuable art impression than if they had heard some keysmith smite a piano or some vocal acrobat hurdle half a dozen leger lines above the staff.

Dr. Muck has demonstrated that he is the right man for the post which he has occupied during this season. Why is not the press gang a musical institution? He ought to be impressed and prevented from going back to Berlin. Why does the Kaiser recall him? Wilhelm II. has so many conductors. Boston has only Muck.

N. Y. Sun,

March 24, 1907.

But one thing is certain. If this society does not abolish from its functions the spectre of cheap sensationalism and get back to its pristine dignity and classic serenity it will eventually destroy that prestige. The Philharmonic Society ought to be the most dignified, scholarly and authoritative orchestra in the United States.

The truth is that at this moment that position is occupied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will, in all probability, continue to be so occupied.

Dr. Muck is all that a public educator in musical art ought to be; and there need be no hesitation in saying so, even after his production of the complicated emptiness of Claude Debussy last Thursday evening. As an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and other classic masters Dr. Muck has proved himself to be an authority. What is still more to the point just at this moment is that he possesses the power of interesting an audience in the interpretation without centring its attention [illegible] his personality and his idiosyncrasies.

Paper American
City New York
Date 7.12.2[illegible] State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY BIDS FAREWELLS

Turns Back to the Old Masters for Programme of the Closing Concerts.

In the last two concerts of their season Herr Muck and his Boston Orchestra made what may be called a musical somersault. On Thursday night the musicians bowed and blew and thumped their way through the bewildering mazes of tone poems, impressionistic thingumies and modulated whatucallums. Yesterday afternoon they played the solid harmonies of Bach, the well-sustained themes of Haydn, the master melodies of Mozart and the gracious gentle joys of Beethoven.

In consequence there was no display of emotion by the hearers. At no time when applause was expected did they forget to respond as they did once or twice on Thursday night. It is very evident that the extreme "new" schools of French and German music have not touched the hearts of the New York music lovers, for the programmes made up of compositions from these schools are never as enthusiastically received as, say an aria from "The Magic Flute" or a Handel Largo.

The concert began with the "Brandenburg Concerto" in C minor, for strings, by Bach. This was the only heavy number of the afternoon and was substituted at the last moment for the "Suite No. 2," in seven movements, by the same composer.

Haydn's Symphony in D major, the twelfth symphony from the pen of this most versatile musician and composer, was played in a most brilliant manner. The first movement is a trifle long, but abounds in beautiful passages and wonderfully worked out themes. The other movements were the andante, minuet—a charming part of the symphony—and the spirited last movement, full of unexpected turns and lovely nuances.

The overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" was next on the programme, and this was followed by Beethoven's Symphony in F major.

The hall was crowded to the doors, and for the first time in twenty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that it closes its season with a very comfortable balance in the bank.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 24 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The antidote which Professor Hess administered so speedily after the dose of Debussy on Friday Dr. Muck postponed till yesterday, when the last afternoon concert for this season took place in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck's sympathies are known (or, let us say, suspected), to be with the masters of the late lamented Romantic and Classical Schools of Music rather than with the modern Frenchmen, who run to the fascinating vagueness of musical utterance which opens the door so wide to verbal dreams, or the youthful Germans who find a fruitful field in philosophies and pathological perversities. It was therefore not a little surprising to have him follow up the "Symphonia domestica" of Richard Strauss with Debussy's "Sea" sketches, and to modulate through Converse and Liszt to Berlioz as a classic. Yesterday he sought to make the restoration of equilibrium complete by a drastic remedy. Debussy, Converse, Liszt and Berlioz on Thursday; Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—the merry wag Beethoven of the eighth symphony—yesterday. It was an abrupt transition, but the audience took to it kindly, nonplussed only by the contradictory announcement touching the opening number of the programme. The house bill said it was to be Bach's Suite in B minor; a printed notice slipped into the house bill corrected this to a concerto for string orchestra in C minor, "known as the Brandesburg Concerto." What the orchestra played was the third of the Brandenburg concertos, that in G major, for three violins, three violas and three violoncellos, with basses and continuo. After it came Haydn's Symphony in D (the second of the Breitkopf and Härtel list), Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" and the Beethoven symphony. The music was all played with superb spirit. There were moments when the value of the augmented wood-wind instruments in the Beethoven symphony seemed questionable, but the prevalent joyousness of the afternoon left no opportunity for querulousness. Dr. Muck, like a true conservative, chose the golden mean between the extremely rapid tempo indicated for the Tempo di Menuetto by the composer and the extremely slow tempo which many modern German conductors have used since Wagner gave them a hint to that effect. The news of an extension of Dr. Muck's leave of absence from his duties at the Court Opera in Berlin, which was made known yesterday, is extremely welcome to the many admirers which he has won in New York.

H. E. K.

Paper Citizen
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y
1907

FINE FAREWELL CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Appearance—Dr. Muck to Conduct Another Year.

Brooklyn had the fifth and last of this season's series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday evening at the Baptist Temple, and happily the farewell does not mean that Dr. Muck, the German conductor, was heard here for the last time. Yesterday morning the good news was received that the German Emperor has extended Dr. Muck's leave of absence another year, though no mention was made of the fact at last evening's concert.

After a season of some vicissitudes and disappointments as to soloists, or their non-appearance when expected, the season of 1906-7 is closing with more genuine interest in the Boston Orchestra than the previous one.

Music for music's sake is coming to have a stronger hold on the symphony concert goers in this borough than ever, despite the fact that sincere appreciation of as masterful a performance as Dr. Muck and his musicians gave, at this final event of the year, was expressed only in mild applause, where such outbursts as came in the music of Tschar-kowsky's great symphony would not have accorded too much praise.

Dr. Muck strikes a vigorous chord that seems to have electrified the Boston players, and without sacrificing any finish, they have played with more warmth and color, and transmitted it to the audience, of late than in the past.

Three numbers constituted last evening's programme, which was more than usually interesting. Fine as each is of itself, a less finished rendering would have detracted from the appreciation of any of them. The selections were Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, opus 72; Lisbt's episode No. 2, from Lenau's "Faust"—the scene in the tavern, with the "Mephisto Waltz"; and lastly Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony—the "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74.

To the first, Dr. Muck gave a most illuminating reading; while the second is a brilliant tone drama, with weird, seductive rythmic measures that a prominent critic well describes as "devilish." The score presents great difficulties for the musicians, but the same is still more true of the symphony. The breadth of meaning which the Russian composer wrote into this, his master work, called forth fullness and breadth of interpretation. The harmonies and their intricate developments were exquisitely produced by the various instruments, while the rich themes stood out with striking impressiveness, for whatever story one may weave into the movements, the funeral lament of the finale is ample reason for the attribute—"Pathetic."

There was a large attendance at this concert, and the few scatetring seats not regularly secured by subscribers were occupied last night.

Paper Tribune
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Professor Willy Hess and his confrères of the Boston Symphony Quartet on Friday afternoon followed the example set by Dr. Muck at the orchestra concert of the evening before and offered their tribute to the precious musical esthetes who have found that the elder codes of procedure in composition produce music that is quite too rude and palpable for their exquisitely sensitive souls, longing as they do for emotions awakened by things which are sweetly vague, neither here nor there, as it were, but just hovering, or floating, in the tenuous clouds, as they exhale from the alembic of the indefinable. In other words, they played a string quartet by Claude Debussy. But this quartet, in G minor, is made of less tenuous material than the last of its composer's orchestral lucubrations with which Dr. Muck befogged the minds of his audience on Thursday. It has been heard here before, at concerts of the Kneisel Quartet, and when the last two movements were played here two years ago they stirred the hearers into real enthusiasm, very different from the timid, furtive, half-ashamed pattering of hands which followed the first and second movements of "La Mer." The music is moody food for the fancy in the slow movement and supernaturally fantastic in the sort of Danse Macabre which follows; but it is music in which design is not wholly supplanted by color, and its processes are not mere erraticism. Nevertheless, Professor Hess seemed eager to get back on firmer ground with as many feet as possible, and followed up the quartet with Schubert's Trio in B flat and Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A major. In the trio he had the help of Katharine Goodson (Mrs. Arthur Hinton), and in the quintet of Georges Grisez, of the Boston Orchestra. Miss Goodson is an English woman, whose artistic training, begun in London, was completed under the eyes of Leschetizky in Vienna. Her skill is most admirable, but more gratifying by far is her sound and sweet musicianship. That spoke out of every measure of her performance, sometimes to the momentary confusion of her fellows. There was more spirit than finish in the playing of the first and last numbers, though the fluent playing of Mr. [illegible] was pleasant to hear.

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
MAR 24 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert Devoted to Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York for this season were brought to an end yesterday afternoon with a programme as exclusively devoted to the classics as Thursday evening's was to the modern. A delightful programme it was, without a soloist, and Dr. Muck left his New York audience, who have become his friends and admirers, with a benison in the strong and exhilarating strains of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. He has left them also, doubtless, with the hope on their part that the reports of the extension of his leave of absence from his Emperor and his re-engagement by the management of the orchestra are true. For he has carried on the orchestra in this season, during which he has had charge of it, in the spirit in which such an organization should be carried on. He has been hospitable toward the new, yet conservative, of the classics; and for them he has displayed not only reverence, but also affection. The standard of the orchestra and of its perfection of playing has suffered little if at all under his guidance. In Dr. Muck his New York audiences have learned to know a musician of the highest aims and the fullest powers, a man whose whole thought is toward his art, and whose indifference toward personal display, toward impressing the audience, toward gaining for himself anything in the way of attention and applause that did not rightfully belong to him has been repeatedly attested at the conductor's stand.

The programme announced Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, but this was changed. A succession of printed slips announced first a Brandenburg concerto in C minor, and then one in G minor. There being none in either of these keys it finally turned out that the third in G major was meant. It is in two movements only, and is written for violins, violas, and violoncellos in three parts each, and basses, differing thus from its companions in having no solos or "concertino" parts, and, therefore, presenting none of the characteristics of a "concerto" at all, even in the older sense that attached to a "concerto grosso."

It is a most splendid and majestic piece, as strong and vital to-day as when the manuscript left Bach's hands. It has much that is modern about it, as so many of Bach's compositions have, especially in its harmonies and certain of the harmonic progressions. Superb sonority and close-knit muscularity in the string tone, and rhythmic firmness characterized the performance, which was magnificent. And how well the composition bears the enlargement of its scale to that of the modern orchestra from that of the score of fiddlers that Bach knew! The only result is to enhance its effect of amplitude and bigness.

Not quite so well does the symphony by Haydn—the third that has been played here in a fortnight—bear the change, and yet Dr. Muck so skillfully maintained the balance between the parts that there was a minimum of distortion and a maximum of euphony. There was, too, a keen appreciation of all the effects of rhythm and accent and dynamic nuance of which the work is capable. It might be said Dr. Muck modernised the minuet and its trio, but he at any rate secured unceasing beauty and warmth of expression from it. And in the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" he imparted life and brilliancy—here, too, with a certain exuberance of accent and emphasis.

The concert was closed with Beethoven's eighth symphony, in which Dr. Muck took no revolutionary stand about the disputed tempo of the third movement, but conceived it in the way that seems native to the music. The symphony was played with fire and animation and with a very evident sympathy with its spirit.

Paper Evening World
City New York
Date [illegible] State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST.

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their farewell concert for the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon to a crowded house. In contrast to the programme of Thursday evening, which was modern of the moderns, this was entirely classic. It consisted of Bach's third Brandenburg Concerto in G major, Haydn's D major symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's delightful eighth symphony. All were admirably played by this superb band. Dr. Muck's delay in beginning the last movement of the Beethoven symphony, while he waited for the noisily departing few to get out of the auditorium, was a pointed rebuke. That the conductor, by the grace of the German Emperor, is to remain in charge of the orchestra for another season, on every side was held to be cause for congratulation.

Paper Mail
City New York
Date [illegible] State N Y

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston orchestra played their farewell on Saturday afternoon, and a fine audience listened to Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven music with enthusiasm. Dr. Muck will return next season.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

DR. MUCK INTERPRETS SOME CLASSIC MASTERS.

Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Get On Very Well Without the Help of a Soloist—The Eighth Symphony and the "Magic Flute" Overture Well Played.

After the cacophonous diapason of Mr. Debussy's marine brainstorm heard on Thursday night the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon fell upon the troubled soul like a benison. Dr. Carl Muck was wise enough to bid New York au revoir with a programme of purest classic beauty. The four morning stars—Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—sang together, and it was good to be there. The first number performed (but not on the programme and incorrectly described on the announcement slips) was the third Brandenburg concerto, that in G major. Haydn was represented by his D major symphony, No. 2 in the Breitkopf and Hartel catalogue; Mozart by the overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven by the eighth symphony.

This is a programme which calls for no disputation. It was arranged, as music lovers can see, with a view to exhibiting the historical advance in the development of orchestral writing. It did this with admirable certainty, and with a lovely and compelling influence. That the splendid strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would play the Bach number well was to be expected, and it is comment of routine kind to add that the Haydn music sounded smooth and mellifluous. In the rich and subdued sonority with which Dr. Muck caused the famous brass chords in the Mozart overture to be played there was a lesson for ambitious conductors who believe in tearing these portentous phrases to tatters. The whole overture went beautifully.

Perhaps the treatment of the Beethoven symphony aroused the liveliest pleasure of the afternoon. Dr. Muck upset no traditions in the matter of tempi. He hurried nothing, he dragged nothing. He permitted the music to sing itself. He had, like old Habeneck of the Conservatoire, found Beethoven's melody and disclosed it to the hearers. The allegretto scherzando was given with exquisite delicacy, clarity and daintiness of accent. Without sacrificing a jot of the piquancy of the movement Dr. Muck did not find it necessary to press so heavily on its accentuation as Von Bülow did in his desire to make clear his purpose.

In the matter of the tempo di menuetto the conductor steered a middle course. The metronome mark on this movement, which calls for 126 quarter notes to the minute, is now disregarded. Thayer has told us that it is incorrect, and both Wagner and von Bülow gave weighty reasons why it should be left out of consideration. Dr. von Bülow, however, used to play the movement at the rate of ninety-eight quarter notes, which was, to say the least, an extreme reading. Dr. Muck took a tempo about that of average custom, and since with it he was able to give the movement its proper atmosphere his tempo justified itself.

By another merciful dispensation of Boston the concert was without soloist. The public seemed to take no small delight in this fact, for the audience was a large one and the applause was hearty, if not excited. But one thing is beyond question. Those who heard the concert went home with a finer and more valuable art impression than if they had heard some keysmith smite a piano or some vocal acrobat hurdle half a dozen leger lines above the staff.

Dr. Muck has demonstrated that he is the right man for the post which he has occupied during this season. Why is not the press gang a musical institution? He ought to be imprisoned and prevented from going back to Berlin. Why does the Kaiser recall him? Wilhelm II. has so many conductors. Boston has only Muck.

N. Y. Sun,

March 24, 1907.

But one thing is certain. If this society does not abolish from its functions the spectre of cheap sensationalism and get back to its pristine dignity and classic serenity it will eventually destroy that prestige. The Philharmonic Society ought to be the most dignified, scholarly and authoritative orchestra in the United States.

The truth is that at this moment that position is occupied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will, in all probability, continue to be so occupied.

Dr. Muck is all that a public educator in musical art ought to be; and there need be no hesitation in saying so, even after his production of the complicated emptiness of Claude Debussy last Thursday evening. As an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms and other classic masters Dr. Muck has proved himself to be an authority. What is still more to the point just at this moment is that he possesses the power of interesting an audience in his interpretation without centring its attention on himself, his personality and his idiosyncrasies.

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

The orchestral situation throughout the country is one of interest to the real lover of music. In Cincinnati the local orchestra has been forced out of existence through the exactions of labor union methods in orchestral organization. It will be recalled that at one time labor union regulations threatened the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thereupon Mr. Higgins, the supporter and virtual proprietor of that institution, announced that the moment he met with labor union troubles the orchestra would cease to exist. It has not so ceased and the demands of the unionists have not been heard since his proclamation.

In all probability they will be heard again sooner or later, for the union man, like the opponent of the army canteen, for instance, is always considering a principle, not a condition. It matters not to the opponent of the army canteen whether the soldier is worse off without it than with it. So long as the Government refuses to legalize the sale of "rum" at an army post the principle triumphs, be the conditions what they may. It is precisely the same with your true labor union man. It matters not whether he has employment or not, it matters not whether his family is hungry or not, so long as the demon capital is brought to terms and made to understand the true source of a nation's wealth is the operation of the workingman's muscles.

The Cincinnati Orchestra has been sacrificed to principle. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the labor union fiddlers and pipers in the Queen City knew that if they continued their demands the orchestra would be broken up. But that was merely a condition and they were fighting for a principle. They now have an opportunity to observe the beneficent workings of principle.

Of course this prattle about principle and condition sounds sensible only to persons of very credulous temperament. Those who have sufficient intelligence to reason about economic matters at all are well aware that the principles of economy are derived from conditions and are designed to meet conditions. That is what economics are for. Hence when musicians stand out for the principle that the laborer is worthy of his hire until they have created a condition in which there is not any hire they convict themselves of gigantic silliness.

No one, of course, can convince them of this. They are probably sitting around their beer tables in Cincinnati now proclaiming their triumph over the common enemy. Cincinnati can get on without its orchestra much better than the orchestra can get on without Cincinnati. No matter. The orchestra has won!

In this city a change has been made in the constitution of the Symphony Orchestra. The last time this body was reorganized it was made cooperative. The capitalists interested in the enterprise fancied that the musicians could be made their partners, and that then having an interest in the business of the orchestra they would strive mightily for its welfare. These capitalists speedily learned that the loudly proclaimed principle of organized labor that an injury to one is an injury to all could not stand inversion.

A benefit to all is a benefit to each, it turned out, is not recognized as a tenet in musical labor union circles. No sooner was the orchestra fairly on its feet in its new form than the primeval principle of every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost was found to be more imperative than all others. The musicians early discovered that they were the orchestra and that the capitalists who made their salaries sure were nothing but a lot of useless figureheads.

A small army of prima donnas could not have been more sensitive than these labor union musicians. If they had been dealing with a situation similar to that which lately existed in Cincinnati the New York Symphony Orchestra would have ceased to exist. Fortunately for the cause of art in this town the city is overrun with fairly good orchestral performers. Hence the capalists in the Symphony organization were in a position to enter upon a new plan when their contract with the members of the orchestra expired, as it does at the close of this season.

Next year the old organization of the New York Symphony Society, established many years ago by Leopold Damrosch, will be revived. The players will be engaged under contract to this organization. Then if they are not satisfied with their pay they will be in a position to resign and their places can be filled with others.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

MUSICAL MIRACLES BY BOSTON MEN

At Least They Were Pretty Nearly Accomplished Yesterday by "the Hub's" Great Orchestra.

One of the artistic and enjoyable concerts of the present season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, arranged a historical programme such as the true music lover delights to hear. It contained nothing but classics; every number was a great work, and, furthermore, all were splendidly played.

The programme announced Bach's B minor suite for flute and string orchestra, but at the last moment Dr. Muck substituted the same composer's concerto for strings, which was composed for the Margrave of Brandenburg. It was played with that freedom and spontaniety which go only with absolute confidence in the conductor, and the audience was quick to acknowledge the beautiful reading that Dr. Muck had given.

Haydn's Symphony in D, written for the London concert director, Saloman, was included in the scheme. It was refreshing and buoyant music of a kind that the ordinary lay musician can appreciate. Haydn's melodies are so clear and beautifully developed that the veriest tyro in music can follow them with intelligence, and when played as they were yesterday, the effect on the listener can only be one of unalloyed pleasure.

Mozart's favorite overture, that to "The Magic Flute," was given with great finish, and the enunciation of the fugal portion was played with great verve and clarity.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was the closing number. Dr. Muck's performance of it was such as to excite envy in the breast of the ordinary conductor. The musicians were entirely in touch with him and every department responded nobly to the appeals of the conductor, who certainly did not spare himself during a performance of sustained energy and uncommon eloquence. Perhaps the horns were not above suspicion in the matter of intonation, but such a charge can seldom be laid to the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. Press
March 24, 1907.

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Feast of Classical Music.

In marked contrast to Thursday night's programme, which was devoted to modern music (some of it of the most revolutionary kind), Dr. Muck offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last New York concert of the season, a feast of classical music that should have delighted the heart of the most intolerant of critics (one need mention no name). The concert opened with Bach's beautiful "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra (C minor), instead of the suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings originally announced. Then came Haydn's delightful symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 2) and the overture of Mozart's "The Magic Flute." Beethoven's refreshing symphony in F major, opus 93 (No. 8), brought the afternoon to a close.

Dr. Muck already had shown us that he was as admirable an interpreter of the classics as of the newest of the new in music. Therefore it was not surprising that playing upon so fine an instrument as the Boston Orchestra he attained results that were inspiring not only to those who find their pleasure in old music exclusively, but to others, who, we confidently believe, are in the majority. It was interesting to note that the applause was considerably less loud and enthusiastic than that which greeted Debussy's set of orchestral pieces, "The Sea," which one critic reported as "polite clapping of the hands."

It would be hard to pick out one number on yesterday's programme as giving the most satisfaction. But if any choice were made, our preference would fall on the Hayden symphony. Last year the Boston men played it under Gericke—played it "prettily," as we then noted. Yesterday such an adjective could not have been applied. The performance was beautiful and nothing less. Old fashioned music, yes; but under Muck's poetic wand every measure became infused with emotional significance. It was a modern reading of a classic. The great refinement of nuance of dynamical and rhythmical shading no doubt would have been strange to old "papa" Haydn. But Muck did not carry things too far. While making use of richer emotional vocabulary than Haydn's contemporaries would have understood, he kept well within the spirit of the music. One failed to detect anything which savored of searching for effect.

Not quite so impressive was the Mozart overture, in which the orchestra, to our way of thinking, was asked to strain unduly the sforzando on the sixteenth notes of the allegro.

Of the Beethoven symphony Muck gave a finely effective interpretation. His tempos varied slightly from those of some of his predecessors. He took the first movement somewhat faster than Seidl, Buelow and Safonoff, the second slower, the third faster and the fourth at a pace considerably more lively.

There are reasons for believing that the Emperor of Germany will give Dr. Muck another year's leave of absence, thus enabling him to be at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, but yesterday the conductor said he had not as yet been informed of any decision.

Staats Zeitung
March 25, 1907.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das letzte diesjährige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde mit Bach's Konzert für Streichorchester, genannt das „Brandenburg"-Konzert in G-dur eingeleitet (nicht C-moll, wie die Ankündigung besagte). Dr. Muck und sein Musterorchester brachten das Werk im Ganzen mit großer Klarheit und Plastik. Die Streicher entfalteten fast durchweg den ganzen Zauber ihres Wohllauts, doch war es nicht zu verkennen, daß der Dirigent mitunter den Violinen zu viel Ton entlocken wollte, was der Tonschönheit bekanntlich nicht eben förderlich ist.

Die hierauf folgende Haydn'sche Symphonie in D-dur erklang in Muck's Wiedergabe in sonniger Heiterkeit. Die ruhige Temponahme (ein geistreicher deutscher Kollege spricht von „Muck'scher Breite") kam dem Charakter des Werks trefflich zu Statten und verlieh der künstlerischen Darbietung vollendete Durchsichtigkeit.

In der „Zauberflöte"-Ouvertüre entwickelte Dr. Muck dagegen sehr zum Vortheil des Stücks eine flotte Temponahme, wodurch die langgezogenen Posaunenakkorde von besonderer Wirkung waren. Das fugirte Allegro kam in flottem Zeitmaß durchsichtig und klar heraus.

Die liebevollste Sorgfalt hatte sich der Dirigent jedoch auf Beethoven's „Achte" aufgespart. Er verlieh ihr jenes graziöse Behagen und den humoristischen Grundzug, der das Werk so auszeichnet. Besonders einschmeichelnd und fein-graziös erklang der zweite Satz, Allegretto, und das altväterliche Menuett; der dritte Satz, wurde mit glücklichster Mischung von altväterischer Gravität und bezaubernder Innigkeit herausgebracht. Im lieblichen Rondo, dieser „Idylle aus altwienerischer Musikantenzeit" schlug der Dirigent reizvoll-anheimelnde Töne an. Das in Rondoform gehaltene Finale war ein würdiger Abschluß.

Dr. Muck hat mit dieser Wiedergabe wieder einmal bewiesen, daß er der Mann sei, aus einem Monumentalwerk Alles darin Enthaltene zu tönendem Leben zu erwecken, ohne daß es ihn gelüstet, irgend etwas hineinzutragen, was dem Wesen und den Intentionen des Komponisten fremd ist.

H.

Boston Daily Globe.
Established March 4, 1872.
(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1878.
The Boston Sunday Globe.
First Issued Oct 14, 1877.
FRIDAY, MAR 29, 1907.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss Repeated at the Rehearsal Yesterday Afternoon.

On account of Good Friday the 19th rehearsal by the Symphony orchestra was set ahead one day and yesterday afternoon the following program was played: Cherubini's overture to "The Abencerrages," an opera almost forgotten; an aria from Rossi's opera, "Mitrane"; Oscar Fried's prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings, first time here; "The Captive," a melody by Berlioz, and the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss. Mrs Bertha Cussing Child, contralto, was the soloist. Cherubini's overture is largely martial in character and is written in a bold though rather conventional way as regards the brass contingent, which, of course, has plenty of loud declamations allotted it. Aside from the spirited style in which the work was performed the overture calls for no special praise.

Fried's prelude and double fugue for strings is an admirable example of the composer's skill in this kind of work, which lacking the contrasting instruments, is generally liable to be monotonous unless the forms are varied. The vigorous chord passages in the prelude were splendidly played and there was good material, too, in this introduction. In the fugue, which seems a bit old-fashioned by reason of being confined to strings, the contrasts in tempo and expression are well shown, the gradual working up to "dynamic intensity" making an effective finale. The ensemble playing of the string contingents was as near perfection as one can hope to hear and the beauty of tone was never marred even in the fortissimo passages, which are numerous and intricate.

Mrs Child's two contributions to the program were received with hearty appreciation, the lower register of her rich contralto showing to particular advantage in the Berlioz melody, "The Captive." In this the various emotions enabled the singer to color her tones to suit the sentiments which were adequately expressed in her vocalism. A little more vivacity and flexibility in execution would have bettered the verse recalling the "Spanish music" and her dear companions, but the interpretation as a whole was artistic and the sweet and resonant quality of the voice made the work very enjoyable. In the aria attributed to Francesco Rossi, Mrs Child sang as well as she did in the Bernoz melody, but the former was not so effective because of its more formal character.

The program closed with a repetition of the "Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss, the much discussed composition that was played at these concerts in February. Dr Muck and his orchestra performed the gigantic work in a masterly manner, surmounting the 50 minutes of technical difficulties with an ease that only skill and experience develops and reaching the thunderous tonal climax midst showers of applause. Doubtless the players deserved this tribute to their endurance and abilities. As for the worth of the composition opinions differ.

Next week's program will comprise two works by American authors, the D major symphony by Howard Brockway and Edward A. MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," will complete the selections. There will be no soloist.

per Globe
y New York
e State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

DR. KARL MUCK conducted the final concert here for the present season of the Boston Symphony series Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was probably not, however, the last appearance of Dr. Muck in New York. The imperial permission has been secured for his absence from Berlin during another season, and he will in all likelihood preside over the destinies of the Boston orchestra again next year. Dr. Muck, though not a Weingartner nor yet a Nikisch, is a capable conductor. If the band from Boston plays now with somewhat less than the perfection of finish that marked its work for Mr. Gericke, it has gained correspondingly in vigor and variety of expression. It is still by all odds the foremost orchestra in America if not in the world. Dr. Muck heads it worthily.

The one serious objection to the policy of Dr. Muck is his choice of programmes. "Unified" is, we believe, the word by which Dr. Muck defines his method. "Academic" and "long" are the adjectives that oftenest occur to his hearers. An eighteenth century programme, a Beethoven programme, a "romantic" programme, a Pan-Slavic programme, are results of the "unified" method. Nor has Dr. Muck hesitated to inflict on his hearers three symphonies in a single evening. In Europe this policy would provoke no opposition. There concertgoers are more docile and long concerts are the custom. Here the case is different. Thanks particularly to Theodore Thomas, Wilhelm Gericke, and Walter Damrosch, there exists an American tradition for symphony concert programmes, the keynote of which is not unity, but a judicious variety, with a time limit of at the utmost two hours. It is easy to say that this tradition is a concession to the restlessness and inherent frivolity of the American people. Some of us are firmly persuaded that it is rather a tribute to their quickness of perception and good taste.

Dr. Muck's programme on Saturday illustrated his idea of unity. Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, Haydn's D major symphony (B. & H. No. 2), Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in strict historical sequence, made it. Here was noble music. Not an item on the list but should adorn a serious orchestral concert. Yet is there any valid reason why two symphonies should be forced into a programme of four numbers—even though one of them is of Haydnesque brevity and the other Beethoven's "little symphony in F"? And what excuse can there be in this town of many concerts for gently leading an educated audience from Bach through Haydn and Mozart to Beethoven? The playing of the orchestra, to be sure, gave great pleasure. It was particularly good to hear the "Magic Flute" overture so effectively read, and the sympathetic performance of the Eighth Symphony—a little neglected even to-day—was something to be grateful for. Yet either piece might have been still more effective in a different setting. Perhaps when Dr. Muck returns next year he will show toward American audiences a little of the indulgence that he has shown toward American music.

The Boston Journal
MARCH 30, 1907.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Two American composers appear on the twentieth program, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They are Howard Brockway, now of the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and Edward A. MacDowell, by general consent the greatest musical talent this country has ever produced. Mr. Brockway will be represented by a symphony in D major, which will be heard here for the first time. MacDowell will be represented by his second suite, better known as the "Indian Suite," a work which has appeared frequently on Symphony programs. The final number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." There will be no soloist.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth and next to the last Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater on next Thursday evening, April 4. The soloist will be Miss Lillia Snelling of New York, a contralto, who will sing with the orchestra Adriano's aria from Rienzi "Gerechter Gott." She will also sing some songs with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain" and Beethoven's Symphony in F, No. 8.

The attention of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Quartet is called to the change in date of the sixth and last concert of this season's series. Instead of being given on Monday evening, April 1, it will be given three weeks from Monday, April 22, in Chickering Hall. This change of date has been made by general request, because Monday night is the opening of the season of grand

[171]

Paper Sun
City New York
Date MAR 24 1907 State N Y

The orchestral situation throughout the country is one of interest to the real lover of music. In Cincinnati the local orchestra has been forced out of existence through the exactions of labor union methods in orchestral organization. It will be recalled that at one time labor union regulations threatened the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thereupon Mr. Higgins, the supporter and virtual proprietor of that institution, announced that the moment he met with labor union troubles the orchestra would cease to exist. It has not so ceased and the demands of the unionists have not been heard since his proclamation.

In all probability they will be heard again sooner or later, for the union man, like the opponent of the army canteen, for instance, is always considering a principle, not a condition. It matters not to the opponent of the army canteen whether the soldier is worse off without it than with it. So long as the Government refuses to legalize the sale of "rum" at an army post the principle triumphs, be the conditions what they may. It is precisely the same with your true labor union man. It matters not whether he has employment or not, it matters not whether his family is hungry or not, so long as the demon capital is brought to terms and made to understand the true source of a nation's wealth is the operation of the workingman's muscles.

The Cincinnati Orchestra has been sacrificed to principle. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the labor union fiddlers and pipers in the Queen City knew that if they continued their demands the orchestra would be broken up. But that was merely a condition and they were fighting for a principle. They now have an opportunity to observe the beneficent workings of principle.

Of course this prattle about principle and condition sounds sensible only to persons of very credulous temperament Those who have sufficient intelligence to reason about economic matters at all are well aware that the principles of economy are derived from conditions and are designed to meet conditions. That is what economics are for. Hence when musicians stand out for the principle that the laborer is worthy of his hire until they have created a condition in which there is not any hire they convict themselves of gigantic silliness.

No one, of course, can convince them of this. They are probably sitting around their beer tables in Cincinnati now proclaiming their triumph over the common enemy. Cincinnati can get on without its orchestra much better than the orchestra can get on without Cincinnati. No matter. The orchestra has won!

In this city a change has been made in the constitution of the Symphony Orchestra. The last time this body was reorganized it was made cooperative. The capitalists interested in the enterprise fancied that the musicians could be made their partners, and that then having an interest in the business of the orchestra they would strive mightily for its welfare. These capitalists speedily learned that the loudly proclaimed principle of organized labor that an injury to one is an injury to all could not stand inversion.

A benefit to all is a benefit to each, it turned out, is not recognized as a tenet in musical labor union circles. No sooner was the orchestra fairly on its feet in its new form than the primeval principle of every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost was found to be more imperative than all others. The musicians early discovered that they were the orchestra and that the capitalists who made their salaries sure were nothing but a lot of useless figureheads.

A small army of prima donnas could not have been more sensitive than these labor union musicians. If they had been dealing with a situation similar to that which lately existed in Cincinnati the New York Symphony Orchestra would have ceased to exist. Fortunately for the cause of art in this town the city is overrun with fairly good orchestral performers. Hence the capalists in the Symphony organization were in a position to enter upon a new plan when their contract with the members of the orchestra expired, as it does at the close of this season.

Next year the old organization of the New York Symphony Society, established many years ago by Leopold Damrosch, will be revived. The players will be engaged under contract to this organization. Then if they are not satisfied with their state they will be in a position to resign and their places can be filled with others.

Paper Herald
City New York
Date Mar 24 1907 State N Y

MUSICAL MIRACLES BY BOSTON MEN

At Least They Were Pretty Nearly Accomplished Yesterday by "the Hub's" Great Orchestra.

One of the artistic and enjoyable concerts of the present season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, arranged a historical programme such as the true music lover delights to hear. It contained nothing but classics; every number was a great work, and, furthermore, all were splendidly played.

The programme announced Bach's B minor suite for flute and string orchestra, but at the last moment Dr. Muck substituted the same composer's concerto for strings, which was composed for the Margrave of Brandenburg. It was played with that freedom and spontaniety which go only with absolute confidence in the conductor, and the audience was quick to acknowledge the beautiful reading that Dr. Muck had given.

Haydn's Symphony in D, written for the London concert director, Saloman, was included in the scheme. It was refreshing and buoyant music of a kind that the ordinary lay musician can appreciate. Haydn's melodies are so clear and beautifully developed that the veriest tyro in music can follow them with intelligence, and when played as they were yesterday, the effect on the listener can only be one of unalloyed pleasure.

Mozart's favorite overture, that to "The Magic Flute," was given with great finish, and the enunciation of the fugal portion was played with great verve and clarity.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was the closing number. Dr. Muck's performance of it was such as to excite envy in the breast of the ordinary conductor. The musicians were entirely in touch with him and every department responded nobly to the appeals of the conductor, who certainly did not spare nimself during a performance of sustained energy and uncommon eloquence. Perhaps the horns were not above suspicion in the matter of intonation, but such a charge can seldom be laid to the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. Press
March 24, 1907.

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Feast of Classical Music.

In marked contrast to Thursday night's programme, which was devoted to modern music (some of it of the most revolutionary kind), Dr. Muck offered yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last New York concert of the season, a feast of classical music that should have delighted the heart of the most intolerant of critics (one need mention no name). The concert opened with Bach's beautiful "Brandenburg" concerto for string orchestra (C minor), instead of the suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings originally announced. Then came Haydn's delightful symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 2) and the overture of Mozart's "The Magic Flute." Beethoven's refreshing symphony in F major, opus 93 (No. 8), brought the afternoon to a close.

Dr. Muck already had shown us that he was as admirable an interpreter of the classics as of the newest of the new in music. Therefore it was not surprising that playing upon so fine an instrument as the Boston Orchestra he attained results that were inspiring not only to those who find their pleasure in old music exclusively, but to others, who, we confidently believe, are in the majority. It was interesting to note that the applause was considerably less loud and enthusiastic than that which greeted Debussy's set of orchestral pieces, "The Sea," which one critic reported as "polite clapping of the hands."

It would be hard to pick out one number on yesterday's programme as giving the most satisfaction. But if any choice were made, our preference would fall on the Hayden symphony. Last year the Boston men played it under Gericke—played it "prettily," as we then noted. Yesterday such an adjective could not have been applied. The performance was beautiful and nothing less. Old fashioned music, yes; but under Muck's poetic wand every measure became infused with emotional significance. It was a modern reading of a classic. The great refinement of nuance of dynamical and rhythmical shading no doubt would have been strange to old "papa" Haydn. But Muck did not carry things too far. While making use of richer emotional vocabulary than Haydn's contemporaries would have understood, he kept well within the spirit of the music. One failed to detect anything which savored of searching for effect.

Not quite so impressive was the Mozart overture, in which the orchestra, to our way of thinking, was asked to strain unduly the sforzando on the sixteenth notes of the allegro.

Of the Beethoven symphony Muck gave a finely effective interpretation. His tempos varied slightly from those of some of his predecessors. He took the first movement somewhat faster than Seidl, Buelow and Safonoff, the second slower, the third faster and the fourth at a pace considerably more lively.

There are reasons for believing that the Emperor of Germany will give Dr. Muck another year's leave of absence, thus enabling him to be at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, but yesterday the conductor said he had not as yet been informed of any decision.

Staats Zeitung
March 25, 1907.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das letzte diesjährige Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters wurde mit Bach's Konzert für Streichorchester, genannt das „Brandenburg"-Konzert in G-dur eingeleitet (nicht C-moll, wie die Ankündigung besagte). Dr. Muck und sein Musterorchester brachten das Werk im Ganzen mit großer Klarheit und Plastik. Die Streicher entfalteten fast durchweg den ganzen Zauber ihres Wohllauts, doch war es nicht zu verkennen, daß der Dirigent mitunter den Violinen zu viel Ton entlocken wollte, was der Tonschönheit bekanntlich nicht eben förderlich ist.

Die hierauf folgende Haydn'sche Symphonie in D-dur erklang in Muck's Wiedergabe in sonniger Heiterkeit. Die ruhige Temponahme (ein geistreicher deutscher Kollege spricht von „Muck'scher Breite") kam dem Charakter des Werks trefflich zu Statten und verlieh der künstlerischen Darbietung vollendete Durchsichtigkeit.

In der „Zauberflöte"-Ouvertüre entwickelte Dr. Muck dagegen sehr zum Vortheil des Stücks eine flotte Temponahme, wodurch die langgezogenen Posaunenakkorde von besonderer Wirkung waren. Das fugirte Allegro kam in flottem Zeitmaß durchsichtig und klar heraus.

Die liebevollste Sorgfalt hatte sich der Dirigent jedoch auf Beethoven's „Achte" aufgespart. Er verlieh ihr jenes graziöse Behagen und den humoristischen Grundzug, der das Werk so auszeichnet. Besonders einschmeichelnd und fein-graziös erklang der zweite Satz, Allegretto, und das altväterliche Menuett; der dritte Satz, wurde mit glücklichster Mischung von altväterischer Gravität und bezaubernder Innigkeit herausgebracht. Im lieblichen Rondo, dieser „Idylle aus altwienerischer Musikantenzeit" schlug der Dirigent reizvoll-anheimelnde Töne an. Das in Rondoform gehaltene Finale war ein würdiger Abschluß.

Dr. Muck hat mit dieser Wiedergabe wieder einmal bewiesen, daß er der Mann sei, aus einem Monumentalwerk Alles darin Enthaltene zu tönendem Leben zu erwecken, ohne daß es ihn gelüstet, irgend etwas hineinzutragen, was dem Wesen und den Intentionen des Komponisten fremd ist.

H.

Boston Daily Globe.
Established March 4, 1872.
(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1878.
THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE.
First Issued Oct 14, 1877.
FRIDAY, MAR 29, 1907.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss Repeated at the Rehearsal Yesterday Afternoon.

On account of Good Friday the 19th rehearsal by the Symphony orchestra was set ahead one day and yesterday afternoon the following program was played: Cherubini's overture to "The Abencerrages," an opera almost forgotten; an aria from Rossi's opera, "Mitrane"; Oscar Fried's prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings, first time here; "The Captive," a melody by Berlioz, and the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss. Mrs Bertha Cushing Child, contralto, was the soloist. Cherubini's overture is largely martial in character and is written in a bold though rather conventional way as regards the brass contingent, which, of course, has plenty of loud declamations allotted it. Aside from the spirited style in which the work was performed the overture calls for no special praise.

Fried's prelude and double fugue for strings is an admirable example of the composer's skill in this kind of work, which lacking the contrasting instruments, is generally liable to be monotonous unless the forms are varied. The vigorous chord passages in the prelude were splendidly played and there was good material, too, in this introduction. In the fugue, which seems a bit old-fashioned by reason of being confined to strings, the contrasts in tempo and expression are well shown, the gradual working up to "dynamic intensity" making an effective finale. The ensemble playing of the string contingents was as near perfection as one can hope to hear and the beauty of tone was never marred even in the fortissimo passages, which are numerous and intricate.

Mrs Child's two contributions to the program were received with hearty appreciation, the lower register of her rich contralto showing to particular advantage in the Berlioz melody, "The Captive." In this the various emotions enabled the singer to color her tones to suit the sentiments which were adequately expressed in her vocalism. A little more vivacity and flexibility in execution would have bettered the verse recalling the "Spanish music" and her dear companions, but the interpretation as a whole was artistic and the sweet and resonant quality of the voice made the work very enjoyable. In the aria attributed to Francesco Rossi, Mrs Child sang as well as she did in the Berlioz melody, but the former was not so effective because of its more formal character.

The program closed with a repetition of the "Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss, the much discussed composition that was played at these concerts in February. Dr Muck and his orchestra performed the gigantic work in a masterly manner, surmounting the 50 minutes of technical difficulties with an ease that only skill and experience develops and reaching the thunderous tonal climax midst showers of applause. Doubtless the players deserved this tribute to their endurance and abilities. As for the worth of the composition opinions differ.

Next week's program will comprise two works by American authors, the D major symphony by Howard Brockway and Edward A. MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," will complete the selections. There will be no soloist.

---

per Globe
y New York
e State N Y

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

DR. KARL MUCK conducted the final concert here for the present season of the Boston Symphony series Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The occasion was probably not, however, the last appearance of Dr. Muck in New York. The imperial permission has been secured for his absence from Berlin during another season, and he will in all likelihood preside over the destinies of the Boston orchestra again next year. Dr. Muck, though not a Weingartner nor yet a Nikisch, is a capable conductor. If the band from Boston plays now with somewhat less than the perfection of finish that marked its work for Mr. Gericke, it has gained correspondingly in vigor and variety of expression. It is still by all odds the foremost orchestra in America, if not in the world. Dr. Muck heads it worthily.

The one serious objection to the policy of Dr. Muck is his choice of programmes. "Unified" is, we believe, the word by which Dr. Muck defines his method. "Academic" and "long" are the adjectives that oftenest occur to his hearers. An eighteenth century programme, a Beethoven programme, a "romantic" programme, a Pan-Slavic programme, are results of the "unified" method. Nor has Dr. Muck hesitated to inflict on his hearers three symphonies in a single evening. In Europe this policy would provoke no opposition. There concertgoers are more docile and long concerts are the custom. Here the case is different. Thanks particularly to Theodore Thomas, Wilhelm Gericke, and Walter Damrosch, there exists an American tradition for symphony concert programmes, the keynote of which is not unity, but a judicious variety, with a time limit of at the utmost two hours. It is easy to say that this tradition is a concession to the restlessness and inherent frivolity of the American people. Some of us are firmly persuaded that it is rather a tribute to their quickness of perception and good taste.

Dr. Muck's programme on Saturday illustrated his idea of unity. Bach's third Brandenburg concerto, Haydn's D major symphony (B. & H. No. 2), Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in strict historical sequence, made it. Here was noble music. Not an item on the list but should adorn a serious orchestral concert. Yet is there any valid reason why two symphonies should be forced into a programme of four numbers—even though one of them is of Haydnesque brevity and the other Beethoven's "little symphony in F"? And what excuse can there be in this town of many concerts for gently leading an educated audience from Bach through Haydn and Mozart to Beethoven? The playing of the orchestra, to be sure, gave great pleasure. It was particularly good to hear the "Magic Flute" overture so effectively read, and the sympathetic performance of the Eighth Symphony—a little neglected even to-day—was something to be grateful for. Yet either piece might have been still more effective in a different setting. Perhaps when Dr. Muck returns next year he will show toward American audiences a little of the indulgence that he has shown toward American music.

The Boston Journal
MARCH 30, 1907.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Two American composers appear on the twentieth program, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They are Howard Brockway, now of the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and Edward A. MacDowell, by general consent the greatest musical talent this country has ever produced. Mr. Brockway will be represented by a symphony in D major, which will be heard here for the first time. MacDowell will be represented by his second suite, better known as the "Indian Suite," a work which has appeared frequently on Symphony programs. The final number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." There will be no soloist.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth and next to the last Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theater on next Thursday evening, April 4. The soloist will be Miss Lillia Snelling of New York, a contralto, who will sing with the orchestra Adriano's aria from Rienzi "Gerechter Gott." She will also sing some songs with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "Carnaval Romain" and Beethoven's Symphony in F, No. 8.

The attention of the patrons of the Boston Symphony Quartet is called to the change in date of the sixth and last concert of this season's series. Instead of being given on Monday evening, April 1, it will be given three weeks from Monday, April 22, in Chickering Hall. This change of date has been made by general request, because Monday night is the opening of the season of grand

[171]

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

STRAUSS'S "DOMESTICA" FOR THE THIRD TIME

A Thrilling Performance to an Excited Audience at the Symphony Concert Yesterday—A Little Clearing of the Ground Around Strauss—What He Has Sought in the "Domestica" and What He Has Accomplished — His Expression of His Own Time—Miss Doro as a Romantic Odalisque—George Cohan's New Play—A Word About Opera Hours—Other News of the Day

As usual in Holy Week the first of the Symphony concerts fell on Thursday, instead of Friday, afternoon, and after four short pieces—Cherubini's overture to his opera, "The Abencerrages"; a prelude and double fugue for string orchestra by Oskar Fried, once a musical protégé of Dr. Muck; the familiar air that custom rather than fact attributes to the Abbé Rossi's mythical "Mitrane," and Berlioz's melody, "The Captive," both sung by Mrs. Child— the conductor and the band passed to the promised repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This time it stood at the end of the programme, instead of the beginning; but there were far fewer departures during the progress of the music than usually befall when a classic symphony closes the concert. The audience listened not only eagerly but intelligently. It plainly responded to the glowing beauty and throbbing instrumental power of the slow movement, and—still finer and rarer proof of its alert discernment—it plainly caught the humor and humanity of the double fugue of disputation. "If you try to follow the programme and hear the baby cry and splash, you get all excited. It 's much nicer just to listen," said the discreet seventeen-year-old behind us, obviously at home for the Easter holidays. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Clearly our audiences are learning to listen to Strauss wisely, and as clearly they hear him gladly. Dr. Muck and the band rewarded their listeners, yesterday, with a performance that had not quite the fineness of tonal texture and the luminous adjustment of those last month, but that much excelled them in freedom of feeling and ardor of utterance. Before the symphony was far under way, the conductor, the band, and the audience, all seemed to feel the excitement of the music; each acted and reacted upon the other; and for once there was genuine and pervasive abandon even at an afternoon concert. In such mood the slow movement turned incandescent, and conductor, men and listeners fairly flung themselves into the fugue. The élan of the music and the performance was irresistible, and at the end the orchestra was as joyously riotous as Bacchantes. The audience had no outlet for its own excitement but applause, and though the concert had been long, it stood in its place, recalled the conductor twice and thrice and once brought the whole band to its feet. And yet the prigs and pedants say that there is no public for Strauss's music and that it gives an average audience no pleasure! Since the season began there has been no such tumult at an afternoon concert.

The maid of the row behind was wise with the wisdom of youth. The true way to appreciate the music of Strauss and especially the music of the "Domestica," is to listen to it. Let Strauss contrive his realistic backgrounds and details as he will. He has done so in all his tone-poems from "Til Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" through "Quixote," "A Hero's Life" and the "Domestica." It is the spirit of the time and the nature of the man, eager for new musical conquests, to court them. But the minutiæ of all these things really concern only the "eminent programmists" from Berlin even unto Boston, and those who will not listen imaginatively to delineate music, but by some fault of temperament must grub laboriously through it. Who when he looks at Rodin's "Kiss" or "The Spring," unless he is a sculptor or a maker of handbooks, examines every boss of the rock upon which the lovers are embracing. It is but the background to the passion and the humanity of the whole—the passion and the humanity that Rodin has wrought into his marble as Strauss has wrought them into the tones of the "Domestica." At every repetition of the tone-poem these details adjust themselves into the mass and framework of the whole, and pass little noted where they first seem to flare. Let the baby splash in the muted trumpets, let the clock begin and end the day on the glockenspiel; let the mother deal the "quick slap" of maternal restraint in the instruments of percussion. Let Strauss have his humorous play with these "realistic" details—for humor in music is rare and good; but what is really his concern and ours who listen is his idealization of the emotions that all these minutiæ of domestic life awaken, and his human and musical expression of those emotions. Again, the only way to hear Strauss is to listen—and listen largely.

Equally so with his polyphony and his instrumentation. Every student of modern music knows those intricate and marvellous patterns in tones that fill the pages of Strauss's orchestral scores. They are indeed for study and meditation, by composers, by pedagogues, by theorists, by dilettanti. But the place for such study is the library rather than the concert-room, and the study itself is not for the average listener, even of musical intelligence and cultivation. Strauss's polyphony and his instrumentation are only his means to his ends. He has not written his tone-poems that learned musical Thebans may draw the web of his polyphony into every separate thread or that other of these same toiling Bœotians may pick instrument from instrument in his orchestration as they would separate a heap of jackstraws. All these are but the means to the imparting of thought, emotion and character, to the weaving of backgrounds, to the quickening of responsive understanding and to the stirring of responsive emotion in those that hear. Who, to return again to the statues of Rodin, except the sculptor and the handbook persons, notes the modelling of each muscle in the man and the woman? They are but the means of the sculptor's thought, feeling, characterization. The beholder, until he falls into the vice of analysis of his own emotions, feels but the passion and the truth of the whole. Recall the glowing walls of Turners in the National Gallery in London. Who analyses Turner's color-scheme and searches out the methods of his palette before the incandescence and the iridescence in which the eye is bathing? It is so with Strauss's music, which is often music of color in the instruments, of characterization in the melodies and harmonies and of passion, though always ordered passion, through and through.

And so, once more, with Strauss's choice of subjects. We who listen, or even those of us who compose music or are fain to compose it, might not choose Zarathustra or Don Quixote or a day in our lives for our tone-poems. Strauss, however, is writing his, and his temperament, imagination and ideals, his response to impulses from without and within, condition his choice. We who listen and judge have no right to question it. The chosen subject stirs ideas and emotions in him as he broods upon it, and these he would express in music, conditioning, naturally and legitimately, his form and means to them. Side by side with this utterance of feeling he would characterize in music the exciting causes of these emotions. Then we listeners may properly enter with our questionings. What is the goal he has sought? Has he attained it? Has he communicated his ideas and emotions to us and stirred in us the responsive feeling that was quick in him? Has he characterized when he sought to characterize? Has he gained the glowing color that he sought? True, characterization is a relatively new function of music. Yet no "unwritten law," so far as we know, forbids the extension of the expressive range of music, and not even the dicta of the chop-house and the pressrooms in New York will stay its widening. That Strauss has enlarged and intensified that range is cause for rejoicing and not for deprecation and attack. It is one of his contributions to the vitality of the art and a contribution that was bound to come in a time which in every art, in poetry and in letters, in painting and sculpture, seeks characterization. Strauss, being a man and an artist, and not a Frankenstein, can no more resist the voice of his time than can we listeners resist it when it calls in his music. He has departed from established canons of form; he has sought new harmonies, new rhythms and combinations of rhythms; he has pursued shifting tonalities. The more, the merrier. Thereby he is proving that music is still a living art, that grows and that the prigs and pedants may not crib and confine in their withered withes of pedagogy. Do all these innovations more truly and fully express the things that he would say and bring the emotions he would summon? If they do—and often there is no questioning their accomplishment of his ends—then is he justified of them, and then again has he widened and intensified his art.

It is all of the restless seeking of his time and ours; only Strauss, more than most of us, has found his goal and bidden us to it. Akin, to note a last objection, is his mingling of idealism and realism in his tone-poems, of the details of the baby's bath and comparing aunts with the intense and sublimated expression of the love of a husband and a father and of the joy of lusty life, for example, in the "Domestica." But is not this equally of our time and of all the arts in it and does it not intensify their appeal to us? In fact it is as old as Rembrandt in painting, as Shakspeare in poetry, as Bach in music. Yet in our own time Jean Béraud's "Supper at Emmaus" has not less appeal because in the room that the Christ's halo lights is an adoring figure in the frock-coat of our fashion. Rodin's Balzac is not less puissant and graphic for its mingling of an heroic figure of the imagination with the literal details of the novelist's grossness. There, as in the "Domestica," the " realism" is background, detail and characterization, while the idealism is the emotions that these things awake in the artist and that he would summon in his audience.

In a word, the chief, sane and legitimate inquiries as we listen to the "Domestica" or to any other of Strauss's tone poems and reflect upon them, are what end has he sought in them and how fully has he achieved it. In the "Sinfonia Domestica," say the "programmists" and the commentators what they will that end is luminously clear. The love of husband and wife, the love of a father for his child, the joy of domestic happiness, of affectionate reverie, of light and intimate play, the zest of the work that a man cherishes and the ambition he brings to it are very profound, universal and stirring emotions. They have the simplicity and the intensity of primitive things. They are very deeply and thrillingly human. Obviously they lend themselves to musical expression and idealization, unless music is to be reduced to mathematical pattern-weaving in tones. Whence at bottom do these emotions spring? From the daily round, from the common human experience and common human habit, and they are the more glorious and puissant for their humble source. With the more reason, therefore, may music touch them with its idealizing magic. Apprehending these things and feeling them, Strauss would write in the "Domestica," the tone-poem of them that others might see with the same eyes and feel with similar emotions. He would contrive his realistic background, make his melodies, his harmonies, his rhythms and his instrumentation characterize and delineate as are his wont and skill. Against this background and athwart these details should glow the emotions that this daily round may summon to intense, idealizing and poetic imagination, until they possess all them that [illegible] of living, and still more of the joy, the variety, the zest of life. He would write it in the musical and the poetic terms of our time, and above all in the terms of humanity.

If this be Strauss's goal—and every repetition of the "Sinfonia Domestica" strengthens our faith that it is—he has, as it seems to us, altogether succeeded. There in the music is the realistic and suggestive background falling into its due place, wrought indeed by shifting tonalities, bold and incisive modulations, pricking combinations and differentiations of instrumental timbres, by acrid transitions and drastic dissonances. The means pass; the results remain, imaginative, vivid, characterizing. It matters little whether the listener notes and identifies each detail of this background. As soon ask him to separate each color in the light that irradiates Turner's Carthage. It suffices that the background is woven; the atmosphere compassed; the luminous color suggested. To any sympathetic hearer Strauss's music in the "Domestica" achieves these things. Still more does it impart, characterize, intensify and idealize the emotions upspringing from this background and illuminating it and us who hear. It were a late day indeed to dwell anew upon the suggestion of the melodies that characterize the father as mere sensual man, as man of action, and as a man of poetic and contemplative imagination, or of the two that characterize yet more vividly the innate capriciousness and the innate gentleness of the mother and the woman; or of that which sings the groping mystery of childhood. It is as superfluous now to dwell upon the charm of the scherzo of the child's play or of the insinuating and possessing beauty of the passages of the mother's tenderness. Still less is there need to recall the pulsing, power-music at the very white heat of melodic and instrumental incandescence—of the adagio of the zest, the dreams, the passion of living. Little enough music of our time has matched it in emotional compulsion. Yesterday, once more, it held the audience rapt; it gripped seemingly even the conductor and the band until the whole hall sang with it.

And near its close and thence almost to the end of the symphony is the humanity by which Strauss seems to set such store. It is present indeed in the very unfolding of the characteristic melodies at the beginning,, and it quivers under all the play of the scherzo. But in the phantoms of the dreaming night, shadowy, fleeting, half real, half ghostly, the fitful images and echoes of the passions of the waking day—this humanity begins to dominate the music. Quickly it takes another turn in the joyous and lusty debate of the husband and wife in the double fugue that certainly makes clashing temperaments, and almost makes clashing human speech music. The humanity and the humor of it are equal; the exuberance of it in fancy and in expression swells both. It is fit preluding to the riotous joy of the close, to the pæan to the joy and the zest of living and of living here and now, in this time of ours, ours and ours. And the secret of this achievement from the beginning to the end of the "Sinfonia Domestica" is plain—plain as it is in every one of the Strauss's tone-poems. Admit all of his former limitations and he does not try to hide them; grant any just reproach against his aims and methods. Yet one salient fact remains; whatever the means, he has raised the expressive power of music higher than any composer has ever raised it before. He has widened its range. He has amplified and intensified its speech. He has made it the voice, not of a fixed and abstract art, of mathematical process, of circumscribed emotions, but of our humanity, of the time in which he and we, his audience, live, and of the thoughts, moods and emotions that stir in him and in us. He has written with the ordered power that is the deepest passion, and the response is sure—be it for the "Domestica" or for the crown of all his music, "Salome."

H. P.

Dr. Muck has nearly achieved an "All-American" programme for the Symphony concerts next week. It begins with Howard Brockway's symphony in D major, which is new to Boston; proceeds with MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and then ends with Weber's overture to his opera of "Euryanthe," the third of Weber's overtures that Dr. Muck has played this season. Those to "Preciosa" and "Abu Hassan" still remain.

The farewell concert of Mr. Schroeder, the violinist, originally set for Tuesday evening, April 23, at Chickering Hall, has been deferred until the following Thursday, April 25, to avoid conflict with Miss Powell's violin recital on the date first named.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1907

Concerts Next Week

For the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts Dr. Muck has nearly made an "All-American" programme. The symphony in D major that begins it and that is new to Boston is the work of Howard Brockway, an American composer still in his thirties, who was born in Brooklyn, studied in Berlin, and is now a teacher in the Peabody Conservatory at Baltimore. He wrote the symphony ten years and more ago, and it was played in Berlin in 1895. There, possibly, Dr. Muck heard it and has since cherished his memories of it. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" follows, in some respects the ablest of his compositions for orchestra and in all respects a lesson to those rampant folk-lorists who fancy that music can be made out of aboriginal scraps of tunes without such imagination as MacDowell brought to it. The scraps fortunately are few, but dull the imagination alert and abundant, and the music that it animates is interesting and pictorial. MacDowell transfigures his Indians. Your folk-lorist usually is as literal as the multiplication table. Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," ends the concert—the third of Weber's overtures in the course of the current season. Others remain.

The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck give the fifth of their current series of concerts in Cambridge on Thursday evening, at eight, with the assistance of Miss Lillia Snelling, a young alto singer from New York. The orchestral numbers on the programme are Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Beethoven's eighth symphony, lately played at the symphony concerts in Boston. Miss Snelling sings the page's air from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi" and a group of songs.

Boston Sunday Globe.
First Issued Oct 14, 1877.
THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE.
Established March 4, 1872.
(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1878.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two American composers are on this week's Symphony program. They are Howard Brockway, now of the Peabody conservatory in Baltimore, and Edward A. MacDowell. Mr Brockway will be represented by a symphony in D major, which will be heard here for the first time. The symphony is not new, having been played in Berlin as long ago as April, 1895.

MacDowell will be represented by his second suite, better known as the "Indian Suite," a work which has appeared frequently on Symphony programs. The performance of Mr MacDowell's work gains interest at this time through the general movement that is being made to raise a fund, that now in his days of misfortune he may be kept from want. The final number will be Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." There will be no soloist.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The fifth and next to the last concert in Cambridge by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Miss Lillia Snelling of New York. Miss Snelling is a contralto, who in the last year or so has risen to great prominence in her city as a soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Adriano's aria from "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott." She will also sing some songs with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers will be Berlioz' overture, "Carnival Romain," and Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8.

Paper Telegram

City New York

Date State N Y

Boston Symphony at Their Final Matinee.

WITH a programme entirely consisting of ensemble orchestral numbers and including two complete symphonies, Haydn's No. 2 in D major, and Beethoven's No. 8 in F major, Dr. Karl Muck, at Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon conducted the fifth and last matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city. Such an assemblage as the "Down East" band invariably draws to its concerts, and in which the metropolitan monde élite is well represented, heard and applauded the farewell offerings.

Not only did Dr. Muck's programme approach to a dual birthday anniversary observance—for Haydn and Bach were born respectively 175 and 220 years ago next Sunday—but it came within three days of honoring the eightieth anniversary of the death of Beethoven, March 26, 1827, at Vienna.

Substituted for Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, the C minor Brandenburg concerto of the same composer opened the programme. It was extraordinarily well executed, the tone production being a very even one.

The lights, the shadows of the summer sun's rays athwart a trellised arbor—such, figuratively speaking, are the tonal effects of Haydn's exquisite symphony, and of the opportunity for this play of delicate nuance, of melodic and harmonic tracery the Boston musicians made full advantage, individually and collectively. In particular the first and second movements, with their tender, haunting spirituality, were given fine representations.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which was finely payed, was followed by the "Little" symphony of the master, Beethoven. This sprightly, characteristic work, has appeared on many Carnegie Hall programmes in recent years, but never has been played with more esprit or with a truer appreciation of its many-fold beauties. The lighter, gayer portions, were especially well set forth under the compelling beat of the German conductor.

[172]

BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, MARCH 31,

REPEAT STRAUSS FAMILY SYMPHONY

Colossal "Domestic" Work of Great Composer Has Second Performance in Boston.

FOLLOWS MIXED PROGRAM

By Kent Perkins.

At the close of a program decidedly mixed in character, yet interesting on that very account, Richard Strauss' forty-five-minute straight-away Family Symphony (Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53) was repeated by Dr. Muck and the Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall last night.

The leader was greeted with uncommon warmth when he took his place, as it was his first appearance in the hall since the announcement that the Kaiser had consented to let him stay in Boston another year.

The Strauss symphony was played a second time at the request of many patrons of the concerts. The discussion that it has aroused and its colossal proportions, which render it quite indigestible at one hearing, made this request natural, and Dr. Muck, though he is said to be no admirer of the work, accommodatingly yielded.

There were vacant seats here and there in the hall and many new faces were seen in the audience, indicating that numbers of regular patrons had stayed at home or bestowed their tickets upon friends.

Performance a Splendid One.

The conductor and the players gave their best efforts to the Strauss Colossus and the result was a magnificent triumph of musical art. Those portions of the work—and they are many— which possess delicacy and refinement or strength and beauty unspoiled by noise and bluster or alleged humor, were played with a wealth of imagination and luminous coloring that made one wish that the composer had taken only twelve hours in the Strauss domicile instead of twenty-four for musical illustration and had also cut out large portions of the family strife.

If this had been done there would be less reason for criticism of the work on the ground of unmusical realism and the exaltation of the cheap and the commonplace. But Herr Strauss preferred to give the world twenty-four strenuous hours of his domestic joys and conflicts, and it is therefore pertinent to inquire if this is real musical art.

The fact that it is done by a skilled master of orchestration and tonal effects has no bearing on this inquiry. There have been Dutch masters who have painted quarters of beef hanging in a shop so skillfully and realistictily that butchers, seeing the pictures, have itched to get at them with cleaver and saw. Is such work high art? If Raphael had given to the world a photographic reproduction of a peasant woman spanking her child instead of the Sistine Madonna, would it not be cause for regret?

Chances for American Composers.

If the Strauss family and its fierce bickerings as well as its peaceful joys are worthy subjects for a great musical artist's best efforts, there are fine subjects open to American composers, who with the aid of the Symphony Orchestra might make Herr Strauss's "Symphonia" sound like a penny whistle. There is "A Day in the Fore River Shipbuilding Yard," for example. The "modern" musical possibilities in the riveting of armor plate on a battleship are immense. Then there might be "Twenty-four Hours on a New Hampshire Farm." How charming would be "the feeding of the cows at 4 a. m."! What gales of fun could be got out of "The bull chases the city visitors!" And, "when the favorite hen laid an egg," the cackling of the barnyard might be given with irresistible effect.

The variety in the first half of the program is seen by a glance at the list: Cherubini, overture to "The Abencerrages"; Francesco Rossi, of the 17th century, air "Ah, Give Me Back That Heart," beautifully sung by Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child; Oskar Fried, a living German composer and friend of Dr. Muck's, prelude and double fugue, heard here for the first time, and Berlioz, "The Captive," sung by Mrs. Child.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., No. 90.
SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1907.

FRIED'S DOUBLE FUGUE IS GIVEN

Thoughts Suggested by an Old Overture at Symphony Concert.

MRS. CHILD IN SONGS BY ROSSI AND BY BERLIOZ

Strauss' Domestic Symphony Is Given a Second Hearing Yesterday.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Abencerrages".....Cherubini
Air from "Mitrane".....Rossi
Prelude and double fugue.....Fried
Melody, "The Captive".....Berlioz
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

The prelude and double fugue were played in Boston for the first time; Strauss' symphony was performed the second time this season "by request"; yet it might not be extravagant to say that the old overture of Cherubini was to some the feature of the concert, not so much by reason of the music itself as by the thoughts which the music suggested.

Let a composer today employ all the modern orchestral instruments, add instruments just invented and as yet untried, awaken ancient instruments from their sleep in museums; let him strive his utmost to be realistic or impressionistic; let him plot cunningly a harmonic system still more ingenious and more subtle than that of Mr. Debussy, and yet, even though he be a man of talent and imagination, he will not surpass, in all probability he will not equal, Cherubini with his overture to "Anacreon" or Gluck with his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," two of the noblest works in the whole literature of music. Yet how apparently simple are the two overtures!

Bomphiologia a Vice.

Old English writers on style warned their readers against bomphiologia, the vice of pompous speech. This is the prevailing vice of many modern composers. Others have either the "over-heavy richness and encumbered gait" of the Asiatic style, or they are masters of the Corinthian, which, as Matthew Arnold characterized it, has "glitter without warmth, rapidity without ease, effectiveness without charm." But the style of Gluck and Cherubini is Attic.

Cherubini might be called the man in music without a country. An Italian by birth and training, he is not Italian in his works. He lived in Paris for over half a century, but he was not influenced one jot by French taste. The Germans fondly claimed him as their own, and Beethoven declared him to be the greatest of composers then living; but in what respect is Cherubini's music German? If his thought was at home in any one land, that land was Greece, for in form and in expression his best music is Attic, "perfect in lucidity, measure and propriety." Furthermore, there is no note of provinciality.

Suppose, for instance, that a modern composer of the advanced school were to write an overture suggested by a legend of the Abencerrages. He would have his theme typical of the Moors and his theme typical of the Castilians. His chief aim would be to secure local color. He would introduce guitars, tambourines and castanets. There would be the traditional dance rhythms. He might use old Spanish themes which have been likened unto howlings of Tarshish. With all his apparatus, with all his historical research, with all his striving and straining, his music might be without suggestion of magnificence, romance, chivalry.

Simplicity of Sappho.

And thus the modern poet may put on perfumed singing robes and chant his love longing in Swinburnian rhythm and with Swinburnian gorgeousness and prolixity, while Sappho said simply and for all time: "The moon has set, and the Pleiades; it is midnight, the time is going by, and I sleep alone."

The overture to "The Abencerrages" is not so noble a work as the overture to "Anacreon," yet it has calm strength, the strength that suggests reserve force, beauty of line and of general architecture, stately, clear sonority. There is also the elegance that is not frosty, that is not mere fastidiousness. It is the elegance of one accustomed to think large thoughts even when the exciting cause may in itself be insignificant. The libretto of "The Abencerrages," they said at the time, was cold and dull. Nevertheless the title alone might inspire chivalric and superb music.

Mr. Oskar Fried, after a vagabond life, became famous in Berlin three years ago through the interest of Dr. Muck, who produced "Das trunkne Lied" at a concert of the Wagner Society. Mr. Fried is now a conductor and has little time to compose. The works that are published were written when he was poor and unknown.

New Wine in Old Bottles.

He is enamoured of scholastic forms. His delight is in canons. Yet into the old bottles, it is said, he pours new and heady wine. The contrapuntal wine of this Prelude and double fugue is certainly not madding; it is not a mild intoxicant. The prelude has a certain robustness; the fugue is honestly made; but the music is not such as to awaken an imperious desire to join Mr. Fried in his contrapuntal orgies.

Dr. Muck conducted an impressive performance of Strauss' "Domestic" symphony. The work made, on the whole, a stronger impression than at the first hearing. It is easy to say that Strauss' themes are often trivial or vulgar; that in this symphony he delights in sudden contrasts between gigantic complexity and extreme naivete; that he obscures thought by turgid or pleonastic expression. These charges, after all, are only partially true, and often they are wholly false. The symphony needs no programme. "Parents and Child" would serve as a sub-title. Again the music of the child and its sports and that of the love scene seemed the most spontaneous and the richest pages of the work.

Unnecessary Chatter.

Again there seemed to be unnecessary chatter in the final section, which, by the way, was played even more effectively than it was before. The performance was a brilliant one, and the few slips were so apparent, and the difficulties which engendered them were also so apparent, that it would be folly to insist on them.

There are some in Europe and in this country who take the "Domestic" symphony too seriously. They wish to find every page illustrative of some episode in joyful or harassing domesticity. They forget that Strauss himself is not pontifical in this instance. Why not let him have his little joke, even if he is nearly an hour in cracking it? No one can deny the beauty and charm of the love music or the strength that is akin to insolence in the fugue of the finale. Grant that the humor is at times coarse or extravagant. There is much that is deeply emotional in this symphony, a work which is both overpraised and wantonly abused.

Whether the air attributed to Rossi was written by him late in the 17th century, or whether it was manufactured deliberately and with malice aforethought for one of Fetis' historical concerts in 1833, is a matter of interest only to the antiquarian. The air itself calls for a singer of the grand style, a mistress of tragic emotions, to give it true distinction. Mme. Scalchi used her assortment of voices in it and there were passages when she was effective by means of sombre tones.

Berlioz's "Captive" a Cameo.

Berlioz's "Captive," a very cameo of exquisite instrumentation, also demands a singer of a peculiar equipment. If there should be the expression of homesickness, there should be no sentimentalism. The revery is languorous, yet there is also a dash of coquetry. "L'Esclave" of Gautier and Lalo is a very different woman from "La Captive" of Hugo and Berlioz.

Mrs. Child sang the air, which from its resemblance in certain points to the so-called air of Stradella might have been written by Niedermeyer or by Fetis himself, with more dramatic feeling and spirit than is her wont. On former occasions she has given pleasure by her interpretation of songs by Mr. Loeffler, songs that suited the peculiar quality of her tones and also her musical mood.

She gave last night an intelligent interpretation of "The Captive." Although it is not difficult to imagine one that would be more persuasive, more sensuous, more oriental, her own interpretation had an aesthetic charm. On the other hand, her production of tones was not praiseworthy. Her attack was not always firm and decisive, and there were other faults of mechanism that marred the natural beauty of her tones and the general effect of her performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 6, 1907

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, April 28. It has been decided to repeat the programme which was received with such approval at the first Pension Fund concert early in the season.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 1, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Cherubini—"Abencerragen" Overture.
Rossi—"Ah Rendimi."
Oskar Fried—Prelude and Double Fugue.
Berlioz—"The Captive."
Strauss—Symphonia Domestica.
Soloist, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child.

The overture to "The Abencerrages" was delightful in its clear and intelligible form, its broad themes and its conservative orchestration. Dr. Muck saw to it that the work did not sound antiquated and gave the Coda as a grand martial climax. In Music one school ought not to abolish another; the true musician will enjoy Richard Strauss (at his best) without allowing him to obscure Cherubini.

The song by the arch-enemy of Cherubini, Berlioz's "Captive," was ineffective on this occasion. We have heard Mrs. Child do much better. Berlioz's highly colored picture required more dramatic effect and the Italian "Ah Rendimi" more broad phrasing than were given them in this concert.

The Fried Prelude (this is not a culinary item) was rather sombre in character as was the double fugue that followed it. A double fugue is, like double pneumonia, a very dangerous matter and often fatal. This double fugue, however, did not thrust its learning obnoxiously under the auditor's nose, but lended a good amount of emotion with its complexity. It was a modernized example of contrapuntal display, not as eccentric as the other double fugue which soon followed in the domestic arrangements of the Strauss family, a family in which, according to the clock, they have double fugues for breakfast.

It was quite right for Dr. Muck to give us the "Domestica" a second time. Such a work repays study were it only for its wonderful lesson in orchestral scoring. If we state that there were several empty seats during the entire concert and several more were vacated just before the Strauss work, it is only a proof that the public is not unanimous in its verdict on the composition. But this does not mean much; the same public applauded Debussy's "The Sea" to the echo—a work which almost every American critic has found unbearable.

At this second hearing we tried to listen to the symphony as absolute music, keeping out of our mind, as far as possible, all stories of babies, stubbed toes, baths, aunts, uncles, and other banalities. As a result we found many more beauties than in trying to search for the silly plot. The night-scene was as romantic and charming as at first, the eccentric double fugue more effective than before, but after 7 a.m. (and we could not get away from the striking clock) matters became so mixed-up and ugly that we unconsciously thought of Mozart's letter to his father—"The passions, whether violent or not, must never be carried in their expression to the verge of disgust, and music, even in the most awful situations, must not offend the ear, but always please, consequently always remain Music!"—Poor, old, absurd Mozart!

There were some grand climaxes which were merely the apotheosis of Sound. Brahms could never have achieved anything so wonderful in scoring, but he could have made something much more homogeneous, more full of beauty, by the treatment of the chief figure (G, C. D, B) than Strauss has done in its many reiterations in all keys and manners.

In a word then, we do not believe that this work is to be a permanent classic, although it may continue for a long time as a landmark in the history of orchestration. Its humor is below that of "Till Eulenspiegel", its grandeur much below that of "Death and Transfiguration".

Dr. Muck gave it the reading of a genius and the orchestra played it in a manner that made it the greatest Strauss performance that we have yet heard. Dr. Muck was much applauded at the close but did not repeat the work. After all we still believe that Richard Strauss is misled by his own orchestral strength; he is allowing brilliancy of technique to take the place of that sane balance which should be the foundation of Art. He, who might have been the greatest living composer, is becoming an unhealthy influence in Music. We feel as much in doubt about the good of his work as little Wilhelmine did about the value of the Battle of Blenheim. Which has led us to versify the modern tendency as follows:

THE BATTLE OF HELDENLEBEN.
(With compliments to Robert Southey.)

One Saturday at evening,
The critic's work was done,
And he sat in the Music Hall,
The concert had begun:
And by his side there might be seen
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there,
With programme-book in hand.
He asked the critic to explain
What allied the noisy band.
To tell what Dr. Muck had found
That was so big and full of sound.

The critic gazed upon the boy
That stood expectant by:
He knit his brows, he scratched his head,
And heaved a natural sigh.
'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he
That tried to write a symphonie

I find them often hereabout,
When I to concerts wend:
Strange shapeless things with gongs and drums,
And trombones without end.
For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,
Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,
Young Peterkin he cries,
While little Wilhelmine looked up
In deafness and surprise;
Now tell us all about the score,
And what they make such racket for.

It was some Frenchmen, he replied,
Some Germans too, no doubt,
But what they write such discords for
I cannot well make out.
But everybody says, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, eleventh, and worse,
With zigzags in all keys,
They turn the music inside out
With unknown harmonies.
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big bass-tubas won,
And eke the wind-machine.
Why 'twas a very ugly thing,
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

And praise they gave to Dr. Muck
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last?
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he,
But 'tis a modern symphonie.

Louis C. Elson.

[173]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city, to be the conductor of Boston's Orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburgh Orchestra. When the Orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affection of New York's music lovers, and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily, until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation, won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, as chorus-msater in the opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German Opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day he is one of the most sought-after of the "star" conductors. After Mahler relinquished the Philharmonic Orchestra Dr. Muck was one of the first of the "guest" conductors invited to lead the band. Last year and the year before he conducted four of the eight concerts, Felix Mottl of Munich conducting the others. For the coming year arrangements had been made whereby he was to have conducted all eight of the concerts, but his engagement to come to America compelled the Philharmonic Society to fall back on the old plan of having two conductors, who are to be Mottl and Richard Strauss.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is, to a certain extent, a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipzig, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure, when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened, Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America, a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong—four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will also appear in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here, and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess nor Timothée Adamowski need introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. They are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later. The dates of the New York concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21; and on Saturday matinees November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23.

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1907

The Symphony Concert

For the last time, probably for a season or two, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Again Dr. Muck and the band gave it vivid and thrilling performance; and again the audience listened intent and rewarded the conductor and his men with very hearty applause. In power, nothing they have done the year through, not even their playing of Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" compares with that of the "Domestica." Yet with all their abandon and ardor, details of momentary beauty of tenderness shone as they had not shone hitherto—like the cradle song of the clarinets, in the limpid tone of Mr. Grisez and his comrade or the passages of the mother musing over her baby as they came from Mr. Hess's violin. Not before has there seemed such spontaneous charm in the scherzo of the child's play with its endless variety of light instrumental timbres, and its changeful rhythmical accents. Akin, too, was the delicacy of the transitorial passages. For a contrast in the veristic detail that Strauss loves, the orchestra shuddered and started in what has often seemed an obscure passage in the music of the night phantoms, as a sleeper stirs and "jumps" in some vague dream. Exuberant the orchestra were and exuberant Strauss is in the fugue. Perhaps there is too much of it; but what composer except him and what band but ours can seem so glorious, so uproariously drunk—there is no other word—with the power of sound.

For the rest of the concert: the delicate beauty of Mrs. Child's tones and the delicate suggestion of poetic fancy, of shadowy mood and veiled emotion that she can give them evaporated in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, with even a tempered orchestra behind her, and with the music that she had chosen. Rossi's "Ah rendimi" asks a larger scope of voice and a more declamatory eloquence of style than has Mrs. Child. It is for the Schumann-Heinks and the Scalchis of the operatic stage, albeit they lack the translucent purity of Mrs. Child's tones. Nor were the obvious and rather theatrical emotions of Hugo's and Berlioz's singing Moorish slave altogether sympathetic to the fineness and the exotic quality of Mrs. Child's voice and temperament. As the phrase of the theatre goes she was ill-cast. Dr. Muck's feeling for orchestral declamation served well Cherubini's overture to his opera of the noble Moors. "The Abencerrages," and the music kept its grave, clear power, its enduring heroic and chivalrous note, the note of knighthood as romance has glamored and glorified it and that composer upon composer with much more elaborate and showy means has sought in vain. Most interesting of all these preliminary items to the "Domestica" was Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for string orchestra. It had, of course, the large and elastic eloquence that the string choir of the band brings to such music, but it had also—and it is a rare quality in a set piece in a set form—a sombre and penetrating eloquence of its own. It sang and it mused. It was as some grave reverie in tones that had shaped itself spontaneously. It had thought, which was not merely of musical form. It had a deep undertone of passion that was a passion of poetic mood and not of technical achievement. Consciously or unconsciously Mr. Fried was translating form into poetry—writing, so to say, a fugue of and with a future.

H. T. P.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city, to be the conductor of Boston's Orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburgh Orchestra. When the Orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affection of New York's music lovers, and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily, until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation, won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, as chorus-msater in the opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German Opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day he is one of the most sought-after of the "star" conductors. After Mahler relinquished the Philharmonic Orchestra Dr. Muck was one of the first of the "guest" conductors invited to lead the band. Last year and the year before he conducted four of the eight concerts, Felix Mottl of Munich conducting the others. For the coming year arrangements had been made whereby he was to have conducted all eight of the concerts, but his engagement to come to America compelled the Philharmonic Society to fall back on the old plan of having two conductors, who are to be Mottl and Richard Strauss.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is, to a certain extent, a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipzig, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure, when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened, Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America, a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong—four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will also appear in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here, and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess nor Timothée Adamowski need introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. They are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later. The dates of the New York concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21; and on Saturday matinees November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1907

The Symphony Concert

For the last time, probably for a season or two, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Again Dr. Muck and the band gave it vivid and thrilling performance; and again the audience listened intent and rewarded the conductor and his men with very hearty applause. In power, nothing they have done the year through, not even their playing of Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" compares with that of the "Domestica." Yet with all their abandon and ardor, details of momentary beauty or tenderness shone as they had not shone hitherto—like the cradle song of the clarinets, in the limpid tone of Mr. Grisez and his comrade or the passages of the mother musing over her baby as they came from Mr. Hess's violin. Not before has there seemed such spontaneous charm in the scherzo of the child's play with its endless variety of light instrumental timbres, and its changeful rhythmical accents. Akin, too, was the delicacy of the transitorial passages. For a contrast in the veritistic detail that Strauss loves, the orchestra shuddered and started in what has often seemed an obscure passage in the music of the night phantoms, as a sleeper stirs and "jumps" in some vague dream. Exuberant the orchestra were and exuberant Strauss is in the fugue. Perhaps there is too much of it; but what composer except him and what band but ours can seem so glorious, so uproariously drunk—there is no other word—with the power of sound.

For the rest of the concert: the delicate beauty of Mrs. Child's tones and the delicate suggestion of poetic fancy, of shadowy mood and veiled emotion that she can give them evaporated in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, with even a tempered orchestra behind her, and with the music that she had chosen. Rossi's "Ah rendimi" asks a larger scope of voice and a more declamatory eloquence of style than has Mrs. Child. It is for the Schumann-Heinks and the Scalchis of the operatic stage, albeit they lack the translucent purity of Mrs. Child's tones. Nor were the obvious and rather theatrical emotions of Hugo's and Berloiz's singing Moorish slave altogether sympathetic to the fineness and the exotic quality of Mrs. Child's voice and temperament. As the phrase of the theatre goes she was ill-cast. Dr. Muck's feeling for orchestral declamation served well Cherubini's overture to his opera of the noble Moors. "The Abencerrages," and the music kept its grave, clear power, its enduring heroic and chivalrous note, the note of knighthood as romance has glamored and glorified it and that composer upon composer with much more elaborate and showy means has sought in vain. Most interesting of all these preliminary items to the "Domestica" was Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for string orchestra. It had, of course, the large and elastic eloquence that the string choir of the band brings to such music, but it had also—and it is a rare quality in a set piece in a set form—a sombre and penetrating eloquence of its own. It sang and it mused. It was as some grave reverie in tones that had shaped itself spontaneously. It had thought, which was not merely of musical form. It had a deep undertone of passion that was a passion of poetic mood and not of technical achievement. Consciously or unconsciously Mr. Fried was translating form into poetry—writing, so to say, a fugue of and with a future.

H. T. P.

The Boston Journal
APRIL 6, 1907

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 28. It has been decided to repeat the program which was received with such approval at the first pension fund concert early in the season. This rather unusual action was taken because of the large number of requests which have been received by Dr. Muck that he repeat the Wagner program then given. It will be remembered by those who were present that Wagner's seven operatic preludes and overtures were played in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" and ending with "Parsifal." The "Ring" was represented by the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung." The concert last fall excited a high degree of enthusiasm and ever since that time requests have been made to repeat it, all the more so that a large number of the patrons of these concerts were unable at that time to secure [illegible] will comprise overtures to "The Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," and the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung."

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The twenty-first Symphony program, which will be played on next Friday afternoon, April 12, and Saturday evening, April 13, will bring two novelties; one of them by Max Reger, who, after Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler, is the most discussed man in modern music. Reger's name has never appeared on our Symphony programs, but last season Professor Willy Hess brought forward at the fourth Boston Symphony Quartet concert a delightful Serenade for flute, violin and viola. This and some songs are all that is known of his music here. The work which will be presented on the twenty-first program is a Serenade for full orchestra, which had its first performance in America a fortnight ago by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago. The second novelty is by Henry K. Hadley, the well-known young American composer, who, for the past two years has been studying in Germany. Mr. Hadley is a native of Somerville and is a brother of Mr. Arthur Hadley, one of the 'cellists of the Symphony Orchestra. He will be remembered as the composer of the Symphony entitled "The Seasons," which a few years ago won the Paderewski prize in this country, and was played here under Gericke. Mr. Hadley's new work is a symphonic poem entitled "Salome." Like the now famous opera by Richard Strauss, it finds its inspiration in Oscar Wilde's play. That Mr. Hadley happened on the same subject as Strauss is one of those curious coincidences which occur now and then in the world of music. He had mapped out and begun his work before he knew of Strauss' opera. The poem is slated for a speedy performance in New York. The final number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." There will be no soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD--
BOSTON, APRIL 7, 1907

RENDER SYMPHONY BY PROF. BROCKWAY

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives Work Heard for the Second Time in America.

THEME DEVELOPMENT SHOWS FAITHFUL STUDY

Composition of American Was Unfamiliar but Gets a Painstaking Rendition.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony (in D major).....Brockway
Suite No. 2 "Indian".....MacDowell
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The impressions of the music and of the performance are those formed at the public rehearsal, Friday afternoon.

Mr. Brockway's symphony was then performed for the first time in America. It was written in Germany in 1894 when the composer was 24 years old and it was produced at a concert given in Berlin Feb. 23, 1895, when the programme was made up exclusively of Mr. Brockway's works. Mr. Brockway was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and he has lived for nearly four years in Baltimore as a member of the faculty of the Peabody Conservatory of Music.

The American entering a German music school is at once impressed by certain students, who, he is told—and they are willing to admit the fact—have written two or three symphonies. It is true that these symphonies have never been performed. The years go by and the symphonies sleep on a shelf. Their rest is perpetual. If the composers amount to anything in later years they may look occasionally at their student work and smile, or they may earlier in their career throw the manuscript scores into the waste basket or into the fire. Fire and death are often private and public benefactors.

Mr. Brockway's symphony is now nearly 13 years old. He, no doubt, has grown steadily in musical stature. It is a pity that he could not have heard this symphony shortly before he gave it into the hands of Dr. Muck, for it certainly must have then sounded to him differently than it did in 1895. Dr. Muck is a man of catholic taste and he produces works without prejudice for or against the nationality of a composer. The chief question concerning a composer is not whether he is an American; it is this: "Is his music worthy of performance?"

Dr. Muck, it is said, took great pains in the rehearsal of this symphony, as though it were a composition by Claude Debussy or Richard Strauss. Painstaking rehearsal was necessary, not because the music is complex or unusual, but because in certain instances it is not well written for the instruments.

Passages for the violin, for instance, are written as though for the piano.

It is enough to say of Mr. Brockway's symphony that the themes are without marked character; that the development of them is that of a faithful student who, at the time, is not imaginative, whose musical thoughts are at the best only respectable and commonplace; that there are few evidences of emotional strength or beauty; that there is little, if any, effective use of orchestral instruments; on the contrary, the instrumentation is generally thick and drab.

Even in the simple exposition of a theme, as in what may be called the melodic theme of the finale, the motive is almost covered by its accompaniment. To speak more in detail of the symphony would be merely to say unpleasant things.

Dr. Muck gave a very impressive interpretation of MacDowell's "Indian" suite, an interpretation that was eloquent in its dramatic variety. The suite is now about 15 years old. We have heard much modern music since it was composed. Works contemporaneous with this suite have grown old within this time, and some, loudly applauded when they were first heard, are already forgotten.

MacDowell's music has not aged; it might have been written early in the season. The music has the characteristic force and tenderness of this composer when he was writing for himself and not directly for the general public. It is not necessary to lug in any question of whether this be distinctively American music, for the best pages of the suite are not parochial—they are not national.

They are universal in their appeal to sensitive hearers of any land. The movements that are the most poetically imaginative, that have the greatest distinction are the "Legend," "In War Time," and above all the "Dirge." Music like this would honor any composer of whatever race he might be.

After MacDowell's suite the "Euryanthe" overture, with the exception of the wonderous episode for strings, seemed cut-and-dried and only plausibly brilliant.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, APRIL 7, 1907.

SYMPHONY GIVES AMERICAN MUSIC

New Composition by Brockway and MacDowell's Indian Suite Received with Enthusiasm.

BOTH ARE GREAT WORKS

By Kent Perkins.

It was both refreshing and gratifying to national pride, after many sessions with Germans, Frenchmen, Italians, Bohemians, Hungarians, Russians, Swedes, Poles and Finns, to hear last night in Symphony Hall a concert of American music. It is pleasing and altogether salutary to be reminded occasionally that real music is written in America by Americans.

Two Yankees were represented on the program, Howard Brockway, born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and now a member of the faculty of Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore, and Edward MacDowell, the foremost American composer, who is in financial straits in New York, his native place—great is the pity.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra, with excellent material for their skill, entered upon the work of the evening with even more than their usual spirit and enthusiasm and to this fact is due much of the powerful impression made by the native music.

First Time in America.

Brockway's work was his symphony in D major, op. 12, written in Germany and heard last night for the first time in America. While the composition is conventional in form and lacking in startling features it is strongly individual, original in melodic conception and tonal effects and is marked throughout with a note of distinction that rises many times to real nobility of sentiment and expression.

Mr. Brockway is not afraid of a melody and he has no panic when he sees that he is about to perpetrate a real, round sonorous harmony. He stands in no dread of being called commonplace, if he sings, and having something good to sing he sings it well and, therefore is not commonplace. His song and his orchestral dress for it are modern and free in spirit, but he odes not seem to think it necessary in order to be up-to-date, or ahead of it, to turn a concert hall into a boiler shop, or ask an orchestra to become blacksmiths. His symphony was received with warm approval.

MacDowell's Indian Suite.

MacDowell's Indian Suite, which has been heard here before and was dedicated to the Symphony Orchestra, was played with magnificent spontaneity and charm. It aroused outbursts of enthusiasm more emphatic than are often heard in Symphony Hall. Analysis of its parts or prais eof its extraordinary beauty and power is unnecessary at this time, but its performance prompts two reflections.

One is that American composers can find as rich and beautiful thematic material in the music of the Indians, though the supply be limited, as Finns and Russians obtain in their country's folk songs. The other is that if American is to develope a charasteristic national music her composers must drop self consciousness and imitation and must, like the Indians when they sang, forget their audiences and think mainly of the emotional message they have to convey.

The concert closed with Webe's overture to "Euryanthe."

COMING MUSICAL EVENTS OF INTEREST TO ALL BOSTONIANS

The twenty-first Symphony program, which will be played on next Friday afternoon, April 12, and Saturday evening, April 13, will bring two novelties, one of them a serenade for full orchestra by Max Reger, who, after Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler, is the most discussed man in modern music. The second novelty is by Henry K. Hadley, the young American composer, who, for two years, has been studying in Germany, and is a symphonic poem entitled "Salome."

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 28. In response to many requests the program which was received with such approval at the first Pension Fund concert, early in the season, will be repeated.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 8, 1907
New York Office, Tribune Building.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Brockway. Symphony in D. Op. 12.
MacDowell. Suite for Orchestra. "Indian."
Weber. "Euryanthe" overture.

After children have been feasting abroad they generally turn up their noses at home cookery. Bostonians returned to their family table on Saturday, but after the green turtle of "Aida," the lentil soup of Brockway seemed insipid. Of this composer the life is given as follows:—

"He was born in Brooklyn, Nov. 22, 1870. In his youth he studied with Kortheuer in New York. At twenty he went to Berlin and studied piano with Barth and composition with the American teacher there—O. B. Boise—his own father-in-law. The latter trained his fellow-countryman and relative so well that by twenty-four he had written a symphony, a symphonic ballad, a violin sonata, a romanza for violin and orchestra, and many other works. Many of his compositions were published abroad, and he conducted a concert of his own works at the Sing Akademie in Berlin, where he received much praise."

A "Sylvan Suite" for orchestra by Mr. Brockway, has been performed by our orchestra under Mr. Gericke, and made a much better impression than this labored symphony. That work was dainty, tuneful, genial, a really good addition to the American repertoire; but this symphony is merely academic, a strong example of what Wagner called "Kapellmeistermusik."

American composers all the way from Paine to Mrs. Beach have built symphonies, yet we doubt if the first native symphony is yet written. There is not one American symphony existing that, as a whole, will hold its place on the standard repertoire. But there are beautiful single movements in the symphonies of Paine, Chadwick, Mrs. Beach, and others. But in this present Brockway composition there is no such movement. We doubt the permanency if any part of this work, in which the themes lack character and distinction, the orchestration is unimpressive, and even the rhythmic juggleries of the finale seem meaningless.

Rossini once said of a very indigestible musical composition—"To understand this work one must hear it at least three times—and I shall never hear it again!"

Mr. Brockway may, however, take heart of grace, for he has done much better work in less ambitious forms, and it is not absolutely esential for every American composer to add a symphony to the concert list.

There was an injustice done to the Baltimore composer. His symphony was heard side by side with a most graphic piece of pictorial music. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" is one of the most beautiful works of the American orchestral list. That it is made upon real Indian themes does not move us in the least; the composer could have taken his figures from Moody and Sankey's hymns and the result would have been the same. A French cook once made a very palatable dish on the foundation of an old kid-glove, and afterwards explained—"It is the sauce that does it!" It is the treatment of the figures (and the scoring) that makes the glory of the "Indian Suite," not the figures themselves.

We found the first three movements of this suite the best; the last two movements seemed less inspired and romantic. It is possible that the Dirge was somewhat exaggerated. Dr. Muck read it with extreme slowness. It is marked "Dirge-like, mournfully," which is scarcely a warrant for such an "Adagissimo."

In this connection we may protest against MacDowell's use of English words of expression in music. At first sight it appears as if it must be common sense for an American composer to use his native tongue in his expression marks, but the reviewer's standpoint in this matter may be most briefly stated by a citation from his "Music Dictionary"—

"Italian is the preferable tongue for the following reasons; 1st. It has priority. It was the first language used in this field, and has been in almost universal use for three centuries. 2nd. It is impossible to allow each composer the use of his native language. If Liszt had used Hungarian, Tschaikowsky Russian, Dvorak Bohemian, Grieg Norwegian, etc., we should find many more difficulties in the matter than in the use of a single language. 3rd. Musical notation is a single, universal written language. Such a language requires an equally universal language for its tempo and expression marks.——We urge upon every composer to further this unity by discarding English, French or German markings, and using Italian only."

Even in the case of MacDowell this is tacitly admitted by the addition of Italian words to his English markings, in most of his more important works.

The "Euryanthe" overture was read by Dr. Muck with that vividness of contrast for which he shows such a penchant. When he is soft he is very, very soft, and when he is loud he is stunning.

We, for once, base our review upon Friday's public rehearsal, for we found it somewhat difficult to be in Symphony Hall and the Boston Theatre at one and the [illegible]

Louis C. Elson.

[175]

SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 7, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Novelties Played at Symphony Concert.

Cecilia's First Performance of J. K. Paine's "Azara."

Other Announcements of the Week.

Dr Muck presented a rich and glorious program for yesterday's Symphony concert, playing Brockway's symphony in D major for the first time in America, the beautiful MacDowell "Indian" orchestral suite, and Weber's overture to the opera "Euryanthe." The Brockway work, more intelligible than most moderns, is remarkable for its tremendous climaxes, and for the grace of its thematic handling. It will never be popular with the mass of concert-goers, but is attractive to cognoscenti in its artistry. It would be futile to describe it theme by theme, and pictorial description is impossible; its impression is scholastic rather than sensuous, artistic rather than fascinating. It awes rather than draws.

The MacDowell number, with its rich imagery of the savage life, with its purposely crude phrases and weird intervals, is not unfamiliar, but it is unforgettable. The literature that has collected round this suite moved Mr Hale, the Symphony programmist, to long disquisitions on Indian music, which were interesting to all and helpful to many who did not quite understand MacDowell.

And last came the brilliant overture, which won for Weber's opera all the enduring fame it has had. The overture is still played; the opera very rarely.

Whether it was spring in the air, or the approach of the season's end, or the recent trip away, the orchestra was in high spirits, if the playing is the indication. Everything went with more pulsing feeling, more verve, than usual. And the audience, which, as usual, took every last inch in the hall, showed a keen if not too discriminating enthusiasm.

This week's program is as modern as possible, though it promises a great deal of interesting and pleasant music. It begins with Max Regers' "Serenade" played for the first time; then comes a symphonic poem called "Salome," by Henry Hadley, which seems very timely indeed, and finally we are to have Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Pension Fund Concert.

The second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, April 28. It has been decided to repeat the program which was received with such approval at the first pension fund concert early in the season. This rather unusual action was taken because of the large number of requests which have been received by Dr Muck. It will be remembered by those who were present that Wagner's seven operatic preludes and overtures were played in chronological order.

The program will comprise the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and the "Funeral March" from "Gotterdammerung."

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 13, 1907. 15 10

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REGER'S "SERENADE" AND HADLEY'S "SALOME"

Two New Compositions That Made Sharp Contrast—The Form and Substance of Reger's Music—Its Vivacity of Line and Charm of Arabesque—His Traits as the "Serenade" Exemplifies Them—Is There a Mild-Mannered Reger?—The Exceptional Vividness of Mr. Hadley's Tone-Poem as a Musical Narrative—The Shortcomings of an Easy Imagination

Again, when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra played Reger's "Serenade," yesterday, for the first time here, the wonder was that half musical Germany should have been for three years past in hot battle over him. Once more, as in his trio of the Symphony Quartet's concert last year and, measurably, in the sonata for piano and violin that Mr. Marteau played in Boston, Reger's music was interesting, fluent, amiable, individual, amusing, but one of the last things in the world to provoke a strife of hisses and epithets. Perhaps Reger, who long ago disordered most of the normal steps in a composer's progress, preferred to begin formidably and to continue ingratiatingly. Certainly there is a formidable Reger. Listen to organists, talking of organ pieces by him that seem beyond the powers of human hands and feet to play; glance across and down the intricate pages of some of his chamber music teeming with difficulties and fairly spattered with perversities and feats of harmonic daring and agility; run through, or try to run through, the tortuous and detached phrases of some of his songs; and there is no doubting this strange and threatening Reger. Presumably it is of him that reviewers and amateurs, audiences and performers, war sharply, sourly, even furiously in Germany. It is quite another Reger, outside some of the songs that Mr. Sharpe sang eighteen months ago, that we have heard thus far in Boston—an agreeable, pliant, neat-handed, light-footed, smiling and altogether amusing Reger. The trio was all dexterity, playfulness and charm. The sonata indeed had a more taxing aspect and a graver content, manner and individuality. And yesterday the "Serenade," in spite of a rather "heavenly" length of forty minutes, was adroit, supple, graceful, musical entertainment and seemingly, at a single hearing, nothing else. It is easy to understand why the "Straussites" and the "anti-Straussites" rage in Germany; why the "Mahlerites" and the "anti-Mahlerites" have set themselves; but, even with allowance for Teutonic musical excitability, it is difficult to appreciate the warfare of the "Regerites" and the "anti-Regerites," so far as his music has been heard in America. "Everyone but the Wagnerites hates him," wrote the French correspondent in Stuttgart, whom we were quoting on Thursday. But why hatred for such pleasant trifles as the "Serenade" or the trio? Neither is substantial enough for such passion. Perhaps, however, our conductors are solicitously tempering the Regerian winds to their flocks, and will not yet venture his music, when it is acrid, threatening, perverse and yeasty.

The "Serenade" is the second of Reger's compositions for orchestra, though he has written copiously for nearly everything else; and, at a single hearing of a single piece, he seemed curiously lacking in instinctive feelings for what a painter would call instrumental "values." The music gave little impression of a fine and felicitous sense of instrumental combinations, contrasts and delicate differentiations, or of long and minute study of their possibilities. Reger, as they say in Germany, may feel in counterpoint and think in modulations, but as yet he does neither in instruments. He uses, it is true, a small and rather unusual orchestra for the "Serenade." He discards altogether the brass choir and the instruments of percussion, except two kettledrums. For a wind choir, two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons serve him. He adds a harp to the usual strings, and then divides them, except the double basses, into two groups—one muted throughout and the other unmuted—a condition that changed the seating of our orchestra yesterday and made it for the moment strange to see. Bach, when Dr. Muck put one of the Brandenburg concertos on his programme a few weeks ago, had only a string choir. Yet with it he gained much more variety, felicity and adroitness of instrumental voices than does Reger with wind instruments besides. And Bach, as Reger's own sayings go, is the inspiration and ideal of his music.

On the other hand, if Reger's orchestra for the "Serenade" is unusual, he is duly conventional in its form and structure. It runs practically in the symphonic mould—an opening allegro moderato, a short scherzo (Vivace a Burlesca), a long, slow movement, in the form of a romance, and a finale, allegro con spirito. Each movement, moreover, with themes and counterthemes, free fantasia, recapitulation, and all the rest, is orthodox enough in material and development to satisfy even an English lecturer on music. In fact, the "Serenade," by its form and length, might easily pass for a light and diminutive symphony—a study, perhaps, for the fuller-bodied one that surely Reger will write one day to the consternation, probably, of both the faithful and the doubters. And in all this modesty of apparatus and orthodoxy of structure is no apparent affectation of simplicity. Reger in the "Serenade" is by no means as one who crooks his elbow, cocks his eye and calls to all within earshot to hear him do "the regular thing in the regular way" and to mark the naïveté, grace and ease with which he does it. Apparently, and normally, what he would say has determined the means and the methods of his saying, and he easily shapes them to his purpose. Often there seemed to be delicate intricacies in the "Serenade," and once and again an attentive listener was quite sure of them. But they were fused into a whole effect of simplicity, spontaneity, ease and grace. As the music flowed forward, Reger seemed unconscious of form, rule and custom, so freely and deftly did he make them serve him.

There is no sign of the slightest delineative, dramatic, or deliberately poetic intent in the "Serenade," and not the faintest hint of even a vague "programme." It is as "absolute" as any music of Bach or Mozart. It contains no adventures, except those of themes and counter-themes, and tells no tale except that of modulation, figuration and development generally. It is as truly tonal pattern-weaving as any music of the eighteenth century—all line and arabesque and dependent for its appeal upon its intrinsic interest and beauty of design, invention and ornament. From first to last—and here is another of its eighteenth-century traits—it is singularly fluid music, not with the deliberate, suggestive, involved fluidity of Debussy, for example, but with a light spontaneous, on-flowing ripple of its own. Time and again it is almost Mozartean in its supple ease. Steadily it is animated music that quickly touches and keeps vivacity in the two allegros; that is playful—sometimes a little curtly—in the scherzo; and that goes not much deeper than sauve musing in the slow movement. To invent a melody seems the easiest thing in the world for Reger; he has been fertile with them—and at thirty-four—through nearly a hundred pieces. But they are not, so far as the "Serenade" disclosed them, very distinguished or searching melodies. They do not on the instant beguile the ear or stir the imagination. Yet they have a curious titillating, elastic, almost "jumpy" quality, as of melodies that would be off and away. Thereby they serve Reger's purposes admirably. On and on he leads them through all sorts of modulation, figuration, ornament, combination and contrast, with the utmost surety and vivacity of invention and handling, seemingly unconscious of the easy lengths that spread the "Serenade" over a score of 221 pages. The mere fecundity, facility and agility of it all are good to follow in these days of music that often proclaims, instead of hiding, its laboring intricacies. Reger, however, does more; he clothes all this pattern-weaving with a light, bright, persuasive charm. Almost always, whether the tonal stream runs in long curves or widening ripples, it is shimmering music. Often it has grace, delicacy, and an alluring air of sparkling and happy improvisation. When it is most serious it is no more than suavely pensive, singing its lyric, and decorating it by the way, through long, soft, sinuous, shining curves of tone. When it is most vivacious, it sounds innocently gay with its own felicities. It seems simplicity itself—a simplicity perhaps of melted complexities. It has even tricks of manner it cannot cloak, like occasional lapses into a perilously thin and high-pitched tone, and a curious tendency to pianissimo endings. On the other hand Reger makes wholly unaffected, free and often adroitly suggestive play in tonal-coloring with his contrasted choirs of strings. Throughout, moreover, as in the trio of last year, the music has a capricious and brightly pungent individuality of its own. It was sport to hear, and music so seldom makes sport nowadays.

It is easy enough to take the cue of the learned Dr. Riemann and to say that Reger is "expressing his own individuality in a language that comes from deep study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms," but in the individuality lies the secret of the persuasive charm or the significant expressiveness of all his music that has been heard hereabouts. He has cultivated and refined a natural fecundity of musical ideas and fertility in musical design and development. He has made conventional and orthodox forms seem spontaneous and elastic again. In a time when most music tends to be delineative, dramatic, literary, "programmatic" in twenty different ways, he has made it appeal again, as in the "Serenade" by beauty of design, grace of line and charm of arabesque. He has made the small adventures of a melody that expresses nothing but itself, interesting again, and the tracery of tonal patterns in old familiar forms as beguiling to the imagination as many a "proclamation" of striding tone-poems. In a musical day of sonorities and opulence he has sought seeming simplicities and reticence. So far as we know his music in Boston, he has cultivated charm and caprice, lightness and brightness, suavities and delicacies. No wonder he is unique in a time when even the youngest composer is fain to burst all the old bottles with the new and heady wine he pours into them, and to rejoice in the loud noise of the burstings. A musical age of Strausses and Mahlers—in posse and in esse—needs also its Regers and Debussys. But why, to end at the beginning, why wrangle over Reger's music in the prevailing German fashion? It is much keener pleasure just to listen.

Apparently Dr. Muck had made a programme of contrasts. After Reger's "Serenade" came the other new composition of the afternoon, Henry Hadley's tone-poem, "Salome," and, outside their position on the list, the two could hardly have been further apart. Except that he forgot the celesta, Mr. Hadley asks the resources of the modern orchestra, full to the last chair. His form, though he keeps the tone-poem an organic and developing whole, save for a strange and furibund episode near the close, is of the freest. In purpose and contents he has written frankly delineative and dramatic music—delineative of the characters, the incidents and the atmosphere of Oscar Wilde's lush and searching play, and dramatic with the passions, conflicts, and fatalities that it looses. Mr. Hadley wrote his tone-poem before Richard Strauss's opera out of the play had come to performance or to print, but often he writes as one who has studied and assimilated the melodic, polyphonic and instrumental idioms of Strauss. Within its limitations, moreover, the tone-poem traverses the play almost as closely and completely as does the music-drama. There is the suggestion of the still, clear, palpitating Syrian night; of the coming of Salome from the palace; of the din of the feast and of the cackle of the disputing Jews; of the desire of Salome for Jokanaan, now surging, now baffled; of his large rebuke and his austere disdain; of the feverish entrance of the hysterical Herod; of his nervous, broken, babbling speech; of his rising and perverse passion for Salome; of her answers, her dance, and of the confusion and terror that stir at her asking for Jokanaan's head. The head falls; she spends her desire upon it, and the music transfigures her passion. There is a hint of the horror of the bystanders, a crash, a pause, and the melody of Salome's passion dies wan and empty.

Mr. Hadley's music is delineative to a surprising vividness, if the listener knows Wilde's play at all, and some acquaintance with it the composer has a right to presume in his hearers. There is no need of a very alert and responsive imagination to catch the spell of the music of the blue-and-silver night or the loud echoes of the feast; and to hear the string and woodwind choirs sing the passion of Salome, while the brass is eloquent with the answering prophet. Herod whines, babbles, wheedles, shivers, in short, ejaculatory, high-pitched, empty phrases that bring illusion, not unlike that which Strauss achieves by somewhat similar means. The dance pricks with rhythm and motion, faintly Oriental, pungently sensuous. The beheading is a curiously minute and vivid tonal suggestion of an action. The rest, except the details of turbulence and horror, intensifies and at last seems to idealize Salome's desire. On the other hand Mr. Hadley's music stops short at these rather remarkable delineative feats. It has characterized persons, suggested atmosphere, imparted passion, and almost told a tale. But it has not told it with the lush magnificence of exotic imagination, acrid sensuality, and cunning suggestion that are in the mood and the manner of Wilde's play and that should pass over into music that it kindles. The tragedy is at once fascinating and fateful. Mr. Hadley's music misses the fascination, but often and with true imagination, it keeps the note of mysterious and inevitable fate, in the boding drum-roll, for example, iterated and reiterated under the passionate music of desire. Mr. Hadley seems so eager to tell the tale in tones—and he has done that vividly—that he neglects to tell it as richly, ardently, potently as he might. To put the case rather extremely, he gives his hearers, in tones, all the facts about Salome as Wilde records them, and touches them with advancing and irresistible fate, but he forgets to enhance them, as well, with the intensest of musical speech. His "Salome" lacks magnificence of voice, poignancy of power, and except here and there in the dance, adroit exotic suggestion. Music to "Salome" should crush, bite, tingle, quiver. Mr. Hadley seems to imagine his too easily and to write it too readily to give it many subtleties of beauty, acidities of suggestion, or piercing or overwhelming power.

H. T. P.

[176]

Transcript
Apr 13/07

THE CONCERTS OF NEXT WEEK

Sibelius's New Violin Concerto, with Maud Powell, and a Forgotten Overture by Grieg, at the Next Symphony Concerts—"The Children's Crusade" in Mr. Lang's Honor—Miss Radecki and Mr. Heintich Reappear—Mr. Paur as a Pianist

Mme. Maud Powell, the ablest of American violinists, who, rather strangely, has not been heard in Boston for some years, reappears at the twenty-second pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. She plays, for the first times here, a new concerto by Jan Sibelius, whose symphony in E minor so interested and stirred the audiences that heard it here when Dr. Muck played it last January. In America, Mme. Powell has made the concerto her own, and when she played it with the Philharmonic Society in New York and the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, earlier in the season, both those who liked and those who disliked it agreed that it was unusual and impressive music. Mrs. Newmarch says of it in her little monograph on Sibelius from which we quoted liberally when his symphony was first performed: "With the advance of years, Sibelius has shown an increasing respect for the requirements of conventional form, without, however, becoming conventional in the contemptible sense of the word. The sign of this reaction has been the revision of many of his early pieces. The violin concerto (op. 47) is a case in point. We cannot judge it by comparison with its original conception, but the Finnish critics consider it to be far more acceptable in its revised form. Sibelius's violin concerto, like that of Tchaikovski, has been pronounced 'impossibly difficult;' but it has not had to wait so long for its interpreter as the Russian concerto waited for a Brodsky. Its remarkable originality, and even the new technical difficulties which it presents, will commend this music to virtuosi in search of fresh laurels. The beauty and depth of this music are so well worth revelation that the executant will be more than compensated for the labor and long study it exacts." Mme. Powell seems to have found those laurels.

The other new piece of the programme is forty years old and more; and, though it was written by so noted a composer as Grieg, and is one of his few compositions for orchestra, it has not hitherto been played in Boston. It is his overture, "In Autumn," written, according to Mr. H. T. Finck in his life of Grieg, "at Rome in 1865, and based on the realistic and very effective song, 'Autumn Storms,' which was composed earlier in the same year in Denmark. It has been stated that the overture was rewritten two decades later, but this is an error; only the orchestration was altered. The orchestra naturally provides more powerful means than the piano and voice for painting the trees stripped of their leaves by the storm winds, as well as for singing the ensuing longings for spring; and the composer has made good use of his opportunities showing himself a master of the art of climax. The circumstance that the first phrase of the introduction (which often recurs in the allegro) is amusingly like the beginning of 'Yankee Doodle' in a minor mode, is a little disturbing to that seriousness with which large music by a sterling composer ought to be approached; but it does not preclude admiration for the original and ingenious orchestral effects which fill the overture. The spirit of the piece is unmistakably Norse, and its humor is mixed with the melancholy of the north country." The remaining numbers of the concert are repetitions:—of the late Professor Paine's brilliant and spontaneous prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes, first played at the Symphony concerts last season; and of the three "orchestral sketches" by Debussy, "The Sea," performed for the first times in America two months ago by Dr. Muck, and sorely puzzling to most of those that heard them.

BOSTON HERALD
April [illegible] 1907.

22ND CONCERT BY MUCK'S ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Heard in New and Harmless Serenade by Max Reger.

HADLEY'S "SALOME" PLAYED FIRST TIME

Tone Poem After Oscar Wilde, an Interesting and Imaginative Work.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Serenade for orchestra, op. 95.....Reger
"Salome," tone poem after Oscar Wilde's Tragedy, op. 55.....Hadley
"Romeo and Juliet," overture fantasia after Shakespeare.....Tschaikowsky

Reger's serenade was played in Boston for the first time. The performance of Hadley's symphony was probably the first. I say "probably," for although the work was rehearsed by Jehin's orchestra at Monte Carlo, the departure of the orchestra with the opera company of the Prince of Monaco for a short visit to Berlin probably postponed the performance.

The Serenade of Reger was produced at Cologne late in the fall of last year. The Theodore Thomas orchestra played it at Chicago the 16th of last month.

Unlike the composer's Sinfonietta, the Serenade was not hissed violently in Berlin when Mr. Nikisch produced it at a Philharmonic concert, nor has it awakened screams of protest in other cities of Germany. It is scored peculiarly. Two strong choirs are used, one muted, one unmuted. The double basses are unmuted. The other instruments are two flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, kettledrums and one harp.

We have heard little of Reger's music in Boston. A serenade for flute, violin and viola was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony quartet a little over a year ago. It turned out to be an amiable, agreeable composition, neither pretentious nor important. A year ago this month, Mr. Marteau introduced a much stronger work, the Sonata, in F sharp minor, for violin and piano. The Sonata was distinguished by a charming allegretto and a finale in variation form which ended with an exceedingly brilliant fugue. The music was often intensely dramatic; the dramatic expression moved freely in old moulds. Songs by Reger have been sung here, chiefly by Mr. Sharpe in the semi-privacy of his dwelling house.

There are some who shout and do not grow weary of shouting the praise of Max Reger. According to them, he is a modern Bach, he is the greatest of all composers now living, he is already numbered among the immortals. These shouts naturally irritate sane persons and drive them to the other extreme. They deny all musical gifts to Reger except extraordinary facility and industry, qualities that are not praiseworthy, when the composer has nothing to say, qualities that may be justly considered as dangerous; they lead an exasperated public to demand that the composer be bound over to keep the peace.

Serenade Is Soporific.

But there is nothing to irritate any one in this serenade. On the contrary, music incites a disposition to sleep. It is as blameless as the Ethiopians to whom Zeus paid visits when he was weary of the quarrels and revelling on Olympus. There is also nothing in the music to support the statements of the Regerites, for it is not emotional, it is not beautiful, it is not interesting except episodically, and then as by accident; it is not even discordant in an original and glorious manner; it is a long weaving of commonplaces.

It flows along, now like a thick stream of cold molasses, and now with the lightness of slippery water. I know of no ancient or modern music that reminds a well disposed hearer so much of the summer drink recommended by John Phoenix: Three parts of water-gruel and two of root beer; thicken with a little soft squash, and strain through a cane bottom chair. The fatal facility of the man! One can see him writing counterpoint with both hands. His facility is equalled only by his long-windedness.

Mr. Henry Hadley, born in Somerville, has been living in Europe for the last three years, going about as a conductor of his works and those of others. It is said that he composed his "Salome" before he saw the score of Richard Strauss' opera, which, imported, shocked the sensitive feelings of certain professional critics in New York and aroused an edifying discussion concerning morality in life and art which ceased only with the full publication of the evidence in the Thaw trial.

It was fortunate for Mr. Hadley's peace of mind that his "Salome" was performed for the first time in Boston and not in New York. No protests in advance were sent to Symphony Hall; no letters from indignant citizens and citizenesses were published in the newspapers. Nor was there last night any exodus of persons with outraged feelings from the hall. The statues did not fall from the niches. There was no thunderbolt, there was no quaking of the earth. Yet Mr. Hadley had the courage to say frankly that his music was in illustration of the tragedy by Oscar Wilde, a tragedy, by the way, that is superb in its fantastical beauty and strange dramatic intensity.

This music is programme music, but the programme is not of the interlinear nature so dear to lazy schoolboys who cared not for Caesar and Virgil. Mr. Hadley printed on a page of his score the argument of Wilde's tragedy. He gave only one title in the course of the score: "Salome's Dance." The hearer may find the opening pages illustrative of the moonlight night and the great terrace in the Palace of Herod and of the dialogue that begins:

The Young Syrian: How beautiful is the Princess Salome tonight!
The Page of Herodias: Look at the moon. How strange the moon seems! She is like a woman rising from a tomb. She is like a dead woman. One might fancy she was looking for dead things.

Must Remember Wilde.

But he must do his own task of identification. He may find a trombone theme typical of John the Baptist; he may associate certain pages with the desire of Salome, and connect trumpet calls with appearance of the sensual, superstitious, sly, neurasthenic Tetrarch, but he does this at his own risk. It is enough if the hearer, knowing Wilde's tragedy, is constantly reminded; if his imagination is quickened by the music.

Mr. Hadley's "Salome" made a marked and immediate effect, nor was this due to the fact that it came after Mr. Reger's soporific serenade, for there was an intermission between the works so that the audience had time to pinch itself or set its blood in circulation by a quick walk in the corridor. Mr. Hadley's music pleased because it has melody, rhythm and color; because it is poetical, dramatic, imaginative. It is not necessary to inquire how closely he reproduces the text of episodes in the tragedy; this would be foolish and futile. He has caught in a large measure the spirit of the tragedy, and that is the important thing.

There are a few pages here and there that he would no doubt write better a dozen years from now, or he would reject them. The music that may be supposed to typify John the Baptist is conventional. There is little suggestion of the wild man from the desert in it. But the perverse caprices, the desire, the passion of Salome are expressed amorously and ardently in the music. The dance is one of much distinction in its exoticism, not is it too realistically oriental.

The opening pages have mood, and this mood, changed as a landscape when the moon is clouded, makes an effective close with its tragic interruption, the command of Herod, unable through horror or jealousy to look longer on Salome's ecstasy. There is much individuality in the stronger portions of the work. There is freedom in thought and in expression. The music as a whole is a marked advance on Mr. Hadley's symphony that was performed here two seasons ago.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has been played here several times. Dr. Muck gave a very dramatic reading of this overture, which must be reckoned among the greatest of Tschaikowsky's compositions. The feud music has seldom, if ever, had such significance, nor has the glowing love theme, the chant of triumphant love that mocks time and space, ever been sung with more overwhelming passion.

Coming Concerts.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will take place in Chickering Hall on Monday evening, April 22. This is the concert that was announced for April 1. The programme will be as follows: Schumann's quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1; three movements from a serenade, op. 61, by Jacques-Dalcroze (first time here), and Beethoven's septet, op. 20. Mr. Grisez, clarinet; Mr. Hess, horn; Mr. Sadoni, bassoon, and Mr. Keller, double bass, will assist.

BOSTON POST.
APRIL 20. 1907

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 22d Symphony rehearsal was as follows:

Overture, "In Autumn," Grieg (first time); concerto for violin in D minor, Sibelius (first time); prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, J. K. Paine; "The Sea," orchestral pieces by Claude Debussy, repeated by general request after the first performance on March 2. Miss Maud Powell was soloist.

The overture given yesterday for the first time in this city is not one of Grieg's more remarkable achievements. Those who heard it then would probably have been as well or better satisfied with the song "Im Herbst," which is one of his finest, most dramatic lyrics.

A far more interesting work is the Sibelius violin concerto, the work of a man who has his own word to say, and whose E minor symphony, performed for the first time some months ago, aroused anticipations, which were not, in this case, to go unsatisfied. The concerto bears out the first impression made by the aforesaid symphony: merely that we have in Jean Sibelius a new composer gifted with enormous fertility and distinction of thematic invention, which qualities are only equalled by the striking national flavor and virile individuality of his creations.

In form it differs materially from the classical concerto in its first movement only, which is freer and more rhapsodical in character than usual, being also remarkable as leaving the thematic development more to the solo instrument than the orchestra. An adagio with the usual contrasting section follows. This adagio is of supreme beauty, and there is a rich sustained flow of nobly sensuous melody. The themes of the finale are strongly natural in character, as indeed the whole work is, and the movement, with its rhythmic swing, brings a stirring conclusion.

The scoring is characteristically rich and sombre in color, though not obscuring a very brilliant and difficult solo part. The composer has revised the manuscript of late years, with a resulting clarity of development which is not always to be found in certain pages of the first symphony. The violin solo is of unusual difficulty, but, nevertheless, very playable and effective. It will probably not want long for other interpreters than Miss Powell, and if not so great a work as the symphony, yet ranks as one of the greatest additions to the literature of the violin produced in late years.

Miss Powell was superbly artistic and virile in her performance, and she deserves hearty thanks for the production of such a remarkable novelty. She was hampered by an orchestral accompaniment which was not always perfect.

BOSTON GLOBE
48 APRIL 14, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Two Novelties Played at Symphony Concert.

"Children's Crusade" by the Cecilia—Marine Band Tonight

Recitals of the Week and Personal Gossip.

Two first-time numbers and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture were the offerings at last night's Symphony concert. The program began with the serenade for orchestra by Reger which has been played in this country, but not before in Boston. There may be violent Regerites, as the programist asserts, but they were not notably present yesterday. The piece contains some wonderful melodic ideas in its four movements, but to the violence of modern composition the writer has added the pedantry of the old-fashioned development and summing up, so that the plums seem somewhat far between before the finale.

Of more intensity and of a dramatic, tragic, picture-tone-writing red-hotness was Henry K. Hadley's tone poem based on Oscar Wilde's play, "Salome." It certainly needed no more than a reading of the play and a title to make it thoroughly understandable, for Salome's flutings, Herodias' reasonings, Herod's weak sensuousness and Jokanaan bellowing a phrase from the cistern were absolutely recognizable. So also was the dance of the seven veils, and it was a dance to make the hair stand on end. One didn't fancy being Herod, for whom it was performed. It brought out the real moral of the play, which is that it was fortunate for Herod that he took that sudden resolve at the tail end of the play to have the hussy squashed by his soldiers, for as sure as snaky hate gleamed through Mr Hadley's music, so surely would Salome have had Herod's head on a charger next—no, she would have been more ingenious than that.

Mr Hadley's poem is impressive. It may be unfair to say so, but it certainly was suggested that the book for the student's closet and the tone poem for public production is about all that the subject calls for; certainly after yesterday Boston can forgive Herr Conried and the fussy directors who wouldn't have "Salome" put on here.

The Tschaikowsky number, with its explosions and scenes, its bully fighting and love songs, was eminently the best of the three works for the close of the program.

This week the program is to contain Grieg's overture "Im Herbst," a concerto for violin by Sibelius; J. K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes and Debussy's "La Mer."

The Sibelius concerto will be played by the distinguished American violinist, Miss Maud Powell, who has not appeared at a Symphony concert since 1901.

Symphony Pension Fund.

The sale of seats for the second pension fund concert which will be given in Symphony hall, Sunday evening, April 28, will open at the box office next Friday morning. As already announced, Dr Muck has decided to play the program which was received with favor earlier in the season, consisting of seven overtures and preludes by Wagner, in chronological order, and the "Funeral March" from "Dusk of the Gods."

This will be Dr Muck's last appearance but two, for on the following Friday and Saturday come the final public rehearsal and concert of the season, [illegible] May 14 D[illegible] remain during the [illegible] returning to Boston at the end [illegible] mber.

Mail orders may be sent in to Symphony hall, addressed to C. A. Ellis, manager.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Chickering hall on Monday evening, April 22. This is the concert which was scheduled for April 1, but was postponed on account of the opening of the opera season. The program will comprise Schumann's quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1, three movements from a serenade by Emile Jaques Dalcroze, op. 61, which will then be played for the first time in Boston, and Beethoven's septet for string and wind instruments in E flat, op. 20. In the last number the assisting artists will be Mr Grisez, clarinet, Mr Max Hess horn, Mr Sadoni bassoon and Mr Keller double bass.

[177]

BOSTON ADVERTISER,

APRIL 15, 1907.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Max Reger. Serenade for Orchestra. Op. 95.
Henry Hadley. "Salome." Tone poem for Orchestra.
Tschaikowsky. "Romeo and Juliet." Overture-Fantasie.

Are we having too much music? The reviewer counted twenty empty seats within a radius of four yards from his own, at this concert. It may have been that Reger's reputation for prolixity and mystifying modulations scared some timid ones away. If so their fears on this occasion were groundless, for the Serenade was good music, had many fine themes and was by no means as aggressive as some of the modern music we have had.

The work has a peculiar scoring and contains two string orchestras, one playing with muted strings, the other without the mutes. This new arrangement led to a reseating of the orchestra so that the dialogic effect might be brought out more clearly. It led to another revelation. Our strings do not play with the perfection of a few years ago! A short time since we stated that the brasses were not as good in their ensemble as we had formerly heard them, and now we find the technique of the strings somewhat deteriorated. It is a pity that one cannot have all qualities united in a single conductor. We are paying for Dr. Muck's brilliancy and genius of interpretation by a loss of exquisite ensemble. Some day we will wake up and find the Chicago, the Pittsburg, the Philadelphia orchestras our equals or even possibly our superiors!

The first movement of the Serenade was neither ugly nor too complex. There were moments of much beauty, there were good figures well developed, and the strophe and antistrophe of the two string bands had often a pleasing effect. The second movement, "Vivace a Burlesca," was about as "burlesque" as a table of logarithms might have been. We have not yet found any humor in Reger, such as may be discovered in Richard Strauss and other moderns. Nor could we find the simplicity of the "Andante Semplice" which followed, although there were some beautiful moments in this movement.

The last movement had too much the character of a study in modulation and the work as a whole appeared too long. Reger has that facility of composition that wrecked Raff. He is to be sure a deeper music thinker than Raff, but his ease in creation leads him to become diffuse and unnecessarily prosy. All of his larger works that we have yet seen would gain by compression.

It is with real pleasure that we chronicle a powerful new composition by an American composer. Mr. Henry Hadley has not yet entered the sacred precincts of "Grove's Dictionary," but he is evidently to take rank with the best native composers. He has dramatic instinct, melodic as well as harmonic power, and a complete control of that mighty engine—the modern orchestra. He did not intend to compete with Richard Strauss in setting this sultry subject, for he had finished this orchestral work long before the opera was written.

The tone-poem began impressively, with passages of deep wood-wind that might have been composed by Tschaikowsky. The trumpets of Herod were most brilliantly scored and the events of the Oscar Wilde tragedy were so graphically set forth that there was not much difficulty in the layman following the tale without a score.

We found the composer less successful in picturing the passion and longing of Salome than in portraying the heroic or tragic points of the subject. Even the solo violin or the oboe phrases had not the intensity of Wilde's picture.

The dance, however, was both picturesque and original, and it fitted the scene like a glove. Here the bassoon is very cleverly employed. There are many points of Salome's character given to the oboe, which was very prominent in the earlier portions of the work. It was notably well played. The catastrophe, the beheading of John, called forth a cataclysm on muted horns, gong, and all the orchestral paraphernalia of evil. Then came anxiety on the kettle-drum and a mournful solo phrase on the bass-clavinette. The final outburst of Herod—"Kill that woman!"—and the death of the heroine was powerfully drawn. The score was of the largest modern sort, and the work is a fine addition to the modern repertoire. Yet the passionate, amorous and languorous traits of the heroine could be made more effective, should Mr. Hadley ever revise his work. It is a great advance over his symphony.

Then followed more programme-music in somewhat the same vein, for Tschaikowsky is less strong on the love-making side of "Romeo and Juliet" than in the heroic touches of the tragedy. Dr. Muck often follows soup with soup, and roast meat with roast meat, in his orchestral menus. He gave a splendid reading of the work, as fine as any we could imagine; yet it scarcely made its due effect after all the crashes of "Salome."

The concert was unnecessarily long, for it began almost ten minutes late and the intermission was extended fully five minutes after the audience had resumed their seats after the promenade. This defect might easily be remedied.

This week we are to have a new overture by Grieg, Maud Powell is to play a violin concerto new to Boston, one of Paine's compositions is to be given, and then— we are invited to take another voyage across Debussy's mud-puddle. Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON JOURNAL

APRIL 15, 1907.

SYMPHONY LAUNCHES "SALOME" TONE POEM

First Production of Hadley's Work in America, Perhaps in World. Max Reger's "Serenade" Given Place on Program.

At the twenty-first Symphony concert Max Reger had at last a place on one of our orchestra's programs. That in itself was rather notable, for Reger has kicked up more disturbance in the musical world of Germany and beyond than any man of recent years. He has, Wagner-like, been responsible for the creation of two parties as regards their attitude toward his compositions; these have gathered together in various concert halls, and have wildly applauded and vociferously hissed his works alternately and simultaneously; instances have been known of personal encounters on the outside, and once a crowd of his contemners collected underneath the gentleman's window at night and with tin horns, cow-bells and rattles gave what they were pleased to call a correct imitation of one of his orchestral pieces. All of which has, of course, redounded to Reger's fame.

But no well-balanced person could possibly raise any riotous protest to the "Serenade" played on Saturday evening. There is nothing revolutionary about it, spite of the curious dividing of the strings into muted and unmuted choirs and the intermingling of first and second violins, 'cellos and violas in these separate divisions. It is in four movements of almost symphonic proportions and style; nowhere is there any violently unusual orchestration or very individual thematic material. The first movement opens gracefully and with a peculiarly rich and attractive tone-color, but it soon wanders into long and tedious dissertation and fails to hold the attention. The second movement, called a "vivace a burlesca," is a weak and impotent affair. The finale, an allegro of quite orthodox form, is the best portion of the work, which, as a whole, must be set down as uninspired and pedantic.

Henry K. Hadley's tone poem, "Salome," based on the Oscar Wilde tragedy, was performed for the first time in America, if not in the world. Written before its composer had heard Strauss' opera, it is, of course, open to no suggestion of the great German's influence. It is a strong and effective piece of work, for the most part, with expressive themes for the Salome passion, the Baptist's denunciation, the dance and the final catastrophe. Its chief lack is that of the painting of the sensuous in tone; not even the dance suggests much of voluptuous languor or ardor. Then, too, it is discursive and occasionally speaks of padding. But it remains a credit to American composition and a promise that Mr. Hadley has finer things to come. Its performance was highly dramatic and noble.

A magnificent reading of Tschaikowsky's great "Romeo and Juliet" overture brought an inspiring ending to a concert that had up to that time contained much that was dull and conventional.

The Boston Journal

APRIL 20, 1907.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given Monday evening in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. Professor Hess, the leader of the Quartet, has put on his program a novelty by Emile Jaques Dalcorze, who will be remembered as the composer of the concerto for violin which Henri Marteau played here last year. This is a serenade for string quartet and three movements of it will be played. The first number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Quartet in D major," Op. 11, No. 1. The final number will be Beethoven's "Septet" for strings and wind instruments in E flat, Op. [illegible]. The assisting artists will be Mr. Grisé[illegible], Mr. Sadoni, bassoon; Mr. Max Hess, [illegible] and Mr. Keller, double bass.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The second concert of the year under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution will be given on Sunday evening, April 28, in Symphony Hall, at 8 o'clock. As already announced, by general request Dr. Muck will repeat the program which was played at the Pension Fund concert on Dec. 30. This was devoted entirely to the excerpts from Wagner's music dramas.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The twenty-third and penultimate program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. On it will be a novelty that possesses a certain amount of local interest, as it is a symphony by Victor Bendix of Copenhagen, whose brother was the late Otto Bendix of this city, a well-known musician here some years ago. This symphony is Bendix's Fourth, in D minor. The other works on the program will be Chabrier's "Espana" and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride."

N. Y. World, April 7, 1907.

GERMAN EMPEROR LENDS BOSTON HIS CONDUCTOR.

By Edward Ziegler.

THE United States of America, Boston in especial, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in particular, were paid a pretty compliment the other day when Wilhelm, Emperor of Germany, graciously presented them with the services for another year of Dr. Carl Muck. This noted conductor has been at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past season, and his success has been so great that every effort was made to retain him another year, but to do this it became necessary to obtain permission of the German Emperor, for Muck had come to this country on leave of absence for one year only.

Now, it happens that Dr. Muck is a great favorite of the German Emperor. He is one of the Royal Opera conductors, and he is said to be held in particularly high esteem by the monarch of all Germany, so that when the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra invited Dr. Muck to become its conductor, the latter applied for leave of absence from Berlin for one year, but one of the conditions of having this granted was that he would not apply to have this term extended. Hence when the time of Dr. Muck's stay in America began to run to its close, and the conductor showed a disposition to wish to remain, every wire of importance was pulled to induce the German Emperor to forego having his favorite conductor in Berlin again next winter.

It is rumored that Dr. Muck himself did not make any appeal to the Emperor—he had promised that he would not apply for an extension of his furlough, and he is said now to have refused to break his word. But persuasion of the highest sort was brought to bear upon the Emperor; and when, for a long time, no decision was reached, the devotees of good music in Boston and New York were puzzling over the delay.

Finally there came a cable announcing the fact that the German Emperor had granted another year's leave of absence to Dr. Muck. And the reason stated for this courtesy was, as was reported, that the Emperor was lending us his conductor for another year since he was convinced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted not as a money-making enterprise, but as an art institution, and that he wished to encourage this. Thus the staying of Dr. Muck, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year is a favor for which we are indebted to the Emperor; and his recognition of the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an art institution cannot be construed except as a compliment by those who know that abroad many statements about the love for serious music in this country are taken with a whole peck of salt.

Oddly enough Dr. Muck heard of the Emperor's concession after almost every once else know of it. Some members of his orchestra told him about it, and he smiled doubtingly. It happened that on that day the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing in New York, and during the intermission some of Dr. Muck's friends came into the artist's room to congratulate him. The conductor received these congratulations very dubiously, arguing that if the news were true he surely would know of it directly from Berlin. When asked if he would stay if the Emperor had granted him the additional leave of absence, he smiled mysteriously and answered: "If the Emperor grants me leave to stay then I must stay—otherwise would not my refusing to stay be lese majeste?"

The one season of Dr. Muck's regime at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been one of great results. His programmes have been severely criticised, and they are open to criticism; but the orchestra, under his baton, has been unleashed so that now it plays with artistic freedom where formerly it chafed under too much restraint. There are to be some further improvements made next year, and we are really to be congratulated upon keeping Dr. Muck another season.

And, after that, what is the Boston Symphony Orchestra going to do? Great conductors are growing scarcer every day. What has become of the race of batonic giants who sprang into existence with Bayreuth? Are they to have no artistic progeny?

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, APRIL 15, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

CONCERTS AND PLAYS OF A BUSY WEEK-END

Reger's "Serenade" and Hadley's "Salome" —Dr. Muck Makes Tschaikovski's "Romeo and Juliet" Music Drama—A Concert by the Marine Band—A Prophecy About Gabrilowitsch—"Hamlet" with a Cast of Women—A New York View of the Significant Lemon—Mark Twain, the Ghetto Youngsters and a Sunday Matinee—Other News of the Day

The amusing incident—the saving grace, as some would have it—of the Symphony concert on Saturday night was the "anti-Regerite" yawn. The orchestra was in the full tide of the very celestial lengths of Reger's "Serenade," and the audience might easily have been thinking that art is long and time not fleeting with this particular example of his music. There was the usual stillness and then the unusual yawn—the yawn that has got out of hand, or rather out of mouth, in a too sudden and spasmodic effort to check a creeping drowsiness. The audience stirred from its languors with a start and a smile. Was the warfare between the "Regerites" and the "anti-Regerites" about to break forth in our decorous concert-room even as it has raged on occasions in the more excitable halls of Germany? Was the yawn the first, albeit the unpremeditated, shot of the "anti-Regerites"? But there were none of the opposing faction to return the long-drawn fire. Very probably there were not even any in the house; for the "Serenade" was much less warmly applauded than it was on Friday. Forthwith, the audience slipped back into listlessness and not the suspicion of a yawn broke the endless wavelets of the rest of the piece. Seemingly the "Serenade" was less well played the second time than it had been the first. For once the strings had distinctly an "off" night. Their tone wanted the vibrancy and elasticity, the lightness and the brightness that they gave it on Friday afternoon, that Reger's music palpably asks; and that in turn lent it a glamor and a suppleness that it lacked on Saturday. The listener felt the lengths of the piece, and repined under Reger's meagre skill in the differentiation of orchestral timbres and his lack of imagination in diversified rhythms. The changeful harmonies lost something of their charm. The whole seemed less spontaneous and more artificial. The freshness of interest on Friday waned. It was easy to suspect that curiosity once satisfied, Reger's orchestral music no longer pricks.

On the other hand, Mr. Hadley's "Salome" was played more eloquently and graphically than it had been on Friday. The distinctive trait of the tone-poem still seemed to be its graphic quality as a musical impression and a musical narrative. Remarkable, indeed, is its expression by contrasting and interwoven melodic ideas and instrumental voices, not only of the varying moods and the changing characters, but also of the dramatic contents of the temptation of Salome by Herod. It is the crux of a tone-poem "after" Wilde's tragedy. At the beginning and at the end the way is clear enough to a composer of Mr. Hadley's ready imagination. Between Jokanaan's denunciations of Salome and her dance lies the pitfall. Mr. Hadley not only bridged it, but filled it, and with music that was not merely delineative, but that had interest, worth and power in itself. Nowhere has he forgotten that even a tone-poem of the most modern fashion must stand upon its own musical legs as well as upon the props of its "programme."

For ending came Tschaikovsi's familiar tone-poem—for in purpose and achievement it is nothing else—"Romeo and Juliet." Time and again it has been played here, but never before under a conductor, who, when he chooses, can be so operatic in the best sense as can Dr. Muck. He made the fantasia into a tragedy in ton[illegible] With the beginning he brought atmosph[illegible] of fate and passion. No mimic strife [illegible] the stage can be half as vivid or thrillin[illegible] as that which Tschaikovski, and he and each man of the orchestra whirled in clash and tumult through their tones. The voice of Romeo's song was of passion melting in its own heat. Every pause, every accent heightened the dramatic intensity of the whole, and the end was as tragedy, stilling her voice in sorrow and in pity averting her eyes. The music and the performance pierced with their beauty and stirred with their power—if only as Tschaikovski half persuades us, Romeo and Juliet were really Slavs.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 18, 1907

"The board of directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Institution" as their formal title is, have acknowledged in as formal a letter the "magnificent donation," $2704.17, that they have lately received from Messrs. Chickering & Sons—three-quarters of the revenue of the series of Sunday Chamber Concerts last winter. If we are not mistaken, the sum is the first increase to the fund outside the profits of the two annual concerts for it and gifts from persons more or less closely connected with the orchestra, and in itself it is notably large.

[178]

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

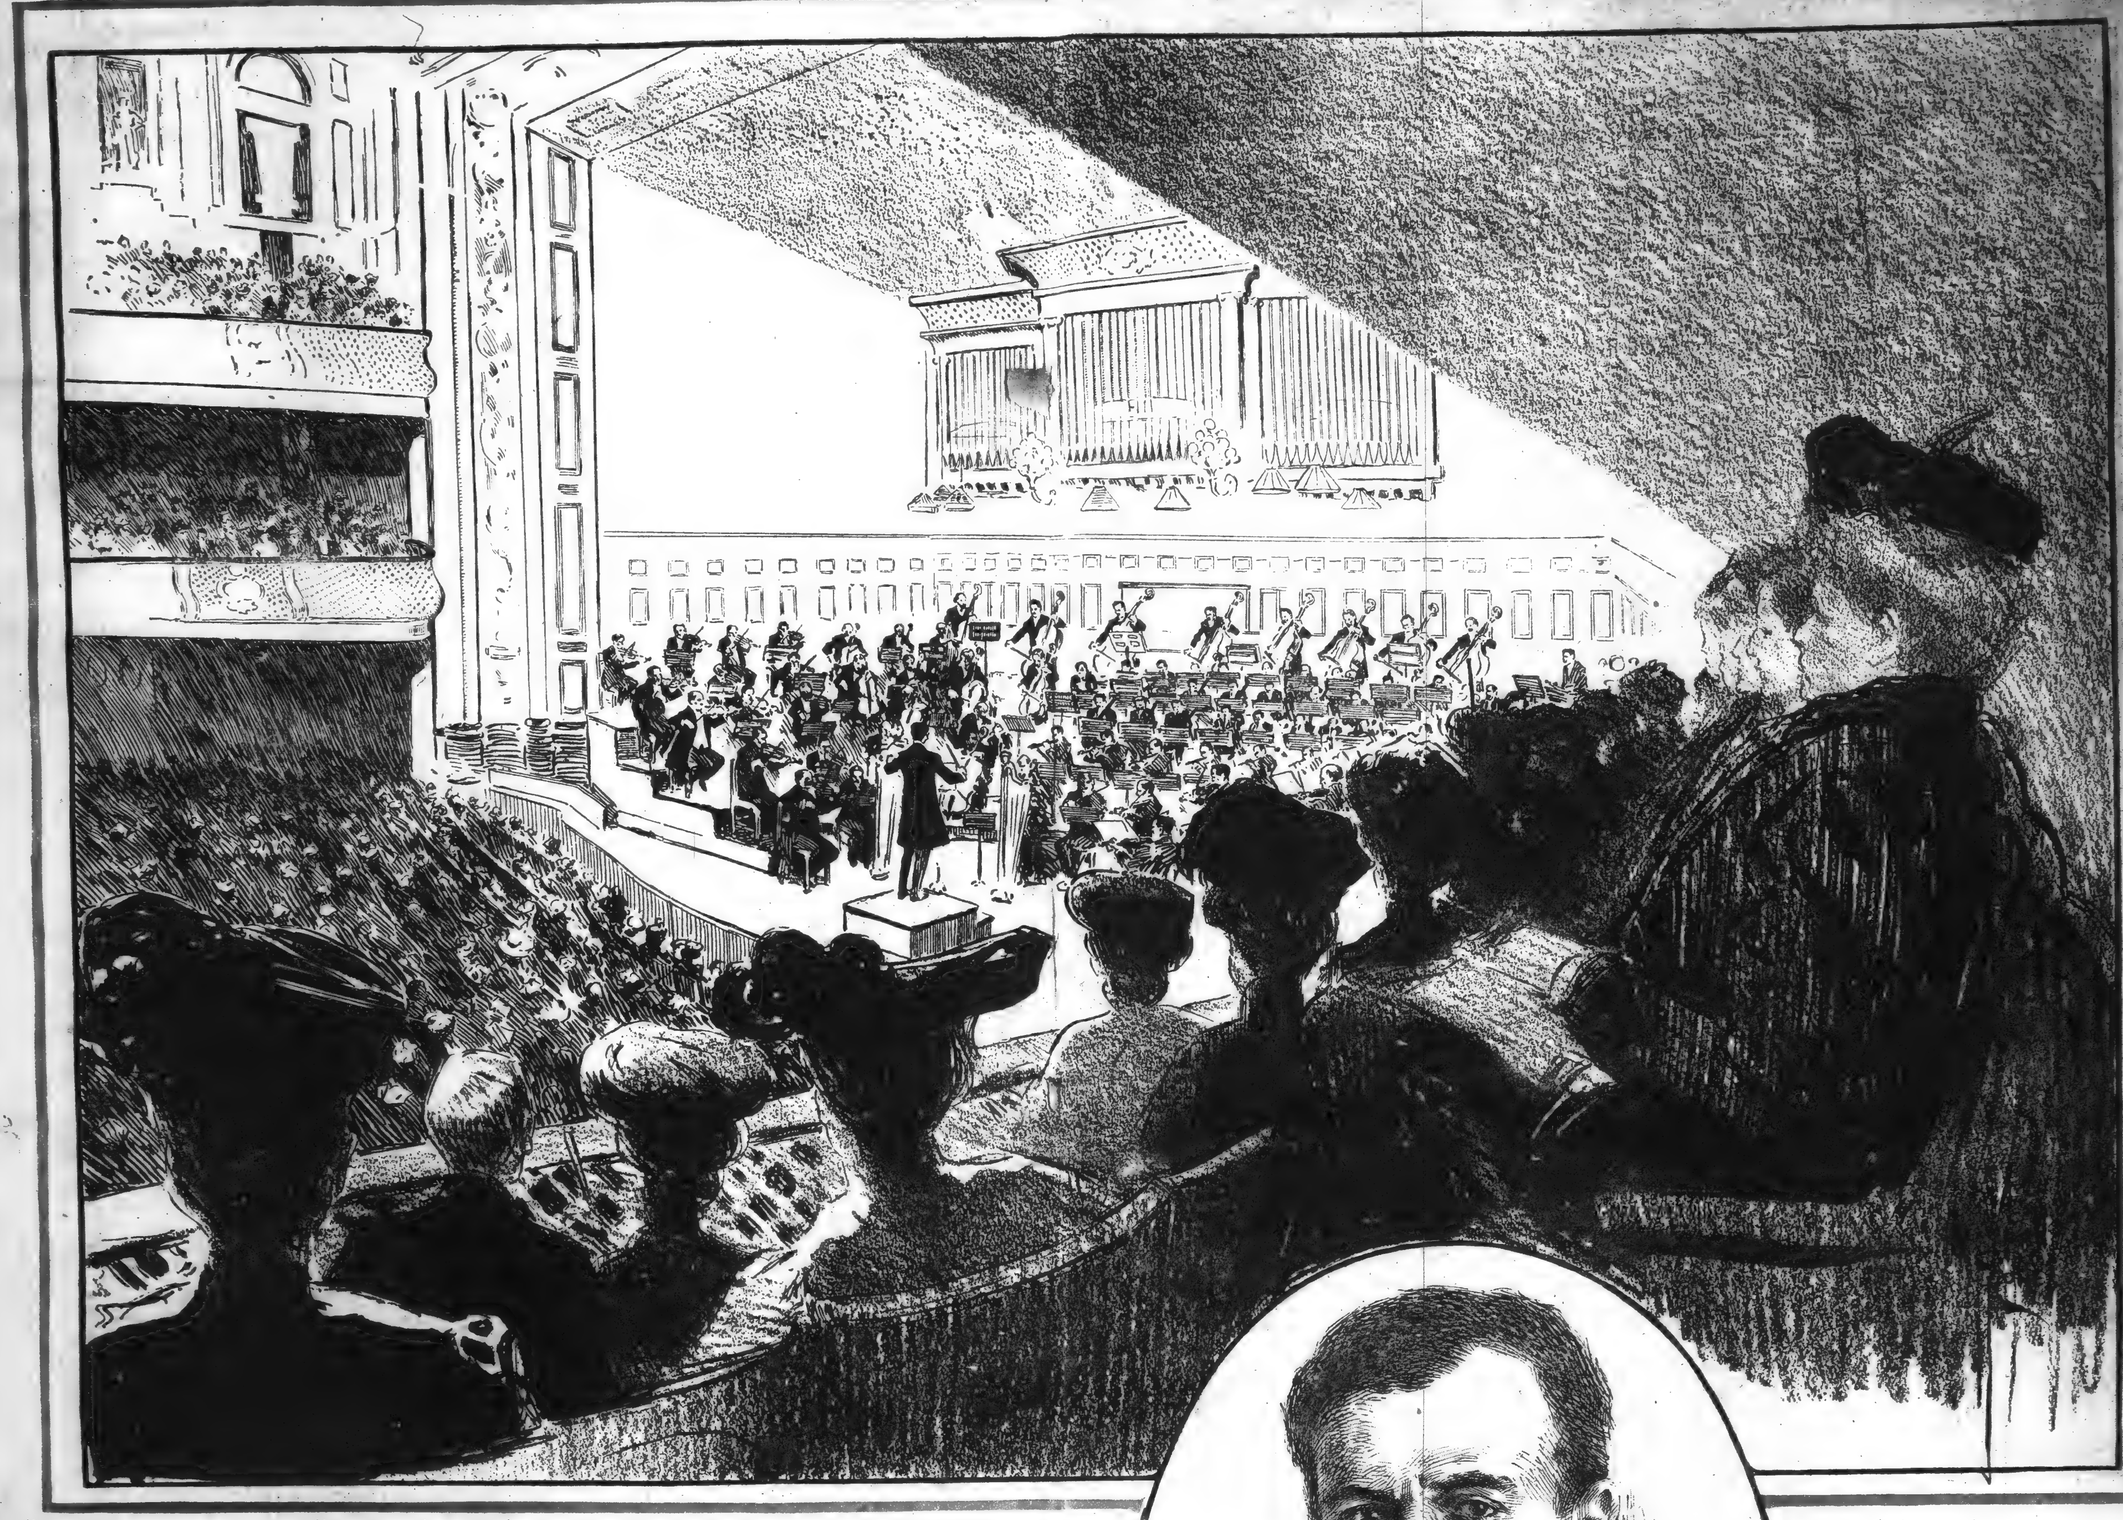
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Even Kaiser Wilhelm Has Paid Tribute to the Remarkably Developed Higginson Organization



THE ORCHESTRA IN SYMPHONY HALL, DR. MUCK CONDUCTING.

DR. KARL MUCK is to stay for another year with the Boston Symphony orchestra, by special permission of the German Emperor.

Music lovers in Boston and throughout the United States heaved a sigh of relief when the announcement came, for much in the future of the Symphony depended upon Dr Muck's continuance in the capacity of conductor.

It was significant that Kaiser Wilhelm was persuaded to allow the imperial orchestra to go another year without its director only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony orchestra was maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture. It showed what a strong hold music has upon the German heart, and how much the head of the German Empire has its advancement in mind.

Incidentally, it was one of the most diplomatic and graceful things the Kaiser ever did. From every section of the United States has come praise of this act of international courtesy, an act that has so important a bearing on musical culture in America.

For what would Boston, or the United States, do without the Symphony orchestra? And what would the Symphony do at the present time without Dr. Karl Muck? The Boston Symphony orchestra is a national institution now, as well as being the pride of Bostonians and New Englanders. It is a national institution, in a class by itself in America, and on a plane with the best of the old world orchestras; and at the same time it is a glorious movement to the culture and munificence of one man, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, of Boston.

Most millionaires have a hobby. With one it is horse racing, with another yachting, another may go in for art galleries, or a man may have a passion for libraries; some, it is whispered, make stock gambling their play and work and whole life. To Maj. Higginson the Boston Symphony orchestra is yacht, library, art gallery, avocation.

The Symphony had its birth at a critical time in the history of music in Boston. The death knell of the Harvard Musical Association of that day had sounded. A newly formed Philharmonic Society existed, which supported an orchestra, but, though it was maintained upon as adequate a basis as the circumstances warranted or allowed, it was leagues behind the musical organization which in his travels abroad, in Vienna and Berlin, Henry Lee Higginson had dreamed of establishing in his land for Boston. When Maj. Higginson announced his intention of establishing a new orchestra in February of 1881, the Philharmonic Society was glad to retire from the field.

It was to be a new orchestra in a new way, he said. And so it proved. There was at that time in Boston a young baritone singer, Georg Henschel, a clever, musical to his finger tips, versatile and a man of some executive ability. To him was confided the task of organizing the Boston Symphony orchestra, though he had had no experience worth mentioning as a conductor. Yet in this pioneer work of organizing, a work of which the difficulties can only be appreciated by those who have had experience of such things, Henschel did wonders. Aided by [illegible] advice and help, backed by his extensive financial support, he got together the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the organization then that it is today. At that time it numbered 70 performers, 12 first and 11 second violins, eight violas, nine 'cellos, nine double-basses and about the number of wood and brass-wind players which a small orchestra usually possesses. With the orchestra thus organized, the first concert of the Boston Symphony was given on Oct. 22, 1881.

To trace its history from that date would be to trace the rise of orchestral music in America from a comparatively humble plane to the pinnacle reached by the orchestra of the first cities in Europe. The intention of the founder of the Symphony was to make it minister specially to people of small means but musical tastes, and so at first the price of the best places was fixed at 50 cents, and at the rehearsals on the afternoons of the days preceding the regular concerts, seats were sold for 25 cents.

There was never a moment's doubt about the popularity of the concerts. They became not only popular, but fashionable. So great was the competition among people for the choice of places that an auction sale was held at the beginning of each season for the best seats. In spite of some adverse comment upon this step, it was necessary, and it in no way restricted the popular privileges which the founder of the Symphony set out to bestow. This has been proved in a quarter century of triumphant achievement, in which the halls where the orchestra performed have been packed to their capacity.

During this interval, love of music appears to have permeated every class of Boston's population. Not only do the regular music lovers attend every concert of the Symphony, but the audiences that fill Symphony Hall, and that too in an outcome of Maj. Higginson's support, are drawn from all strata of Greater Boston society. Under its various leaders—and there have been not a few of them—the Boston Symphony has secured a hold upon the affections of Bostonians that no other similar organization in America has attained among the people to whom it looks for support. The whole of New England takes a proprietary pride in the Symphony; New York is as jealous of its prestige before the European musical world as it could be of a pet home organization, west and south and even in Canada, the Boston Symphony occupies a unique position in the musical world.

Some orchestras have been founded to provide a famous conductor with an instrument to show his genius, and when that conductor threw up the project or passed from earth, the organization promptly disbanded. Not so the Boston Symphony. It was established on a surer basis, and always its conductors have been engaged to fill the need the orchestra created.

It has had five conductors since its inception, and one of them was at the head of the organization for two periods, separated by several years. Possibly the Boston public has the critical faculty highly developed, for these leaders have not escaped severe criticism at times, in spite of their undoubted place at the head of their profession and their great reputations abroad. But always they have been held in affectionate regard and affectionate memory by the great mass of the musical public, and each has left his imprint upon the institution he was called to conduct.

First there was Henschel, who was the pioneer in a field since grown fragrant with much culture. After him came Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson had seen in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the imperial opera, and as conductor of the famous Society of Friends of Music. To him, the strong, alert, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. By rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of tone. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the pruning process he found necessary, perhaps even because of that and the improvement in the personnel of the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps which has not only shown no indication of dying out, but, under his successor, burns as brightly as ever.

America and American life proved too strenuous for Gericke, and he retired after the season of '88-'89, to return to his beloved Vienna. To succeed him came Arthur Nikisch, conductor at the Neuse Theatre of Leipsic, a young man who at that time was just coming into the fame that later fell to him so generously. Nikisch had more originality and daring to the square inch in his makeup than any three conductors in the public eye, and he was one of the most intensely subjective of the modern school of conductors.

It was only natural that about such a personality the critical public of Boston should be split into factions. Yet in the three years during which he conducted the Symphony he continued to maintain it at the high standard of excellence to which Gericke had brought it.

In 1893, Nikisch's contract was cancelled. Immediately Maj. Higginson, through his agents, began negotiating for Dr. Hans Richter. This giant of the musical world had had troubles of his own in the intriguing court circles of the Austrian capital, and was disgusted with the way in which the Imperial Opera at Vienna was managed. He expressed willingness to come to Boston to conduct the Symphony, and actually signed a contract with Maj. Higginson. But the Austrian authorities awoke to the fact that they were about to lose him.

As a salve to his feelings, Richter got a decoration and an appointment to the post of Hofkapellmeister at the opera on the death of Hellmesberger. So did the great Richter calmly ignore his American contract and stay in Vienna. Emil Paur had followed Nikisch as conductor at the Leipsic Opera, and he now stepped to the front of the Boston Symphony.

His sway endured for five years—a vigorous, somewhat strenuous sway. In 1898 he was succeeded by Gericke, who returned to Boston to find that his hosts of admirers and friends had kept a warm place in their hearts for him. Paur went to Pittsburg, where he is now conducting the Pittsburg Symphony. Gericke continued as conductor of the orchestra until 1906, and in June of that year Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin was engaged as conductor.

DR. KARL MUCK

Dr. Muck was one of the conductors of the royal opera at Berlin, and as such was in the service of the German Emperor, from whom it was necessary to obtain a leave of absence. This was accomplished only with great difficulty, for Dr. Muck shared with Richard Strauss the direction of all the important productions of the Berlin opera and stands high in the Kaiser's favor. However, he finally reached Boston, and Boston has come to regard him as one of the greatest conductors the Symphony has ever boasted. Dr. Muck has achieved trimmphs not only in Berlin, but in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other capitals, and has been praised for his "phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

So much for the conductors of the Boston Symphony. A word about the personnel of the orchestra. It has long been the custom of Americans to refer to the Boston Symphony as a band of virtuosi. That is what it is, in fact. Young and ambitious "lions" of the Conservatory orchestra, that were the delight of Berlioz in Paris, to whom the orchestra meant a field for hard and energetic labor, were proud to come to Boston to join this organization under Gericke and his successors, Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski, Roth, Giese, the Adamowskis, Schuecker, Fourtau, Longy—those were names to conjure with in the musical world, and they were the names of players in the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Next to the conductor himself, the man who has most to do with the efficiency of an orchestra is the concert master. The French call him the chef d'attaque. He may be described as the go-between for orchestra and conductor, the prime minister of the autocratic head of the organization. Often his duties are of the most onerous and responsible description.

When anything goes wrong, it is the concert master who gets the blame; when things go with smooth success, it is the conductor upon whose head the laurel wreaths are placed. He carries out in the practical workings the directions of the conductor. If the conductor wants certain changes in the phrasing or accentuation, it falls to the concert master to arrange the changes. He must see to all the instruments and have a care that they are in tune with one another before rehearsals and concerts; he acts as mediator and pacificator when a misunderstanding arises between conductor and members of the orchestra; he is in fact, the helmsman acting under the captain's orders and the first mate and the chief engineer combined.

Fortunate has it been for the Boston Symphony that for this important post it has had two such men as Franz Kneisel and Prof. Willy Hess. The latter is the present concert master, and his vigorous personality, his talents as a musician and his technical accomplishment have enabled him to carry out the best traditions of his office in the economy of the Symphony.

There are now, when all the players are in requisition—which, of course, they are only in the most modern compositions—about 90 men, namely, 16 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, 10 'cellos, eight double-basses, four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and one player each of the harp, tuba, timpani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle and tambour.

Of the players themselves, the rank and file, they are principally drawn from great European orchestras. They are male without exception, and female players, however talented, have never been regularly engaged for the Symphony. The players are of German, French, Austrian, Russian and Polish extraction for the most part.

The terms under which they are engaged vary greatly. Annual contracts for the season of 29 weeks, 24 of which are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to travelling, are the general arrangement, and the ordinary salary runs from $30 to $40 per week. Of course, the chief players, such as the first violin or the concert master, the first 'cellist or the first performers on the other instruments, get much more, up to $5000 a year, with engagements of several years. Not a few receive weekly salaries of various amounts for periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes for practically the whole year. The conductors themselves are said to have received salaries running from $8000 to $10,000 per year.

With the idea of making the Symphony a perfectly organized orchestra, the members devote their whole energy to its work. But as a season of 29 weeks' salary is insufficient to support the rank and file, the "Pops" of the early summer were instituted, for its founder has always aimed at making it possible for the players to devote all their time and talents to the Symphony. The "Pops" last for eight weeks after the close of the winter season and are one of the greatest musical attractions Boston possesses.

To eke out the remaining period of enforced idleness, some of the members of the Symphony teach and some join other orchestras for brief intervals. But first, last and all the time, it is the Boston Symphony in which their whole hearts are centred and toward the efficiency of which they bend all their talents and energies.

The Musical Union was a spectre at one time that threatened to create havoc with the Symphony. Maj. Higginson himself took a broad view of the problem. He did not prohibit the members of the Symphony from belonging to a union, but he absolutely prohibited the idea that any union could make a "closed shop" of the orchestra. While he believes in unions, he stated plainly that, should the union attempt to dictate to the Boston Symphony orchestra or to interfere in any way with its management or the freedom of its members, he would immediately pay off all hands and disband the organization on the spot. This attitude was prolific of excellent results. All the members of the Symphony who belonged to the union resigned from it, and the situation was relieved of the threatened embarrassment.

It is ruled on the same lines of discipline that any modern orchestra or opera company is ruled by. Fines for being late at rehearsals, heavier fines for lateness at concerts, and for non-attendance heavier punishment still. These penalties, being, however, solely for the purpose of discipline, are very seldom exacted, and, as has been said by one member, "the contract is much more severe than Mr. Higginson is."

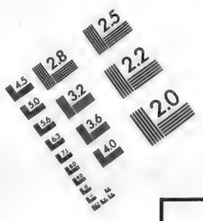
And of the generous founder of the Boston Symphony, what can be said to adequately express what he has done for the advancement of music in America? Soldier—he bears the scar of a sabre wound received in the civil war to this day—patriot, musician and backer of many gigantic industrial enterprises, man of letters, a musician and an unostentatious philanthropist. The gods were kind to Henry Lee Higginson, and he made noble use of the gifts of birth, talent, wealth and position that were his.

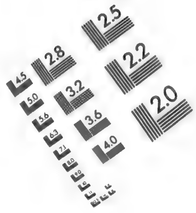
REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

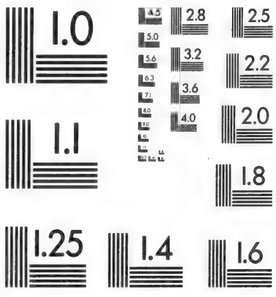
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

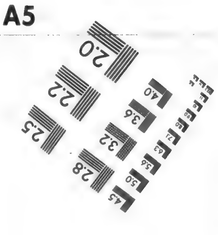
1.5 mm

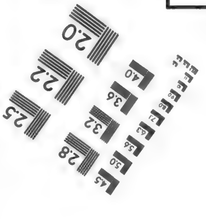
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

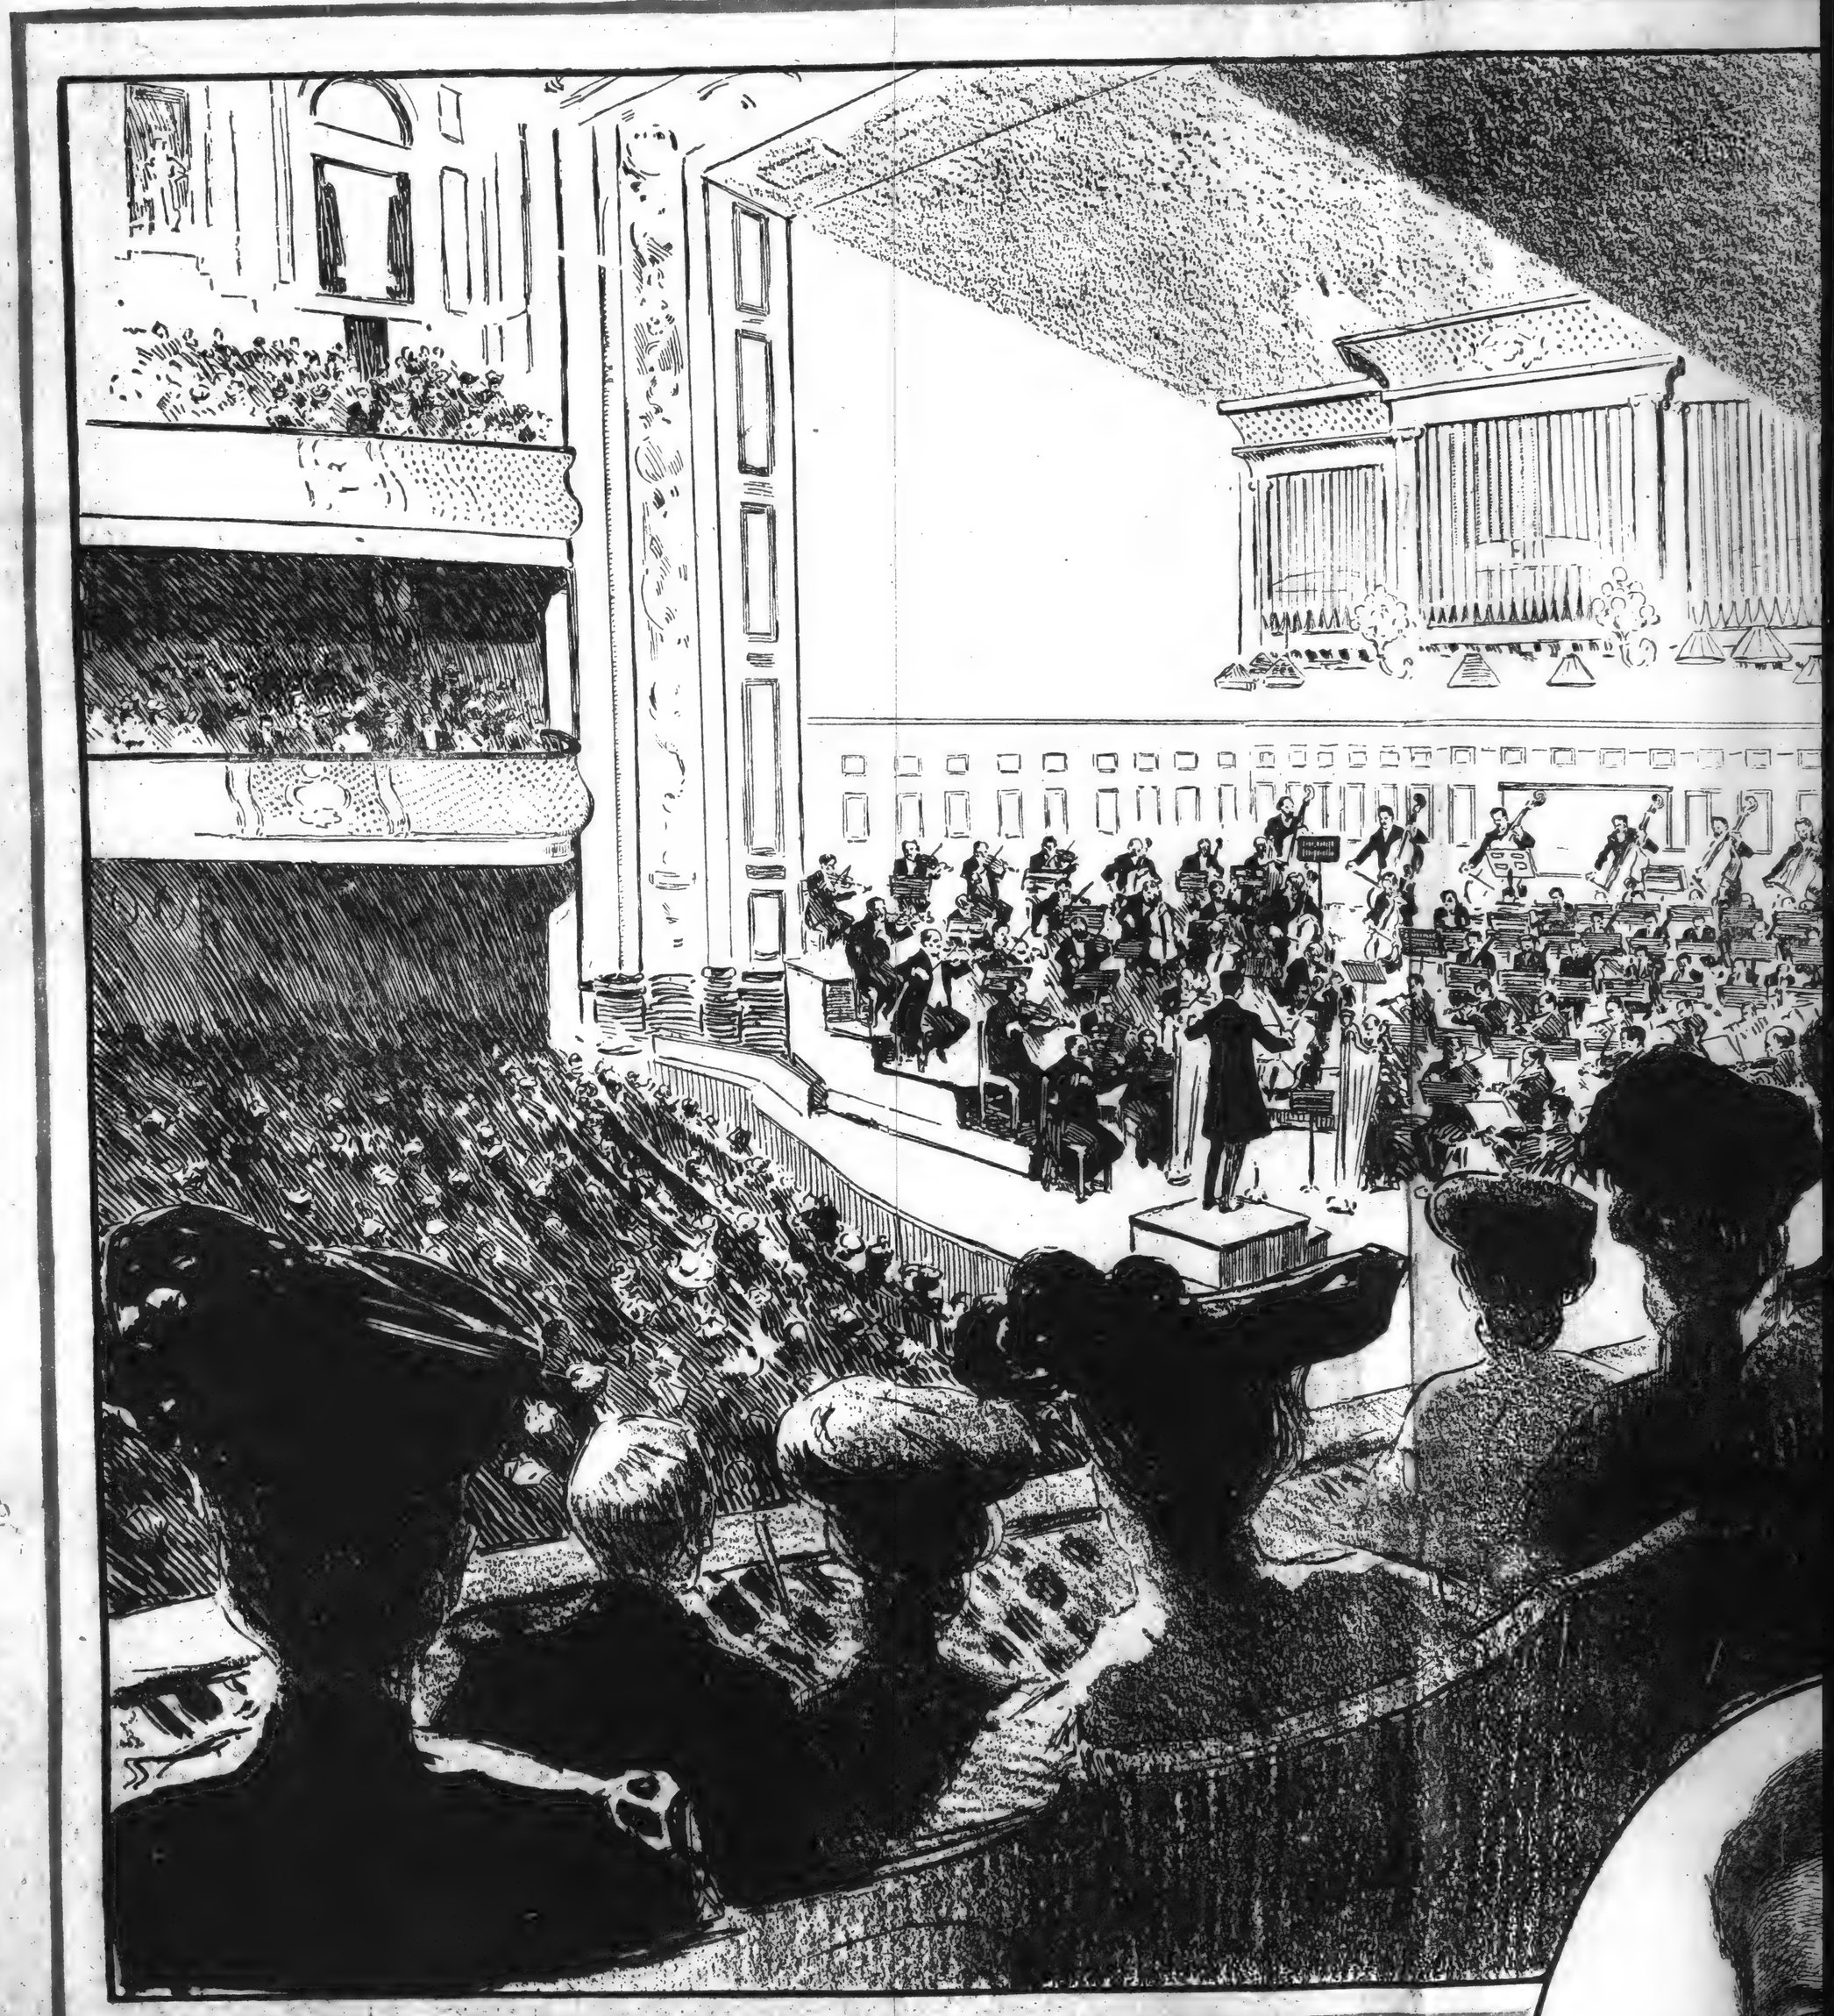
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THE BOSTON SYMPHON

Even Kaiser Wilhelm Has Paid Tribute to the Remarkably



THE ORCHESTRA IN SYMPHONY HALL, DR. MUCK CONDUCTING.

DR. KARL MUCK is to stay for another year with the Boston Symphony orchestra, by special permission of the German Emperor.

Music lovers in Boston and throughout the United States heaved a sigh of relief when the announcement came, for much in the future of the Symphony depended upon Dr Muck's continuance in the capacity of conductor.

It was significant that Kaiser Wilhelm was persuaded to allow the imperial orchestra to go another year without its director only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony orchestra was maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture. It showed what a strong hold music has upon the German heart, and how much the head of the German Empire has its advancement in mind.

Incidentally, it was one of the most diplomatic and graceful things the Kaiser ever did. From every portion of the United States has come praise of this act of international courtesy, an act that has so important a bearing on musical culture in America.

For what would Boston, or the United States, do without the Symphony orchestra? And what would the Symphony do at the present time without Dr. Karl Muck? The Boston Symphony orchestra is a national institution now, as well as being the pride extensive financial support, he got together the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the organization then that it is today. At that time it numbered 70 performers, 12 first and 11 second violins, eight violas, nine cellos, nine double-basses and about the number of wood and brass-wind players which a small orchestra usually possesses. With the orchestra thus organized, the first concert of the Boston Symphony was given on Oct. 22, 1881.

To trace its history from that date would be to trace the rise of orchestral music in America from a comparatively humble plane to the pinnacle reached by the orchestra of the first cities in Europe. The intention of the founder of the Symphony was to make it minister specially to people of small means but musical tastes, and so at first the price of the best places was fixed at 50 cents, and at the rehearsals on the afternoons of the days preceding the regular concerts, seats were sold for 25 cents.

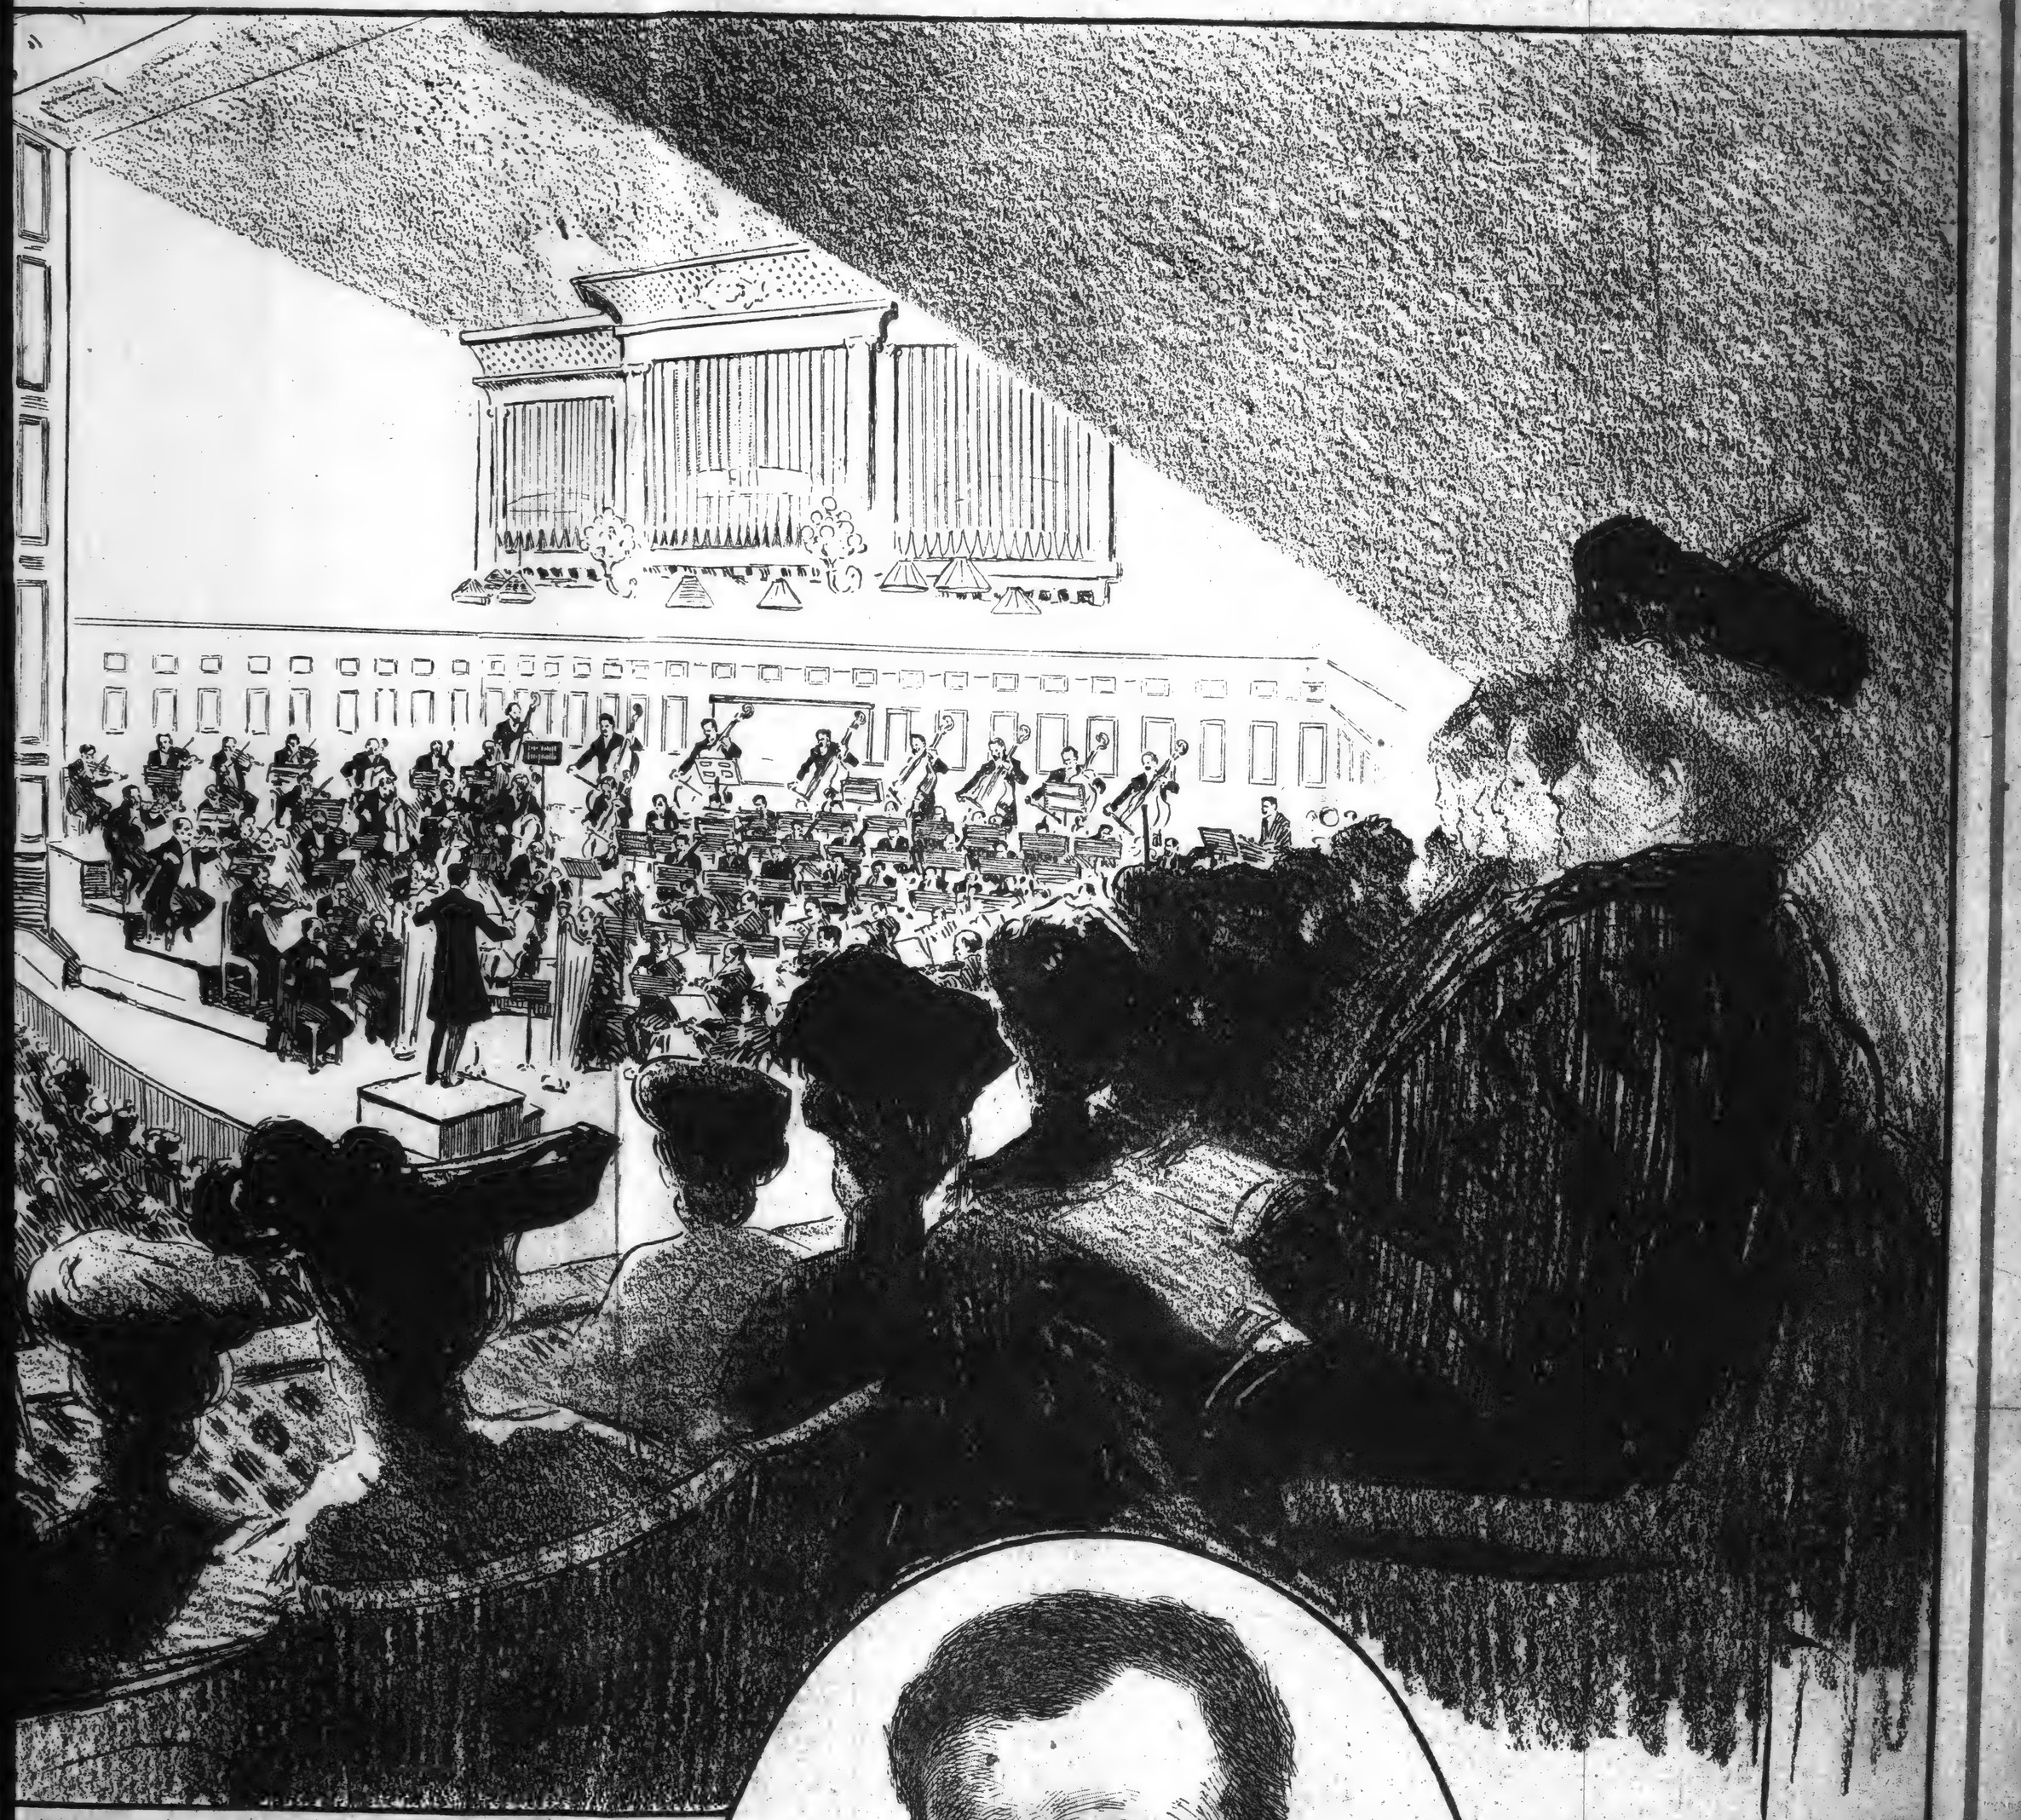
There was never a moment's doubt about the popularity of the concerts. They became not only popular, but fashionable. So great was the competition among people for the choice of places that an auction sale was held at the beginning of each season for the best seats. In spite of some adverse comment upon this step, it was necessary, and it in no way restricted the popular privileges which the great mass of the musical public, and each has left his imprint upon the institution he was called to conduct.

First there was Henschel, who was the pioneer in a field since grown fragrant with much culture. After him came Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson had seen in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the imperial opera, and as conductor of the famous Society of Friends of Music. To him, the strong, alert, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life. Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. By rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of tone. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the pruning process he found necessary, perhaps even because of that and the improvement in the personnel of the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps which has not only shown no indication of dying out, but, under his successor, burns as brightly as ever.

TON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Has Paid Tribute to the Remarkably Developed Higginson Organization



LL, DR. MUCK CONDUCTING.

got together the Bos-

nization then that it mbered 70 performers, ht violas, nine 'cellos, the number of wood a small orchestra rchestra thus organ- oston Symphony was at date would be to ic in America from a the pinnacle reached ities in Europe. The e Symphony was to eople of small means first the price of the ents, and at the re- e days preceding the d for 25 cents.

doubt about the popu- came not only popu- was the competition places that an anc- nning of each season some adverse com- cessary, and it in no privileges which the out to bestow. This entury of triumphant where the orchestra great mass of the musical public, and each has left his imprint upon the institution he was called to conduct.

First there was Henschel, who was the pioneer in a field since grown fragrant with much culture. After him came Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson had seen in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the imperial opera, and as conductor of the famous Society of Friends of Music. To him, the strong, alert, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life. Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. By rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of tone. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the pruning process he found necessary, perhaps even because of that and the improvement in the personn orchestra, he created an esprit de corps w not only shown no indication of dying ou under his successor, burns as brightly as ev

America and American life proved too str for Gericke, and he retired after the season of ality, his talents as a musician and his technical accomplishment have enabled him to carry out the best traditions of his office in the economy of the Symphony.

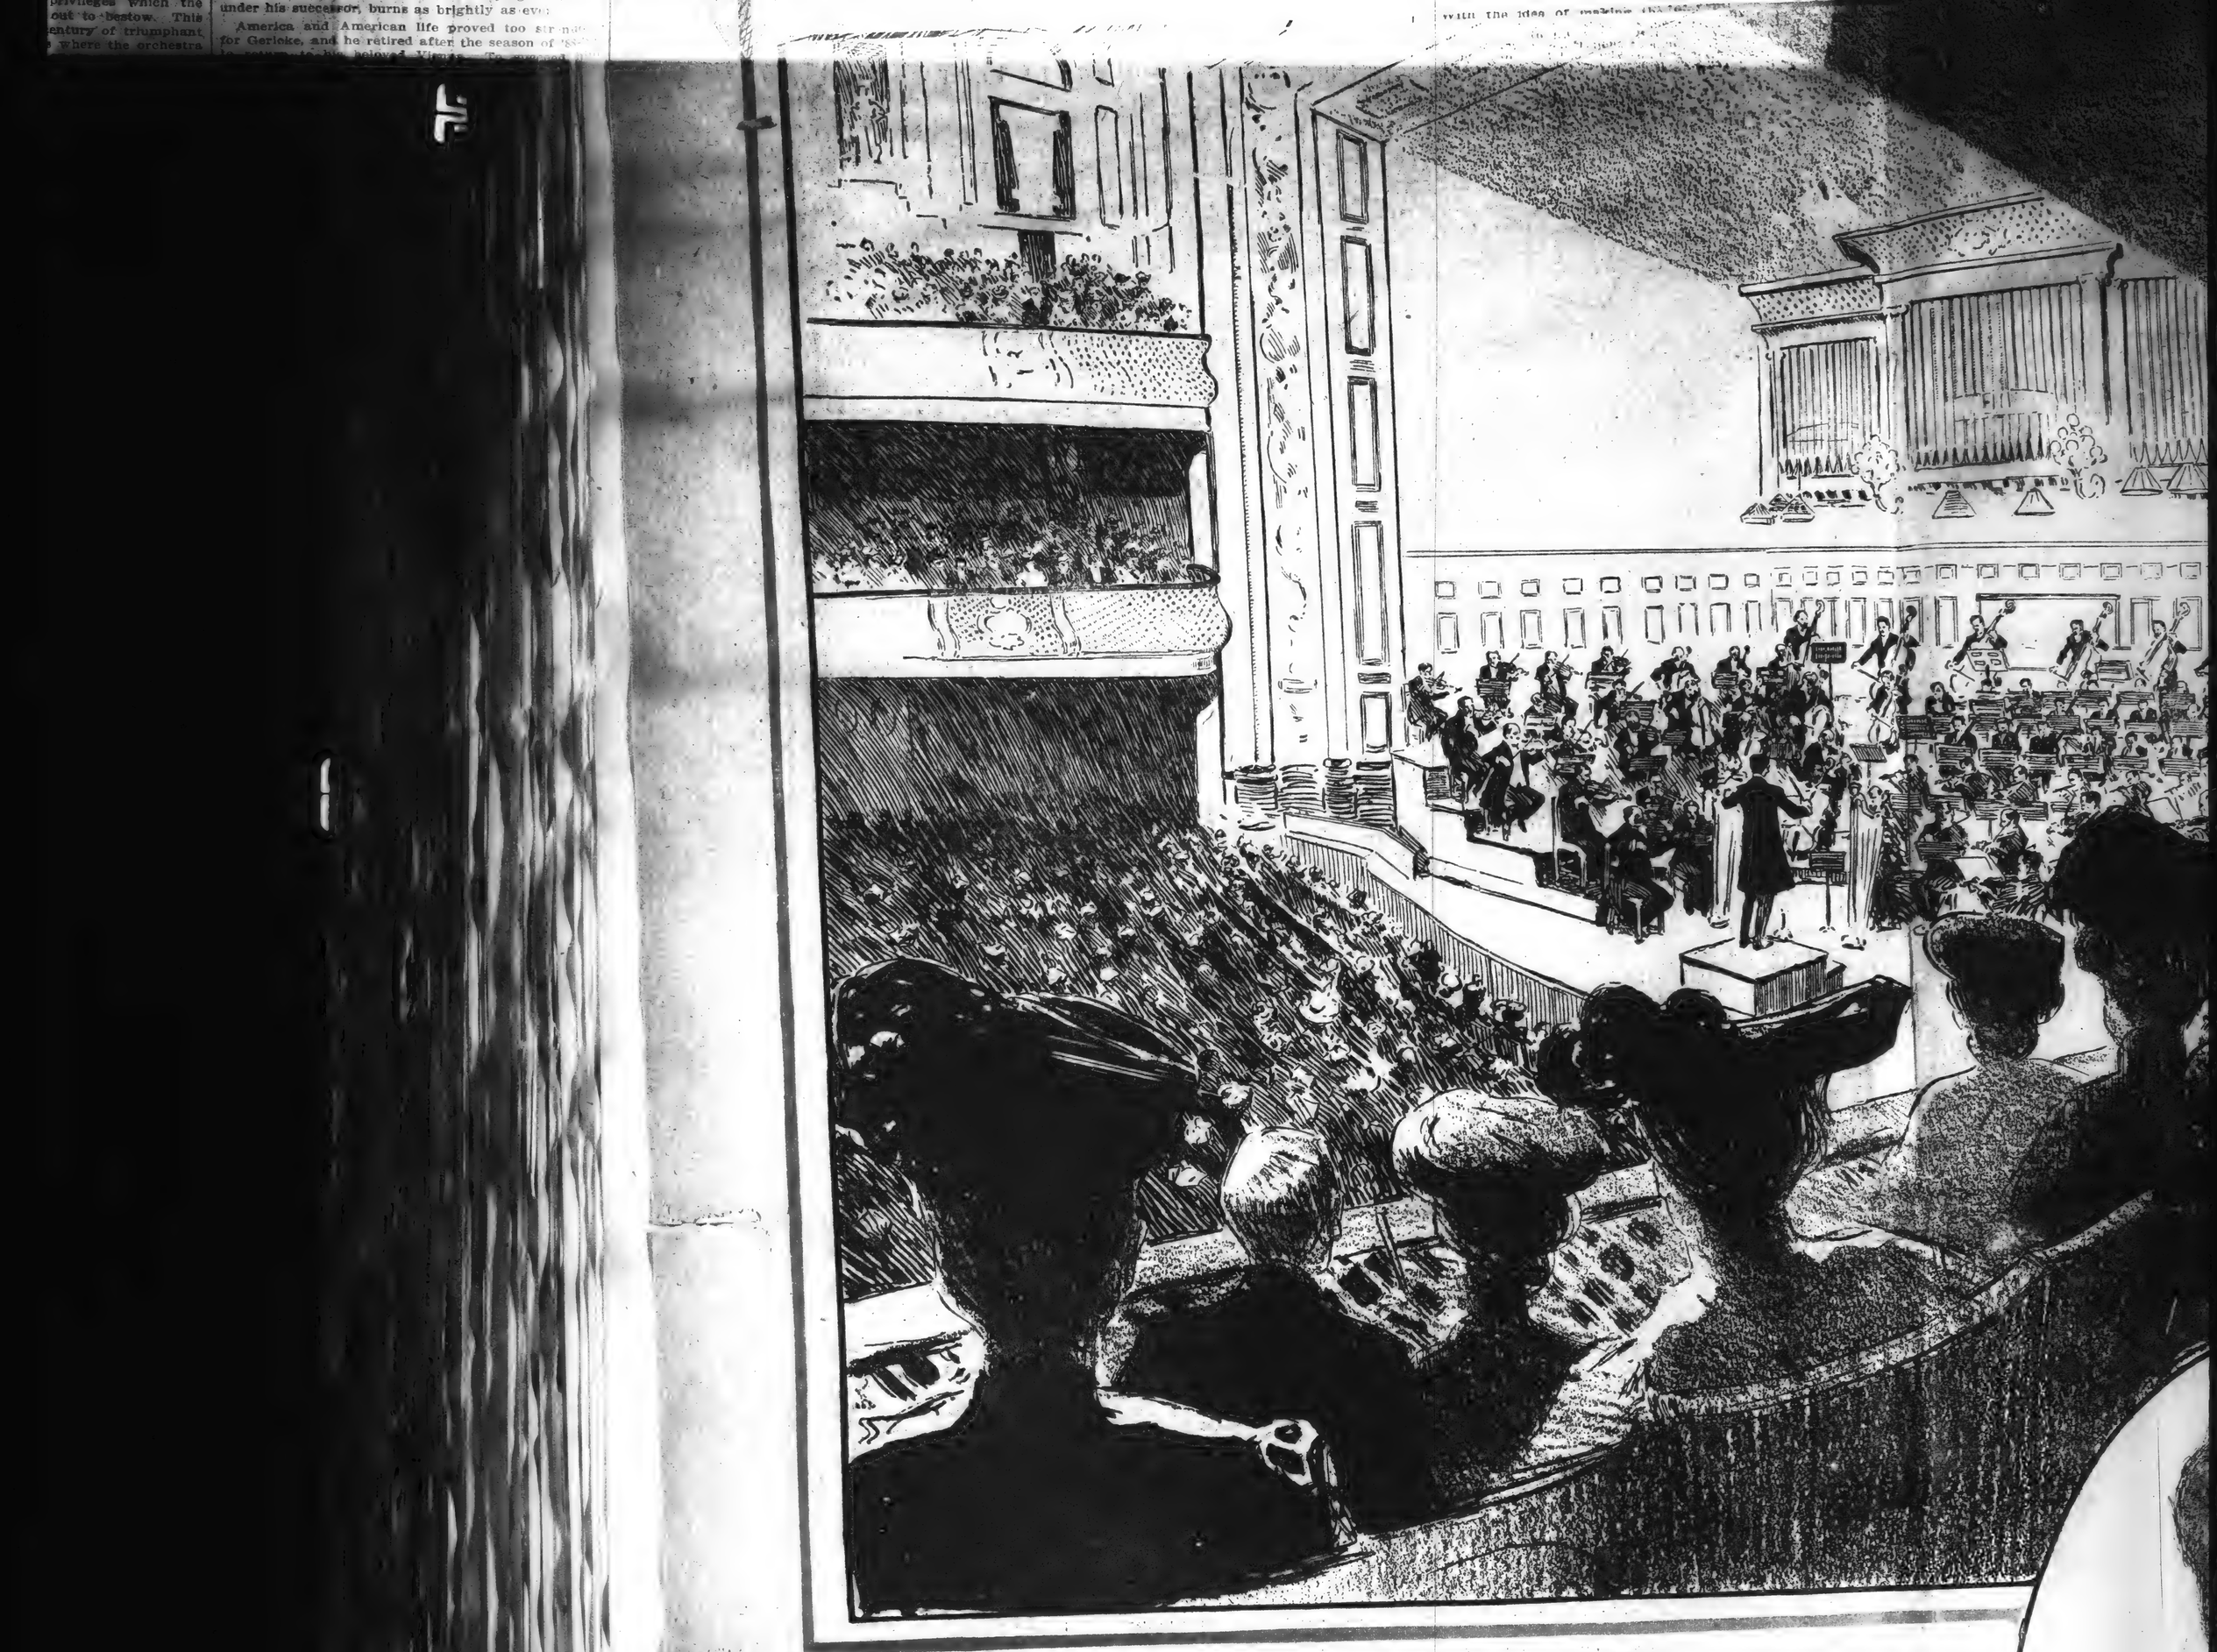
There are now, when all the players are in requisition—which, of course, they are only in the most modern compositions—about 90 men, namely, 16 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, 10 'cellos, eight double-basses, four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and one player each of the harp, tuba, timpani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle and tambour.

Of the players themselves, the rank and file, they are principally drawn from great European orchestras. They are male without exception, and female players, however talented, have never been regularly engaged for the Symphony. The players are of German, French, Austrian, Russian and Polish extraction for the most part.

The terms under which they are engaged vary greatly. Annual contracts for the season of 29 weeks, 24 of which are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to travelling, are the general arrangement, and the ordinary salary runs from $30 to $40 per week. Of course, the chief players, such as the first violin or the concert master, the first 'cellist or the first performers on the other instruments, get much more, up to $5000 a year, with

with the idea of



THE ORCHESTRA IN SYMPHONY HALL, DR. MUCK CONDUCTING.

DR. KARL MUCK is to stay for another year with the Boston Symphony orchestra, by special permission of the German Emperor.

Music lovers in Boston and throughout the United States heaved a sigh of relief when the announcement came, for much in the future of the Symphony depended upon Dr Muck's continuance in the capacity of conductor.

It was significant that Kaiser Wilhelm was persuaded to allow the imperial orchestra to go another year without its director only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony orchestra was maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture. It showed what a strong hold music has upon the German heart, and how much the head of the German Empire has its advancement in mind.

Incidentally, it was one of the most diplomatic and graceful things the Kaiser ever did. From every portion of the United States has come praise of this act of international courtesy, an act that has so important a bearing on musical culture in America.

For what would Boston, or the United States, do without the Symphony orchestra? And what would the Symphony do at the present time without Dr. Karl Muck? The Boston Symphony orchestra is a national institution now, as well as being the pride of Bostonians and New Englanders. It is a national institution, in a class by itself in America, and on a plane with the best of the old world orchestras; and at the same time it is a glorious movement to the culture and munificence of one man, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, of Boston.

Most millionaires have a hobby. With one it is horse racing, with another yachting, another may go in for art galleries, or a man may have a passion for libraries; some, it is whispered, make stock gambling their play and work and whole life. To Maj. Higginson the Boston Symphony orchestra is yacht, library, art gallery, avocation.

The Symphony had its birth at a critical time in the history of music in Boston. The death knell of the Harvard Musical Association of that day had sounded. A newly formed Philharmonic Society existed, which supported an orchestra, but, though it was maintained upon as adequate a basis as the circumstances warranted or allowed, it was leagues behind the musical organization which in his travels abroad, in Vienna and Berlin, Henry Lee Higginson had dreamed of establishing in and for Boston. When Maj. Higginson announced his intention of establishing a new orchestra in February of 1881, the Philharmonic Society was glad to retire from the field.

It was to be a new orchestra in a new way, he said. And so it proved. There was at that time in Boston a young baritone singer, Georg Henschel, clever, musical to his finger tips, versatile and a man of some executive ability. To him was confided the task of organizing the Boston Symphony orchestra, though he had had no experience worth mentioning as a conductor. Yet in this pioneer work of organizing, a work of which the difficulties can only be appreciated by those who have had experience of such things, Herschel did wonders. Aided by Maj. Higginson's advice and help, backed by his extensive financial support, he got together the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the organization then that it is today. At that time it numbered 70 performers, 12 first and 11 second violins, eight violas, nine 'cellos, nine double-basses and about the number of wood and brass-wind players which a small orchestra usually possesses. With the orchestra thus organized, the first concert of the Boston Symphony was given on Oct. 22, 1881.

To trace its history from that date would be to trace the rise of orchestral music in America from a comparatively humble plane to the pinnacle reached by the orchestra of the first cities in Europe. The intention of the founder of the Symphony was to make it minister specially to people of small means but musical tastes, and so at first the price of the best places was fixed at 50 cents, and at the rehearsals on the afternoons of the days preceding the regular concerts, seats were sold for 25 cents.

There was never a moment's doubt about the popularity of the concerts. They became not only popular, but fashionable. So great was the competition among people for the choice of places that an auction sale was held at the beginning of each season for the best seats. In spite of some adverse comment upon this step, it was necessary, and it in no way restricted the popular privileges which the founder of the Symphony set out to bestow. This has been proved in a quarter century of triumphant achievement, in which the halls where the orchestra performed have been packed to their capacity.

During this interval, love of music appears to have permeated every class of Boston's population. Not only do the regular music lovers attend every concert of the Symphony, but the audiences that fill Symphony Hall, and that too is an outcome of Maj. Higginson's support, are drawn from all strata of Greater Boston society. Under its various leaders—and there have been not a few of them—the Boston Symphony has secured a hold upon the affections of Bostonians that no other similar organization in America has attained among the people to whom it looks for support. The whole of New England takes a proprietary pride in the Symphony; New York is as jealous of its prestige before the European musical world as it could be of a pet home organization, west and south and even in Canada, the Boston Symphony occupies a unique position in the musical world.

Some orchestras have been founded to provide a famous conductor with an instrument to show his genius, and when that conductor threw up the project or passed from earth, the organization promptly disbanded. Not so the Boston Symphony. It was established on a surer basis, and always its conductors have been engaged to fill the need the orchestra created.

It has had five conductors since its inception, and one of them was at the head of the organization for two periods, separated by several years. Possibly the Boston public has the critical faculty highly developed, for these leaders have not escaped severe criticism at times, in spite of their undoubted place at the head of their profession and their great reputations abroad. But always they have been held in affectionate regard and affectionate memory by the great mass of the musical public, and each has left his imprint upon the institution he was called to conduct.

First there was Henschel, who was the pioneer in a field since grown fragrant with much culture. After him came Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson had seen in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the imperial opera, and as conductor of the famous Society of Friends of Music. To him, the strong, alert, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life. Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. By rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of tone. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the pruning process he found necessary, perhaps even because of that and the improvement in the personnel of the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps which has not only shown no indication of dying out, but, under his successor, burns as brightly as ever.

America and American life proved too strenuous for Gericke, and he retired after the season of '88-'89, to return to his beloved Vienna. To succeed him came Arthur Nikisch, conductor at the Neuse Theatre of Leipsic, a young man who at that time was just coming into the fame that later fell to him so generously. Nikisch had more originality and daring to the square inch in his makeup than any three conductors in the public eye, and he was one of the most intensely subjective of the modern school of conductors.

It was only natural that about such a personality the critical public of Boston should be split into factions. Yet in the three years during which he conducted the Symphony he continued to maintain it at the high standard of excellence to which Gericke had brought it.

In 1893, Nikisch's contract was cancelled. Immediately Maj. Higginson, through his agents, began negotiating for Dr. Hans Richter. This giant of the musical world had had troubles of his own in the intriguing court circles of the Austrian capital, and was disgusted with the way in which the Imperial Opera at Vienna was managed. He expressed willingness to come to Boston to conduct the Symphony, and actually signed a contract with Maj. Higginson. But the Austrian authorities awoke to the fact that they were about to lose him.

As a salve to his feelings, Richter got a decoration and an appointment to the post of Hofkapellmeister at the opera on the death of Hellmesberger. So did the great Richter calmly ignore his American contract and stay in Vienna. Emil Paur had followed Nikisch as conductor at the Leipsic Opera, and he now stepped to the front of the Boston Symphony.

His sway endured for five years. Rigorous, somewhat strenuous sway. In 1898 he was succeeded by Gericke, who returned to Boston to find that his hosts of admirers and friends had [illegible] a warm place in their hearts for him. He [illegible] where he is now conducting [illegible] phony. Gericke continued as [illegible] tra until 1906, and in June [illegible] Muck of Berlin was engaged.

Dr. Muck was one of the [illegible] opera at Berlin, and as such [illegible] the German Emperor, from [illegible] to obtain a leave of absence [illegible] only with great difficulty. [illegible] Richard Strauss the direction [illegible] productions of the Berlin [illegible] the Kaiser's favor. However [illegible] ton, and Boston has come [illegible] the greatest conductors [illegible] boasted. Dr. Muck has ac[illegible] in Berlin, but in St. Pet[illegible] Vienna and other capitals, [illegible] the best critics for "the [illegible] versatility of his knowle[illegible] objective artistry."

So much for the conduc[illegible] phony. A word about the [illegible] It has long been the custo[illegible] the Boston Symphony as s[illegible] what it is, in fact. Young[illegible] the Conservatory orchestra [illegible] Berlioz in Paris, to who[illegible] field for hard and energ[illegible] come to Boston to join [illegible] Gericke and his succ[illegible]

STRA IN SYMPHONY HALL, DR. MUCK CONDUCTING.

DR. KARL MUCK

extensive financial support, he got together the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the organization then that it is today. At that time it numbered 70 performers, 12 first and 11 second violins, eight violas, nine 'cellos, nine double-basses and about the number of wood and brass-wind players which a small orchestra usually possesses. With the orchestra thus organized, the first concert of the Boston Symphony was given on Oct. 22, 1881.

To trace its history from that date would be to trace the rise of orchestral music in America from a comparatively humble plane to the pinnacle reached by the orchestra of the first cities in Europe. The intention of the founder of the Symphony was to make it minister specially to people of small means but musical tastes, and so at first the price of the best places was fixed at 50 cents, and at the rehearsals on the afternoons of the days preceding the regular concerts, seats were sold for 25 cents.

There was never a moment's doubt about the popularity of the concerts. They became not only popular, but fashionable. So great was the competition among people for the choice of places that an auction sale was held at the beginning of each season for the best seats. In spite of some adverse comment upon this step, it was necessary, and it in no way restricted the popular privileges which the founder of the Symphony set out to bestow. This has been proved in a quarter century of triumphant achievement, in which the halls where the orchestra performed have been packed to their capacity.

During this interval, love of music appears to have permeated every class of Boston's population. Not only do the regular music lovers attend every concert of the Symphony, but the audiences that fill Symphony Hall, and that too is an outcome of Maj. Higginson's support, are drawn from all strata of Greater Boston society. Under its various leaders—and there have been not a few of them—the Boston Symphony has secured a hold upon the affections of Bostonians that no other similar organization in America has attained among the people to whom it looks for support. The whole of New England takes a proprietary pride in the Symphony; New York is as jealous of its prestige before the European musical world as it could be of a pet home organization, west and south and even in Canada, the Boston Symphony occupies a unique position in the musical world.

Some orchestras have been founded to provide a famous conductor with an instrument to show his genius, and when that conductor threw up the project or passed from earth, the organization promptly disbanded. Not so the Boston Symphony. It was established on a surer basis, and always its conductors have been engaged to fill the need the orchestra created.

It has had five conductors since its inception, and one of them was at the head of the organization for two periods, separated by several years. Possibly the Boston public has the critical faculty highly developed, for these leaders have not escaped severe criticism at times, in spite of their undoubted place at the head of their profession and their great reputations abroad. But always they have been held in affectionate regard and affectionate memory by the great mass of the musical public, and each has left his imprint upon the institution he was called to conduct.

First there was Henschel, who was the pioneer in a field since grown fragrant with much culture. After him came Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson had seen in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the imperial opera, and as conductor of the famous Society of Friends of Music. To him, the strong, alert, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life. Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. By rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of tone. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the pruning process he found necessary, perhaps even because of that and the improvement in the personnel of the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps which has not only shown no indication of dying out, but, under his successor, burns as brightly as ever.

America and American life proved too strenuous for Gericke, and he retired after the season of '88-'89, to return to his beloved Vienna. To succeed him came Arthur Nikisch, conductor at the Neuse Theatre of Leipsic, a young man who at that time was just coming into the fame that later fell to him so generously. Nikisch had more originality and daring to the square inch in his makeup than any three conductors in the public eye, and he was one of the most intensely subjective of the modern school of conductors.

It was only natural that about such a personality the critical public of Boston should be split into factions. Yet in the three years during which he conducted the Symphony he continued to maintain it at the high standard of excellence to which Gericke had brought it.

In 1893, Nikisch's contract was cancelled. Immediately Maj. Higginson, through his agents, began negotiating for Dr. Hans Richter. This giant of the musical world had had troubles of his own in the intriguing court circles of the Austrian capital, and was disgusted with the way in which the Imperial Opera at Vienna was managed. He expressed willingness to come to Boston to conduct the Symphony, and actually signed a contract with Maj. Higginson. But the Austrian authorities awoke to the fact that they were about to lose him.

As a salve to his feelings, Richter got a decoration and an appointment to the post of Hofkapellmeister at the opera on the death of Hellmesberger. So did the great Richter calmly ignore his American contract and stay in Vienna. Emil Paur had followed Nikisch as conductor at the Leipsic Opera, and he now stepped to the front of the Boston Symphony.

His sway endured for five years, vigorous, somewhat strenuous sway. In 1898 he was succeeded by Gericke, who returned to Boston to find that his hosts of admirers and friends had a warm place in their hearts for him. Paur went to Pittsburg, where he is now conducting the Pittsbury Symphony. Gericke continued as conductor of the orchestra until 1906, and in June of that year Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin was engaged as conductor.

Dr. Muck was one of the conductors of the royal opera at Berlin, and as such was in the service of the German Emperor, from whom it was necessary to obtain a leave of absence. This was accomplished only with great difficulty, for Dr. Muck shared with Richard Strauss the direction of all the important productions of the Berlin opera and stands high in the Kaiser's favor. However, he finally reached Boston, and Boston has come to regard him as one of the greatest conductors the Symphony has ever boasted. Dr. Muck has achieved triumphs not only in Berlin, but in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other capitals, and has been praised by the best critics for "the phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

So much for the conductors of the Boston Symphony. A word about the personnel of the orchestra. It has long been the custom of Americans to refer to the Boston Symphony as a band of virtuosi. That is what it is, in fact. Young and ambitious "lions" of the Conservatory orchestra, that were the delight of Berlioz in Paris, to whom the orchestra meant a field for hard and energetic labor, were proud to come to Boston to join this organization under Gericke and his successors. Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski, Roth, Giese, the Adamowskis, Schuecker, Fourtau, Longy—those were names to conjure with in the musical world, and they were the names of players in the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Next to the conductor himself, the man who has most to do with the efficiency of an orchestra is the concert master. The French call him the chef d'attaque. He may be described as the go-between for orchestra and conductor, the prime minister of the autocratic head of the organization. Often his duties are of the most onerous and responsible description.

When anything goes wrong, it is the concert master who gets the blame; when things go with smooth success, it is the conductor upon whose head the laurel wreaths are placed. He carries out in the practical workings the directions of the conductor. If the conductor wants certain changes in the phrasing or accentuation, it falls to the concert master to arrange the changes. He must see to all the instruments and have a care that they are in tune with one another before rehearsals and concerts; he acts as mediator and pacificator when a misunderstanding arises between conductor and members of the orchestra; he is, in fact, the helmsman acting under the captain's orders and the first mate and the chief engineer combined.

Fortunate has it been for the Boston Symphony that for this important post it has had two such men as Franz Kneisel and Prof. Willy Hess. The latter is the present concert master, and his vigorous personality, his talents as a musician and his technical accomplishment have enabled him to carry out the best traditions of his office in the economy of the Symphony.

There are now, when all the players are in requisition—which, of course, they are only in the most modern compositions—about 90 men, namely, 16 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, 10 'cellos, eight double-basses, four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and one player each of the harp, tuba, timpani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle and tambour.

Of the players themselves, the rank and file, they are principally drawn from great European orchestras. They are male without exception, and female players, however talented, have never been regularly engaged for the Symphony. The players are of German, French, Austrian, Russian and Polish extraction for the most part.

The terms under which they are engaged vary greatly. Annual contracts for the season of 29 weeks, 24 of which are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to travelling, are the general arrangement, and the ordinary salary runs from $30 to $40 per week. Of course, the chief players, such as the first violin or the concert master, the first 'cellist or the first performers on the other instruments, get much more, up to $5000 a year, with engagements of several years. Not a few receive weekly salaries of various amounts for periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes for practically the whole year. The conductors themselves are said to have received salaries running from $8000 to $10,000 per year.

With the idea of making the Symphony a perfectly organized orchestra, the members devote their whole energy to its work. But as a season of 29 weeks' salary is insufficient to support the rank and file, the "Pops" of the early summer were instituted, for its founder has always aimed at making it possible for the players to devote all their time and talents to the Symphony. The "Pops" last for eight weeks after the close of the winter season and are one of the greatest musical attractions Boston possesses.

To eke out the remaining period of enforced idleness, some of the members of the Symphony teach and some join other orchestras for brief intervals. But first, last and all the time, it is the Boston Symphony in which their whole hearts are centred and toward the efficiency of which they bend all their talents and energies.

The Musical Union was a spectre at one time that threatened to create havoc with the Symphony. Maj. Higginson himself took a broad view of the problem. He did not forbid the members of the Symphony from belonging to a union, but he absolutely prohibited the idea that any union could make a "closed shop" of the orchestra. While he believes in unions, he stated plainly that, should the union attempt to dictate to the Boston Symphony orchestra or to interfere in any way with its management or the freedom of its members, he would immediately pay off all hands and disband the organization on the spot. This attitude was prolific of excellent results. All the members of the Symphony who belonged to the union resigned from it, and the situation was relieved of the threatened embarrassment.

It is ruled on the same lines of discipline that any modern orchestra or opera company is guided by—fines for being late at rehearsals, heavier fines for lateness at concerts, and for non-attendance heavier punishment still. These penalties, being, however, solely for the purpose of discipline, are very seldom exacted, and, as has been said by one member, "the contract is much more severe than Mr. Higginson is."

And of the generous founder of the Boston Symphony, what can be said to adequately express what he has done for the advancement of music in America? Soldier—he bears the scar of a sabre wound received in the civil war to this day—patriot, financier and backer of many gigantic industrial enterprises, man of letters, a musician and an unostentatious philanthropist. The gods were kind to Henry Higginson, and he made noble use of the advantages of birth, talent, wealth and position that were given him.

A DAY OF MUSIC

MAUD POWELL AND SIBELIUS'S NEW CONCERTO

The Violinist Reappears at the Symphony Concerts After Six Years and Gives a Notable Performance of a Notable Piece—The Music-Drama That Sibelius Has Put Into a Concerto—A Forgotten Overture by Grieg—Early Brahms at Miss von Radecki's Chamber Concert — Wilhelm Heinrich's Song Recital

For the first time in six years, Maud Powell, the violinist, reappeared in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and it was good to hear her warmly welcomed before she began Sibelius's concerto and heartily applauded after she had finished it. Mme. Powell is now and justly the most distinguished American violinist, and her distinction is international as well. Of late years, indeed, the musical capitals of Europe have known her oftener and more intimately than have our own cities, but there and here she has gained and held her position by sheer artistic probity. She has not asked us at home to hear and admire her because an accident of birth happened to make her American. She has not bidden her European audiences listen as to some wonder of the West. She has come to both as a violinist and as nothing else, and she has hidden her personality in her artistry. She has quietly waived aside the indulgences that rise almost spontaneously to meet her sex in every executive act except that of acting; yet she has not gone to the other extreme of a laborious and transparent assumption of masculinity. The listener hears her without thought of sex. She has been Maud Powell, the violinist, and a violinist who has sought not to glorify herself, but to unfold as clearly and to express as fully as lay within her powers the music that she was playing. She has never cultivated amplitude, elasticity and fineness of technique for their own sake, though she has long since attained them. Steadily they have been to her first the foundation, and then the medium, of expression. She has emphasized neither a dazzling brilliance nor a large sonority of tone, though both are now within her powers. She has chosen rather to make her tone the characteristic and the eloquent voice of her music. Behind her playing lie the faculties of intellect that grasp the form and the substance of music and search and adjust its design and proportions. Side by side with them stand the faculties of imagination that discover and feel its moods, emotions and individual accent; while of both intellect and imagination are the fusing and communicating faculties that weld together all these things and impart them to her hearers. She does more: she brings them to life; for the distinctive trait of Mme. Powell's mind, fancy, and artistry is their nervous vitality. It is that at bottom which has set her so often to the discovery and the trial of new concertos and smaller pieces; which has spurred her, as in this very concerto by Sibelius that she played yesterday, to the conquering of strange technical difficulties and intricacies and to the winning of obscure and evasive imaginings; and which in all things has kept her alert, eager, unsatisfied. The crowning touch of genius has not been hers. That, indeed, may fall only from the lap of Fate. But much else that only a full and fine artistry of intellect, imagination and execution and an underlying probity of artistic spirit may achieve, are hers deservedly. Mme. Powell's career has been quiet as the careers of virtuosi go, but its rewards have not been the less stimulating.

Naturally—one almost writes—it was a new concerto that Mme. Powell played, and that here in America she has made her own. Sibelius, the Finnish composer, whose dark, brusque, passionate symphony Dr. Muck made so impressive last winter, wrote it originally some years ago; then revised it until in many respects it was another composition, and gave it to Halir, the German, for performance in the autumn of 1905. Quickly Mme. Powell discovered it, felt its fascinations, subdued its difficulties, and since last December has played it with one or another American orchestra. By the agreeing testimony of violinists Sibelius's music raises new and strange difficulties and asks new and strange feats. He has actually and surprisingly enlarged the technical possibilities of the violin, or as some choose to put it, complicated and distorted them. Yet as the comparatively inexpert listener, as he heard the music yesterday, took little heed of these prodigies of technique. They seemed only the means to eloquent and imaginative, large or adroit, expression. Therein truly was the surprise and the delight of the piece. The fate of the concerto as an enduring musical form—and especially the fate of the concerto for stringed instruments—is hanging in the balance. It can still be written as a serviceable and agreeable vehicle for the display of varying degrees of virtuosity. It still is written as a part of the whole duty of a composer or as the filling, with what invention and dexterity the writer may summon, of an orthodox musical form. But if the concerto for violin is to keep its place in modern music, it must be made expressive in the modern sense. It must contain the poetry as well as the mathematics of tones. It must yield itself within its established outlines to the modern freedom of imagination and treatment. A year ago Mr. Marteau played Jaques-Dalcroze's concerto for violin here, and it seemed an effort to gain some of these ends by the richness, variety and suggestion of instrumental coloring, contrasts and combinations. Our own Mr. Strube in his concerto that Mr. Adamowski played this season has sought one face of the same goal by lightness of fancy and handling. Dalcroze's concerto had more cunning contrivance than significance of idea, poetry of mood, or tensity of feeling. Mr. Strube's wanted seriousness. Sibelius's concerto, on the other hand, is almost [illegible] of grave eloquence. It is charged with emotion that is potent and communicative in all the means—instrumental, melodic, structural or technical—by which it comes to expression. It has individuality and it has poetry. It quickens the mind and it stirs the imagination. It puts the performing violinist to every sort of mettle and bountifully rewards him. From first to last the solo instrument dominates. Yet with all these qualities, and in spite of occasional suggestions of rhapsody or fantasia, the concerto is still a concerto in the established formal sense. Distinctly Sibelius's solution of the problem of the modernized concerto persuades.

Like the symphony of last January, the concerto is abrupt, concise, stern and passionate. Melody it has, and melody that, when the composer wills, can rise in long and poignant curves. But oftener it is like light dimly struggling out of mysterious shadows (as at the very beginning), slowly gaining intensity and flow, laboring into life as it were, and then breaking convulsively as though darkness were again choking it. Time and again, in the first two movements of the concerto, it gleams in the solo instrument against a sombre tonal background like a rift in the clouds in a cold autumn sunset. The rift broadens, brightens and then the clouds shut again. It is a precarious melody that falters even when it sets itself resolutely as it seems in the third movement, only to yield finally, abruptly—to go out in the surrounding darkness. Such melody, gleaming as it does through the whole concerto, touches the imagination with its profound melancholy. It is not the intimate, pensive, wistful melancholy of the newer French composers that is born of fine self-communing, and of a sense of the vanities of passing mortal things. Sibelius's is a sterner, larger, less introspective melancholy—the melancholy of a great and monotonous darkness, of grim waste places, of weather-worn rocks and a northern sea heaving blackly and blindly against them, of bare sweeps of plain under black sweeps of cloud. A melancholy of a wintry Finland that has entered and filled the composer's soul and forced itself to expression. It would be despair were he not of a primal strength of spirit that it cannot stifle. He would escape and the music labors; he struggles, and it turns convulsive; he sets all his forces, as one who goes to battle; he conquers and there is a flash almost of joy. Concerto though Sibelius has written, there is an action in it and a dramatic action as truly as Mr. d'Indy would have us find one in his symphony. The harmonic and the instrumental backgrounds are as the field of combat. There may the listener find a pervading darkness, grimness, even monotony. Across it, oftenest doing battle, go Sibelius's melodic ideas and his development of them, fighting their way toilsomely, even convulsively, beaten down, yet rising again, sustained by a primal vitality, winning moments of triumph that are deep in their joy, though the end be defeat. The concerto may be music of a north bound in rock, and sea, and darkness, and cold. It seems also music of passionate struggle through the sternness and the grimness of life for the brief joy of it. And surely it is music that has made a concerto eloquent with emotions and poignant of mood as are few concertos, old or new. Mme. Powell played it as thought she were its voice.

One other new composition stood upon the programme, and it, too, was of the north, but the little and impulsive Grieg is not the big and resolute Sibelius, and their norths are as far apart as their temperaments. In his early days Grieg wrote a song, "Autumn Storm." In the sixties he based an overture, "In Autumn," upon it, his first music for orchestra. Later, when his command of instrumental resources was ampler, he rescored it. Grieg's orchestral music is scanty, and somehow this particular overture has been overlooked in all the two thousand and odd Symphony concerts. It remained for Dr. Muck to rediscover it and to play it, but it ought not to have been played side by side with Sibelius's concerto. For Grieg would tinge his music in its turn with an insistent melancholy, and would give its voice an insistent wildness. But his melancholy is only a pensive autumnal mood, of the bare woods on a gray day, beside the deep and seated blackness of Sibelius's and the wildness of his melody is thin beside the Finn's passionately battling song. Grieg has wrought skilfully no more than an imaginative little overture of the moods and atmosphere of a Northern autumn. Sibelius has almost turned a concerto into a music-drama of northern passion. And then Professor Paine's prelude to Sophocles's "Œdipus the King," for honor to the composer's memory, at the anniversary of his death; and for the sheerest contrast to all that had gone before Debussy's orchestral sketches of "The Sea." They, however, shall make matter for Monday.

H. T.

/ / + / /

COMING CONCERTS

A Busy Ending for [illegible]—A New Symphony Next Week—[illegible] Recital and Mr. Schroeder's Fare Concert—The Symphony Quartet and Mr. Fox Finish Their Season—Wagner for the Pension Fund

Again Dr. Muck is putting a new northern symphony on his programmes and this time by a little known composer. Next Friday and Saturday, for the twenty-third pair of Symphony concerts, he and the orchestra are to play a symphony in D minor by Victor Bendix, a Danish composer, born fifty-odd years ago and now living at Copenhagen. Gade, the writer of many familiar cantatas, fostered his talents. He has been a concert pianist and a concert violinist, and now at Copenhagen he is a conductor and a teacher. He has written much for the piano and for orchestra, and the symphony to be played next week is his fourth. Never before have the northern composers—Sinding, Sibelius and now Bendix—had such an inning here as they have had at the Symphony concerts this year. Clearly Dr. Muck admires their music, and so far it has justified his admiration. With the new symphony goes Smetana's gay overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," and Chabrier's rhapsody, snapping or languorous in rhythm and gorgeous in instrumental coloring, "España."

The Symphony Quartet—Messrs, Hess, Roth, Férir and Warnke of the band—give the last of their chamber concerts for the current season on Monday evening at eight in Chickering Hall. Their programme comprises Tschaikovski's quartet in D major (Opus 11, No. 1), for two violins, viola and 'cello; three movements of a serenade by the Swiss composer, Jaques-Dalcroze, for the same instruments, and Beethoven's septet in E flat for violin, viola, 'cello, double bass, clarinet, horn and bassoon with Messrs. Keller, Grisez, Sadoni and Max Hess of the orchestra for the additional instruments. The quartet played Jaques-Dalcroze's music at one of the Sunday Chamber Concerts last winter, and it was interesting and individual to hear, allying modern freedom of modulations with an older simplicity of mood.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, APRIL 21, 1907.

MAUD POWELL AT SYMPHONY WINS

Noted Woman Violinist Plays Sibelius Concerto and Is Many Times Recalled.

GRIEG OVERTURE HEARD

By Kent Perkins.

The far northland—Norway and Finland—furnished two novelties for the twenty-second Symphony concert of the season last night. From the land of the midnight sun came Grieg's overture, "In Autumn," op. 11, and from the little country of fens and forests, that has given trouble to many Russian Czars, there was Sibelius's violin concerto in D minor, op. 47, interpreted by Maud Powell.

These two compositions had their first Boston hearing at this week's performances of the orchestra, and, as Mme. Powell had not played here for several years, her presence intensified the note of novelty in the programme.

The "Autumn" overture is strongly characteristic of Norway. It is an interesting and powerful conglomerate of sombre and gay beauties of melody and harmony.

The Sibelius concerto, too, smacks of its native soil. In its first and third movements it is so true to nature that at times it is grotesque, but the impassioned adagio, the second movement, is sufficiently idealized to be universal in its intense emotional appeal.

Mme. Powell exhibited her rare technical skill throughout the concerto, but was at her best in the tender passages of the adagio where the clear beauty of her tone was most marked. She was enthusiastically acclaimed at the close of her performance and was recalled many times.

The remainder of the programme consisted of J. K. Paine's prelude to the "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, whose noble harmonies were gratefully received, and Debussy's three orchestral sktches, "The Sea," which were repeated by request.

BOSTON JOURNAL APRIL 22, 1907.

SOMBER PROGRAM AT THE 22D SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spite of its two novelties and its repetition of a third, the twenty-second Symphony concert was not highly inspiriting. There was an overplus of gloom, of the darkness of autumnal tones and the somber color of tragedy, both of nature and of man. It was not a long step from the gray of Grieg to the almost blackness of Sibelius, nor so very long a journey from that to the more genteel monotone of Paine. Debussy, to be sure, brought a different method, yet even he has little of absolute cheriness. The evening lacked beauty of melody and simplicity of style to give variety. Even a bit of Haydn would have made for a greater sum total of enjoyment.

Grieg's "Autumn" overture had not been played here before, and those who had failed to produce it had good reason. It is a poor and slight thing, showing too plainly its expansion from a song and lacking most of the qualities that often make Grieg's music fascinating.

In selecting Sibelius' violin concerto Miss Maud Powell threw herself boldly into a battle with tremendous techical difficulties, as well as handicapped herself with something that could not possibly make any strong popular appeal. Against the first her virtuosity conquered mightily, and as to the latter her warm and emotional style brought the somber thing home to the hearts of many with great force. The concerto needs several hearings for a full appreciation of its greatness—for great it undoubtedly is, with individuality, deep sentiment and real spontaneity. The strange, solemn beauty of its second movement and the rough celerity of its finale make it well worth while and lift it high above the level of machine-made music. Not only was Miss Powell's playing of it notable, but the performance of the accompanying orchestra was wonderfully accurate and sympathetic.

SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 21, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Last but Two of the Symphony Concerts.

Choral Union Concert Tonight ---Maud Powell's Recital.

Symphony Pension Fund--- Other Announcements.

The 22d Symphony program contained two novelties, Grieg's overture, "In Autumn" and the D minor violin concerto by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. Prof. J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus" and Debussy's three sketches, "The Sea," completed this list. Mme. Maud Powell was the violin soloist. Grieg's work is a pleasing instrumental picture of the vagaries of autumn, the robust nature of this season of the year being skilfully suggested by the preponderance in the score of the music for wood-winds, helped out frequently by the heavier strings and brass contingent. The harvest song which serves as a finale has a peculiar bass accompaniment, monotonous and dronelike, but typical of a certain type of Norwegian music.

Grieg's ability in orchestration is shown by the somewhat unusual effects he obtains in his phrasing, the instruments utilizing his thematic materials in unexpected ways yet carrying and developing the melody without suggesting the harshness so often found in Russian compositions. Contrasts abound, there are zephyrs and gales and through the whole work the autumnal idea is admirably maintained. The orchestra did full justice to the overture, which was played here for the first time.

The American violinist, Maud Powell, was a welcome soloist, for the artist's fame is world-wide, and as she has not appeared at a symphony concert for about six years, there was great interest shown in her return to Boston. Mme Powell played the Sibelius concerto in D minor, the first performance in this city, and gave a wonderful display of artistry that seemed to set at defiance all the intricacies of the complicated work. The composer is a famous violinist, and that he knows the "ins and outs" of the instrument is very obvious, for he has succeeded in scoring a work of tremendous difficulty. Sibelius evidently was striving for new effects, not only for the solo instrument, but in the orchestra, and in so doing he has sacrificed consistency in the cause of wished-for originality. The soloist has but few opportunities to show the finer, delicate qualities of the violin, but the technical problems and somber, uninteresting guttural moments are there a-plenty.

Mme Powell's performance was remarkable and so far as brilliancy, facile technique and enthusiasm is considered her work is entitled to high commendation. But it did not appear, from a single hearing, that the concerto was worth the time and labor devoted to its exploitation. The execution by Mme Powell was as virile and fluent as one could wish to hear, but the subject was hardly worth the trouble taken by her. The artist was showered with plaudits at the close of her work. The orchestral association was generally smooth, though there were some rough spots. Possibly the author and not the players was responsible, for there are many strange bits in the score.

The pomp and grandeur of the "Edipus Tyrannus" prelude were splendidly set forth in the performance of Prof Paine's noble work and the "repeated by request" sketch by Debussy was interpreted with commendable results, the puzzling orchestral combinations sounding, perhaps, a trifle saner than at the former concert.

This week's program will have a novelty that possesses some local interest; the fourth symphony by Victor Bendix, whose brother, the late Otto Bendix, was a well-known musician here some years ago. The other works will be Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered [illegible]." The symphony season will close [illegible].

Pension Fund Concert.

The second concert of the year under the auspices of the Boston symphony orchestra pension institution will be given next Sunday evening, in Symphony hall. Dr Muck will repeat the program which was played at the pension fund concert Dec 30. This was devoted entirely to excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The program will comprise seven preludes and overtures, those to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and "Parsifal" and the funeral march from the "Dusk of the Gods."

As is generally known, Chickering & Sons made a generous donation to the pension fund of the orchestra by giving to it the receipts from the series of Sunday afternoon concerts which that firm gave in Chickering hall during the past winter, under the direction of H. G. Tucker. The sum paid to the pension fund, being 75 percent of the gross receipts from the concerts, was $704.17.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given tomorrow evening in Chickering hall. Prof Hess has put on his program a novelty by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, who will be remembered as the composer of the concerto for violin which Henri Marteau played here last year. This is a serenade for string quartet, and three movements of it will be played. The first number on the program will be Tschaikowsky's quartet in D major, op 11, No. 1. The final number will be Beethoven's septet for strings and wind instruments in E flat, op 20. In this the assisting artists will be Mr Grisez clarinet, Mr Sadoni bassoon, Mr Max Hess [illegible]

[180]

Boston Tra...
124 WASHINGTON STREET, Bos...
(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)
MONDAY, APRIL 22, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DEBUSSY'S SEA SKETCHES AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Magic of the Music—Haendel's "Samson" as the People's Choral Union Revived It—An Oratorio That Keeps Tragic Vitality—Mr. Paur as a Conductor Turned Pianist—Hammerstein's Opera Ends Its Season—"The Three of Us" to Be Acted Here Next Month—Sothern and Marlowe in London—Other News of the Day

Lie upon a warm rock by the sea on a summer day of passing cloud, glowing sunshine and fitful winds. Lie in solitude and stillness with half-closed eyes and half-shut ears, with dreaming fancy taking what swift path or slow meandering it will. Watch and listen and dream, and the outspread waters, as the sun glints them, as the clouds touch them with their shadows, as the wind stirs or seems to still them, as the waves play with each other, will take fantastic and changeful shape and color, and the sea become as a sea of iridescent or of darkling vision. And from it rise as fantastic and changeful voices, of ripple prattling to ripple, or wave calling to wave, of wind speaking to itself and to the waters, of voices that come and go and swell and still. Do these things, and if there is ever so little imagination and poetry watching and listening, the sea, the sky, the air, the light will seem now and again to curve and rise in some great unison and then to fall away in threads of sunshine and shadow, wave and wind. And the voices will be as some mounting chorus or as some phantoms of sound. Happen also to be a composer with such susceptibility to poetic impressions, such capacity of poetic expression and such ability to bend musical structure and orchestral resource to the very lines and colors of these visions and to the very sound of these voices as are in Debussy; will to fashion them into tones with endless patience and fineness; then give them to an orchestra of such understandingly and sympathetically tempered spirit as was ours on Saturday; and the resulting pleasure for them that hear will be as rare and keen, of poetry and music both, as transporting in its beauty, as enthralling in its fine power, as was that of "The Sea" in its repetition at the Symphony concert.

One thing more—dismiss all notions of the way in which music has been written, and of the way, consequently, in which fond pedagogues imagine that it should be written. Rejoice, rather, that a composer has come who can make it more graphic of dreams and visions and of the sights that the eye sees and of the voices that the ear hears in them than it has ever been before. Care not so much as the smallest æsthetic penny that someone has called this music "tonal dust" so long as the dust is iridescent with the beauty of those visions. Care as little whether the voices are strange sounds, for sooner or later—and perhaps that is the reason of Dr. Muck's repetitions and pursuit of passionate perfection of performance with "The Sea"—those sounds suddenly become as the voices heard in that nowhere of fantasy. Let us say in cold fact that these three orchestral sketches have more form and body, as the orthodox notion of such things goes, than have Debussy's "Nocturnes" or his "Afternoon of a Faun." The diligent, if they will, may trace in the music thematic "workings-out," ordered climax and all the rest that delight their dry minds and hearts. They may study at their leisure minute details of harmonic or instrumental texture. The incorrigibly robust may find pleasure if they will in passages of more vigorous and palpable music than Debussy has written hitherto for orchestra. Yet these are the external, the obvious things of "The Sea," and Debussy, it is easy to suspect, has achieved them only because they happened to suit his free purpose.

Not in them dwells the magic of the music. They are merely the means to it like the mirrors or the caldrons of the mediæval sorcerers. The magic of the music is the magic of tones that visualize to the fancy such a dream of the sea as may befall a happy few when they watch and listen and muse and stir until their hearts are full of the fancies that the vision has bred, and they look into them and write for us of narrower sight and fainter ear. The magic of the sea as light plays upon it, as clouds traverse it, as it sports with itself, as voices call from it and call to it, as it dwells with its brother, the wind, are in the music. It is music that at moments almost chokes with the suffusion of its many colored beauty and that at others almost pierces with the fineness of its call, music that winds and spreads in arabesques that are as filaments, bright or gray, of light, air and water, and that gives them as by enchantment faint, far, lonely voices; music that blends and fuses all these sights and sounds into a swelling unison that drops into the stillness of an awakened dream. Who but Debussy has wrought these things of the sea? Who but him even in our rich world of music, can?

H. T. P.

...TON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 22, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Grieg. "Autumn," Overture.
Sibelius. Violin Concerto. D minor, Op. 47.
Soloist, Mme. Maud Powell.
J. K. Paine. Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannuss."
Debussy. "La Mer." Symphonic Sketches.

It was a sombre and sometimes baleful programme, that of last Saturday, with groans of wood-wind, growls of brasses, wails of muted horns, and every other evidence of musical sorrow or agony. Yet Grieg's overture had its moments of brightness, for it presented some touches of the brusquerie of Norwegian music, occasional glimpses of the beautiful folk-music—the "Norske Folkvisor." This "Autumn," however had as many changes as a New England spring. It was an interesting work, but it was not as symmetrical or as clearly developed as many other of Grieg's compositions are. Nevertheless we were thankful that it was melodic and did not disdain to be intelligible. Dr. Muck brought out every point with excellent effect and the overture made a successful debut.

Now followed Sibelius's new concerto with Mme. Maud Powell as the soloist. Dr. Muck is educating us to get along without soloists at these concerts, and the orchestra is certainly able to give its concerts unaided by sporadic songs or piano pyrotechnics. But when such an artist as Mme. Powell appears, and presents a new and important concerted work, the proceeding is quite in line with the best traditions of our symphony concerts.

Yet we may amend part of this statement; we are not quite sure that the Sibelius Concerto is really a concerted work in the classical sense. Beethoven's great Concerto is a symphony with a thread of solo interwoven; Brahms' Concerto for violin, although not one of his most inspired compositions, carries out the same plan. But this work by Sibelius is one long solo for violin with orchestral accompaniment. At times, however, it is a dialogue between the violin and the orchestra. The latter idea, striking enough in its novel treatment, is presented in the very first measures of the work, which are for violin solo, practically unsupported. We do not find the improvisational character of this as strong as the Ossianic style of rhapsody which Bruch employs in the first movement of his G minor Concerto.

Such a work is a crucial test of the solo artist, and Mme. Maud Powell bore this test magnificently. In harmonic passages, in breadth of bowing, in intonation, in sympathetic quality of tone, in clearness of double-stopping, the finished artist was constantly revealed. And there was something more than this, there was a complete assimilation of the spirit of the work, most difficult to acquire in so rhapsodical, improvisational and unconventional a composition. The first movement, which was very long, seemed at times almost a succession of cadenzas. Once in a while, but rarely, there would be a touch of folk-song melody ("tutti) yet, in spite of the constant prominence of the soloist, the concerto is not of "popular" character. Its freedom of thought is too untrammelled.

The adagio does not attain the power of either Grieg or Sinding in similar movements. The orchestra here was almost always of neutral tint or of sombre color. The great beauty of Mme. Powell's work on the G string was the chief effect of this movement.

The Finale still kept the violin to the front, this time supported with a "ground-bass." Here at last a theme, the subordinate subject is wholly given to the orchestra. Mme. Powell had some telling passages in harmonics in this movement, which she gave with noble effect.

Altogether we find this concerto a new departure in its form, one that will appeal to the violinist, since it keeps him constantly in the lime-light. But in its contents it is not so majestic or lofty as the concerto by Sinding, and the constantly rhapsodical character of the solo violin passages begins to pall before the end is reached. Mme. Powell was recalled three times at the close, and her remarkable surety and poetry in a most trying part certainly deserved such a tribute.

We were glad it was decided to put Paine's "Oedipus" prelude on the programme, instead of "The Birds," which was first chosen. This "Oedipus" number is much the finer of the two. In fact, "Oedipus Tyrannus," as a whole, is one of the masterpieces of the American musical repertoire. The Prelude has never had so good a performance as Dr. Muck gave to it. It was graphic in every measure and lofty in the highest degree.

Since Dr. Muck decided to give Debussy's "Le Mer," a second chance, we conscientiously and with unbiased mind tried to find new beauties in it. We failed. There were a few "heave-hos" that suggested sailors pulling at the ropes and a few mighty billows in the finale, but the muted horn bleatings, the oboe cacklings, the disjointed bits of ugliness still presented only such a sea as Coleridge pictures in his "Ancient Mariner," (the "Rotting Sea," with its thousand, thousand slimy things"), and not the beloved, healthy ocean which we revel in and upon. We believe that Shakespeare mean Debussy's ocean when he speaks of taking up arms against a sea of troubles. We hope that Dr. Muck will continue his good work and give this composition in New York a second time. It would be a fair revenge for the recent performance of "Martha," by the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston.

It may be possible, however, that in the transit to America, the title of this work has been changed. It is possible that Debussy did not intend to call it "La Mer," but "Le Mal de Mer," which would at once make the tone-picture as clear as day. It is a series of symphonic pictures of seasickness. The first movement is "headache." The second is "Doubt," picturing moments of dread suspense, whether or no! The third movement with its explosions and rumblings has now a self-evident purpose. The hero is endeavoring to throw up his boot-heels! We are sorry that Debussy hates the sea so bitterly and still more sorry that he has put this vehement dislike into symphonic form (or formlessness) but we again refer him to Richard Wagner, Mendelssohn and Rubinstein, for proof that some composers have enjoyed and pictured the mighty ocean.

Louis C. Elson.

...NDAY HERALD
APRIL 21, 1907.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 22D CONCERT

Mme. Maud Powell Executes Superb Violin Concerto by Sibelius.

AN OLD GRIEG OVERTURE HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Tribute to Prof. John K. Paine in Overture to Oedipus Tyrannus.

BY PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "In Autumn".....Grieg
Concerto in D minor for violin.....Sibelius
Overture to "Oedipus Tyrannus".....Paine
Symphony Sketches, "the Sea".....Debussy

Grieg's overture and the violin concerto were played here for the first time. Debussy's "Sea" sketches were played for the second time this season by request.

Prof. John K. Paine died a year ago on the 25th of this month. It was meet and fitting that tribute should be paid his memory. The overture to "The Birds" of Aristophanes was first announced, but the overture to the tragedy of Sophocles was thought to be more appropriate to the occasion, and it was substituted; not, however, till the programme book had been made up by the printer. The hurried substitution accounts for the inadequacy of the notes on Prof. Paine's Sophoclean overture.

Thirty years ago Mr. Thomas Hardy declared that haggard Egdon Heath appealed to "a subtler and scarcer instinct, to a more recently learned emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming." He questioned whether the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty was not approaching its last quarter. "The new Vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule: human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a somberness distasteful to our race when it was young."

The violin concerto of Sibelius and in fact the symphonies of this composer recall this saying of Hardy. The somberness of this Finn is not an affectation; it is not worn as a costume for a masquerade; it is constitutional; it is the color of his natural speech. It is not the expression of a peevish pessimist; it is broad and deep and elemental. There is something titanic about it. It is as though the composer were still under the spell of the old northern mythology. There is the thought of the rhapsodic bard; there is the suggestion of the Saga. Look at the face of this composer. Mark the firmness, the determination, the grimness of the expression. Would you expect genteel phrases, sugared sensuousness, irresistible appeals to palpitating ladies from such a man?

The first movement is as a Bardic improvisation. It is in a sense emotional, yet its emotional effect on an audience will be slight until the audience is accustomed to this strange language. The second movement is one of grand and constant beauty. The long melody is as the large utterance of an early goddess. It is shot through with emotion of the noblest kind. This mood is established at once and it is not changed or lessened. There is no reminder of composer or interpreter.

The music is not laboriously invented, it did not come to Sibelius by accident as he was asking for a theme. The finale is not a perfunctorily brilliant ending written because no concerto should be without a finale. It has marked character, a character consistent with what has gone before. In the aggressive lightness of the opening measures there is the playfulness of a cave man, rude exultation at the sight of more friendly nature after long hibernation.

No mere virtuoso greedy for popular favor would choose this concerto for personal display. Mme. Powell has never been in the habit of setting applause-traps. I know of no violinist now before the public who is better entitled to respect and admiration. In whatever she has undertaken in the course of her long and honorable career, she has been true to herself and to art in its highest form. No merchant ever trafficked in her heart. To speak of her mechanism at this late day would be an impertinence, for her abilities have long been recognized by two continents.

The greater the task to which she devotes herself, the more quickly do her skill, her brains, her soul respond. It is enough to say that her performance of this exceedingly difficult concerto was worthy, both in mechanism and in aesthetic and emotional quality, of the high ideal which she has had steadily before her.

The concerto is not a concerto in the ordinary meaning of the term; it is rather a symphonic poem with a violin obbligato.

The task appointed for conductor and orchestra is also one of extreme difficulty, yet the ensemble performance was of such a nature that the composer was glorified and the occasion made memorable.

Grieg's overture, composed over 40 years ago, and long afterward robed in a fresh orchestral dress, is based on his song, "Autumn Storms," and a Norwegian harvest tune. There are charming bits in it, especially in episodic sections, and in orchestral detail. There is youthful fancy in it; there is youthful enthusiasm; there is possibly here and there a stroke of genius; but as a whole the overture seems to be made in a small way, and the greater Grieg is in the smaller pieces.

Prof. Paine's overture with its classic spirit was placed effectively between the concerto and the sketches of the extraordinary, unique Debussy. It was a good thing to hear these sketches again. The second was even more delightfully fantastical than at the first hearing [illegible] the third. Whether this music portrays phases of the sea depends on how much of the ocean is in each hearer. To the majority of New Yorkers the sea is Coney Island.

To certain highly estimable Bostonians there is no sea except off Nahant. To those who understand the meaning of the saying, "The ever young and ever venerable sea; the sea, because there is no other name for it," the music of Debussy is full of charm and fascination. The true force and beauty of such music is in the hearer. We must never forget the line of Walt Whitman: "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments." There are some to whom instruments appeal in vain unless they are used in conventional, orthodox manner, in a way that is approved by both the selectmen and Mrs. Grundy.

BOSTON HERALD
APRIL 23, 1907.

WILLY HESS GETS LEAVE.

Concert Master Will Visit Europe—Karl Wendling Takes Place.

Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at his own urgent request, has been released from active duty. He has made this request that he may benefit his health by a sojourn in Europe and incidentally accept certain important engagements as a virtuoso in European countries.

His three years in Boston have entailed constant and arduous work. Mr. Hess will sail with his family for Germany next month.

His successor for the season of 1907-08 will be Mr. Karl Wendling of Stuttgart, who is the concert master of the Court Orchestra of that city, both in the opera house and in the symphony concerts. He is also the leader of a string quartet. His reputation as a concert master is more than local, in fact he is ranked among the leading men that occupy similar positions in European cities, and he has served as concert master at Bayreuth. Mr. Wendling has obtained leave of absence for one year. He will arrive in Boston next fall.

QUARTET'S LAST CONCERT

New Serenade for Strings by Jaques-Dalcroze Given.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its sixth and last concert of the season last night in Jordan Hall. The programme was as follows: Tschaikowsky, Quartet in D major, op. 11 No. 1; Jaques-Dalcroze, three movements from Serenade, op. 61; Beethoven's Septet in E flat major, op. 20. Messrs. Grisez, clarinet, M. Hess, horn, Sadony, bassoon, and K. Keller, double bass, assisted.

The programme was an interesting one. The andante of Tschaikowsky's quartet long ago made the composer famous all over the world, and it is still beautiful by reason of its ineffable melancholy and tenderness. Thirty years ago Tolstoi sat by Tschaikowsky when a concert was given at Moscow in honor of the novelist. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote Tschaikowsky in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstoi, sitting by my side, listened to my andante while the tears streamed down his face." This andante, by the way, is based on a Russian folk-song which Tschaikowsky heard in 1869 at Kamenka and noted at the time.

Jaques-Dalcroze, born in Vienna of French extraction, studied at Geneva, Vienna and Paris, and now teaches composition at the Conservatory of Geneva. Although he has written operas, cantatas, piano pieces and many songs, he is known in Boston chiefly by his violin concerto which was played here last season by Mr. Marteau, a work distinguished chiefly by piquant harmonies, and fantastically brilliant instrumentation. Three movements from the Serenade were played here for the first time by the Boston Symphony Quartet at a Sunday concert in Chickering Hall last February.

And The Herald commented upon them at the time. The work was unfamiliar to many in last evening's audience. Of the three movements the last, an allegro scherzando, gave apparently the greatest pleasure by its infectious and captivating rhythm. All the movements have a certain charm, but have not much distinction, and make no lasting impression.

Tschaikowsky's quartet aroused more spontaneous enthusiasm, and was probably the more grateful task of the two for the players, who gave it a keenly sympathetic performance. The applause was prolonged after the memorable andante, which is in the nature of a violin solo with accompaniment by the other strings, and Mr. Hess was obliged to respond individually.

The septet was pleasant by reason of the variety it gave to the programme, and the agreeable quality of the blended tone. But for these attributes the music would scarcely have borne being placed at the end of such a programme.

There was an appreciative audience of [illegible]derate size.

[18]

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT
APRIL 23, 1907

WILLY HESS RETIRES

His Resignation as Concert-Master of the Symphony Orchestra—The Causes of It—The Symphony Quartet Ends Its Concerts

In spite of reports to the contrary, that are already in circulation in New York, Mr. Hess's retirement as concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra is altogether voluntary. His contract with the management had another year to run; and, though Mr. Gericke and the violinist were not always on good terms, Dr. Muck's relations with him have been entirely harmonious, and the conductor esteemed him as a very able concert-master. Had he chosen, Mr. Hess might have continued in his post until the expiration of his contract. His health, however, has been uneven in the three years that he has spent in Boston, and the strain of much and hard work, especially with the Symphony Quartet, has told upon his nervous temperament. Therefore he asked leave to return to Germany for a year of comparative rest, with occasional appearances as a solo violinist. Whether he will return to Boston at the expiration of his leave of absence is a matter for the future that will depend mainly upon his own decision. With his departure the existence of the Symphony Quartet will come to an end, and another is not likely to be established as 'the Kneisels" originally were, and as the Symphony Quartet has been, as a constituent part of the orchestra. It is no secret that the Symphony Quartet, interesting as its concerts have often been, has hardly gained the place expected for it, though Mr. Hess has done as much as man and musician might do to establish it.

Mr. Hess's audiences here will best remember him for the sympathetic mastery of his instrument that he proved in Joachim's concerto in which he first appeared here; for the serene and adroit artistry that he brought to Beethoven's concerto last season, and for his playing in his own and other concerts of some of the older pieces for violin. It was in them that the penetrating beauty and suppleness of his tone, its peculiarly insinuating sweetness, and the fineness of his technical skill and musicianly understanding had clearest play. As a concert-master, his playing of the passages for solo violin in Strauss's "Domestica" and in Debussy's sea-pieces at recent Symphony concerts is in fresh and praising memory. Mr. Hess's successor finally is to be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Court Orchestra at Stuttgart and on occasion of the Festival Orchestra at Baireuth, of experience and ability in such work. He joins the orchestra next autumn, while Mr. Hess continues at his desk through the few remaining concerts of the current season. H. T. P.

Chickering Hall: The Symphony Quartet

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the sixth and last concert of its present season in Chickering Hall, last evening, assisted by Mr. Grisez, clarinet; Mr. M. Hess, horn; Mr. Sadony, bassoon; Mr. K. Keller, double bass. The programme presented the Quartet Op. 11, by Tschaikovsky, three movements from the Serenade, Op. 61, by Jaques-Dalcroze, and Beethoven's Septet Op. 20, for strings and wind instruments.

Emile Jacques-Dalcroze, born of Swiss parents at Vienna, is a man of startling versatility. A composer and pianist, he is also poet, essayist and pedagogue of some originality. He has written various musical pieces for the stage. "Riquet à la Houppe," "L'Ecolier," "Par les Bois," "Le Violon Maudit" in three acts, "Janie" a lyric comedy in three acts, "Sancho" musical comedy in four acts, "Onkel Dazumal" comic opera on one act; several books of Chansons by which he is widely known, and many other works, including a string quartet and a violin concerto Op. 50, played here by Mr. Marteau at a Symphony concert March 10, 1906. Mr. Jaques-Dalcroze has attracted much attention by his advocacy of a system of gymnastics to develop the sense of rhythm. He has written several treatises in support of his theories; he has also organized classes to prove the practical results which may be obtained by their practice. The movements from the serenade were played for the first time at these concerts, their first performance here being at a Chickering Sunday concert in February.

The concerto played by Mr. Marteau was chiefly notable for its disregard of conventional construction, and its unusual, not to say specious instrumental combinations, rather than intrinsic beauty of melody or distinction of musical thought. These movements from the Serenade display much the same characteristics. They are piquant, lyric and vivacious in mood, unconventional, but strikingly clever in construction. At the same time they seem to aim rather at novelty at any cost, surprising effects in quartet style instead of first-hand musical expressiveness. The composer seems more preoccupied with the manner of his musical speech than with the intimate qualities of its message. His music is far from lacking either individuality or sincerity, it is diverting, picturesque; his treatment of rhythm bespeaks his own development of that essential instinct, but the sentiment and mood are not convincing. Nevertheless its freshness and variety hold the attention; this serenade is a novelty well worth listening to.

The well-known Tschaikowsky Quartet was performed brilliantly, the slow movement was played with rare finish and delicacy. In the biography of his brother, Modest Tschaikowsky tells us of a concert of his compositions arranged by Nicholas Rubinstein in honor of Leo Tolstoi, at which the latter was so much affected by a performance of the andante from the D major quartet, that he burst into tears. "Never in the whole course of my life," wrote the composer in his diary, "did I feel so flattered, never so proud of my creative power, as when Leo Tolstoi, sitting by my side, listened to my andante, while the tears streamed down his face." The movement has been easily dismissed as "saccharine," but with the remembrance of the many bitter hours in Tschaikowsky's life, his long periods of despair and self-distrust, it seems the outcome of a gracious oasis in a desert of suffering; it is unaffectedly charming and genuine.

The Beethoven septet was well played in spite of some noticeable slips in ensemble. On the whole, it does not bear its years lightly. A work of some importance in its composer's development there are moments of beauty, of gayety and brilliance, but there are many dreary pages that seem over formal, belonging to the apprentice stage, in which the eloquence of the master is lacking. Mr. Grisez's playing of the clarinet part was delightful throughout, Mr. Hess's playing of the treacherous triplets given to the horn in the trio of the "Tempo di Minuetto" was also notable for its security.

The programmes of this present series of concerts deserve especial mention for their excellent balance and diversity of schools represented. The novelties by Kaun, Jaques-Dalcroze and Saint-Saëns were all worth the hearing irrespective of the virtues and failings of these works. In addition the performance of other works too seldom given here, such as the quartet by Debussy, the sonata for piano and violin by Fauré, the quintet by César Franck, the Tschaikowsky trio and Mozart's clarinet quintet, should prompt gratitude to Professor Hess for his inclusion of them on his list. E. B. H.

BOSTON JOURNAL
APRIL 23, 1907.

SYMPHONY QUARTET CLOSES ITS SEASON

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet for this season was given in Chickering Hall last evening, having been postponed from the first Monday in April to this date. The quartet, whose members are Professor Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and Heinrich Warnke, were assisted by the following artists, who contributed no little to the beauty of the exquisitely arranged program: Georges Grizes, clarinet; Max Hess, horn; Peter Sadony, bassoon, and Karl Keller, double bass.

The first number on the program, a quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello by Tschaikowsky in four movements, was beautifully interpreted by the quartet. Selections from "Serenade" by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze comprised the second number, which was a veritable feast of fine music, and the third and last number, a septet by Beethoven, in which all but Mr. Roth took part, brought the very delightful series of concerts to a close. This was in six parts and was quite the piece de resistance.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXXI., No. 117.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1907.

QUARTET DISBANDS AT SAILING OF HESS

Boston Symphony Four, Losing Their Leader, Give up Organization.

With the departure of Prof. Willy Hess for Europe, it has been decided to give up the Boston Symphony quartet, of which he was the leader as well as being the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For the first time since the organization of the Kneisel quartet, which had substantial support from Mr. Higginson until it was placed on a paying basis, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be without a chamber music organization under the direct patronage of the management.

It has been found almost impossible to arrange a schedule of concerts and rehearsals for the Boston Symphony quartet which does not interfere with the more important work of the orchestra. As the quartet comprised the concert master and another leading violin of the orchestra, as well as the principal viola and principal violoncello, there could be no conflict in dates, and, naturally, the quartet had always to give way to the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony quartet was organized in the fall of 1904 as the successor of the Arbos quartet, which had succeeded the Kneisel quartet.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 23, 1907

THE HESS QUARTETTE CONCERT

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky. Quartette in D.
Jaques-Dalcroze. Three movements from Serenade, Op. 61.
Beethoven. Septette.

In the final number Mr. Grisez, clarinette, Mr. Hess, horn, Mr. Sadony, bassoon, and Mr. Keller, double-bass, assisted the regular forces.

It was a dignified concert (in Chickering Hall, last night) to end a worthy season of the Boston Symphony Quartette. The Tschaikowsky quartette made a good beginning to the programme, being easily intelligible, emotional and (Dieu merci!) melodious. It was played with a vigor and intensity that suited its passionate vein very well. Of course the celebrated Andante, with its muted strings, its violin melody against a reiterated pizzicato, its tender and popular melody, won the chief applause—which proves that even a string-quartette concert audience is not melody-proof.

Emile Jaques-Dalcroze belongs to the new school. He was born in Vienna in 1865, but is of Swiss parentage and is Swiss in the tendency of much of his music. He is radical enough, breaking through conventional form with the best of them. But he has one thing which is lacking in many of his brother-iconoclasts—he has the gift of melody and a humorous touch and lightness which is very welcome in the latter-day music. He has lived in Geneva since his childhood, excepting the years when he studied with Fuchs and Bruckner in Vienna and Delibes (orchestration) in Paris. He is very gifted on the literary as well as on the musical side. He has composed much, from the largest forms (operas, etc.) to children's pieces and folk-songs. Such a man's debut in Boston deserves especial attention.

The Allegretto Capriccioso began with bold syncopations and brusque interruptions, but it was clear enough in form, had a return of its first subject and good contrasts between violin and viola.

But the second movement ("Tranquillo") was a gem. It began oddly, with alternations of bow strokes and pizzicati, but when the chief theme began there was great beauty of development, charming imitations between violin, 'cello, and viola, every touch being made with a surety that commanded admiration.

The "Scherzando" was, like the Allegretto, very short. It had a jolly and rollicking chief theme and was as hearty as any string quartette music could be. All three movements were finely played.

Decidedly Jaques-Dalcroze has something to say that is worth hearing. He does not indulge in modern ugliness or in the prolixity which is a leading characteristic with many modern writers of chamber music. He is fresh, healthy and brief. We hope that the rest of his works may bear out this favorable first impression.

The good old Septette of Beethoven is not heard often in the concert-room nowadays. It is widely removed from Beethoven's later chamber-music and save in the advanced treatment of the Waldhorn does not show the bold vein of the composer of the Heroic Symphony of two years later. Yet there is a tunefulness and heartiness in the work which will never lose its charm. One would like to have that other famous Septette, the one by Hummel, resuscitated for the modern programme some day.

The performance was, throughout, of a high order of excellence. The Minuet, the clear-cut variations, the final march-like movement, were all easy of comprehension and all won applause. The horn played its difficult phrases remarkably well, especially in the first movement.

In the Adagio (which seemed rather prolix) the clarinette and bassoon did excellent work. It meant a good deal to write such clarinette phrases in 1802. It was only 14 years after Mozart had admitted the instrument, for the first time, into the Symphonic orchestra, and Weber and Mendelssohn had not yet taught the world the foreboding and spectral color of its deeper register—the chalumeau.

But the Septette as a whole seems a little too long and too suave for "these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Journal
APRIL 27, 1907.

SYMPHONY QUARTET TO BE ABANDONED

With the departure of Professor Willy Hess for Europe, it has been decided to give up the Boston Symphony Quartet, of which he was the leader as well as the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus, for the first time since the organization of the Kneisel Quartet, which had substantial support from Mr. Higginson until it was placed on a paying basis, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be without a chamber music organization under the direct patronage of the management.

The reason for this action is that it has been found almost impossible so to arrange a schedule of concerts and rehearsals for the Boston Symphony Quartet which does not interfere with the more important work of the orchestra. As the quartet comprised the concertmaster and another leading first violin of the orchestra, as well as the principal viola and principal violoncello, there could be no conflict in dates and, naturally, the quartet had always to give way to the orchestra. The Kneisel Quartet left the orchestra after it had secured a profitable patronage in this country, because the work in both organizations was so heavy that justice could not be done to either. Professor Hess is returning to Europe for a year principally because he is tired out by his enormous duties as concertmaster of the orchestra and leader of the quartet. Therefore, it has been deemed wise to give up the latter organization.

The Boston Symphony Quartet was organized in the fall of 1904 as the successor of the Arbos Quartet, which had succeeded the Kneisel Quartet. Its three seasons have been most successful, artistically, and its progress in popular favor has been rapid. This makes its abandonment all the more to be regretted.

BOSTON JOURNAL
APRIL 27, 1907.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The last opportunity that the general public will have this season to hear the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck will come tomorrow night at the second Pension Fund concert, which will be given in Symphony Hall at 8 o'clock. As is generally known, the program will comprise Wagner's Seven Overtures and Preludes and the Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods." This program was given on Dec. 30 last and there has been a very general desire to have it repeated.

The program in full is as follows: The overtures to Rienzi, the Flying Dutchman and Tannhauser; the preludes to Lohengrin, Tristan and Isolde and the Master-singers of Nuremberg; Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

THE "POP" CONCERTS.

The annual series of "Pop Concerts" in Symphony Hall, which begin on Monday evening, May 6, will continue this year only eight weeks instead of the usual nine. The last concert will be given on Saturday evening, June 29. The first conductor, as last year, will be Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski announces that he has a number of novelties in the way of light and graceful music that he will put on his programs. The usual number of "special nights" will be given. Full details regarding the season will be announced next week. In the meantime tables may now be reserved for the first week.

SYMPHONY SEASON CLOSING.

The twenty-sixth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first season of Dr. Muck in Boston come to an end on next Friday and Saturday, May 3 and 4, when the twenty-fourth program of the year will be given. In many respects it is one of the most notable years the orchestra has ever had. In the coming of Dr. Muck and in the great success he has met with wherever the orchestra has played, unquestionably may be found one of the reasons for the decided increase in the patronage which has been the fortune of the orchestra throughout the country. On the other hand, the time has come when the orchestra is on such a solid foundation that each succeeding season shows increased interest in its concerts, not merely in Boston, but in all the cities that it visits in the course of the seven winter months. In looking over the twenty-four programs of the season, the first feature which strikes one is the number of works which have been played for the first time in Boston. Out of the total of sixty-six purely orchestral works, there have been eighteen novelties. A good proportion of these belong to ultra-modern music, but one is rather astonished to find such works as Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and Grieg's Overture, "In the Autumn." Another noticeable feature of the programs is the relatively large representation of American composers, their names being Brockway, Chadwick, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell and Paine. The program for the closing concert is: Volkmann—Overture, "Richard III." Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "The Battle of the Huns;" Beethoven—Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica."

[182]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

THURSDAY, APRIL 25, 1907

Wagner for the Pension Fund

For the first time in the records of the Symphony Orchestra, it is to repeat next Sunday evening in Symphony Hall a concert for the profit of its Pension Fund. Last December, when the time came for the first of the two annual concerts to increase it, Dr. Muck and the managing committee of the fund made a programme that comprised seven overtures or preludes to Wagner's operas and the orchestral apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." The list began with the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" and continued through the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal." The committee wished to give a "Wagner concert" with Dr. Muck conducting. He is firm in the righteous objection to the "lifting" of fragments of Wagner's operas from their place on the stage and diluting them with the conditions of concert form. Wagner, he reasons justly, intended his operas for performance in the theatre and nowhere else. He wrote accordingly and with accumulated knowledge and adroit instinct of the theatre. There and there only may the music, unless it is purely orchestral, and nearly independent of the action on the stage, accomplish the ends Wagner designed for it. Accordingly Dr. Muck would conduct in the overtures or the preludes to the operas and in such distinctively orchestral fragments as Siegfried's glorification; but beyond them he would not go.

On paper, last December, the programme so made seemed strange and rather forbidding. In performance, on the contrary, it proved surprisingly interesting. The studious might, if they liked, follow in the successive numbers one path of the evolution of Wagner as a composer from the frank conventions of the overture to "Rienzi" to the poignant subtleties of the prelude to "Parsifal." To the average hearer, who had come purely for the musical and the emotional pleasures of the concert, the whole impression was rather of the variety of appeal in the matter and the manner of the music. There was little sense of overture following overture, or of prelude succeeding prelude. Instead, each brought its own particular impression of fitting eloquence. Something of this impression it owed to the conducting of Dr. Muck. For the first time his new public heard him from the beginning to the end of a concert as an operatic conductor, and as a conductor of Wagner's music, and he justified the reputation as both that he had long enjoyed in Germany. "He disclosed," said the Transcript, in its review of the concert, "the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and the adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of orchestral song, and in the quick seizing and accenting of the dramatic elements of the music. . . . Throughout he avoided the many pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting, and throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it." The whole impression of the concert was deep, keen and lingering. Some recalled and still recall the particular delights of it like the pictorial power and the emotional tensity with which Dr. Muck clothed the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" of the songful ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the plangent close of the overture to "Tannhäuser" or the piercing intensity of the prelude to "Parsifal." Others have remembered only the thrilling pleasure of the whole. From within and without the regular public of the Symphony Orchestra have come sufficient requests for the repetition of the concert to warrant the venture. Therefore the seven preludes, Dr. Muck and the orchestra are all to serve their hearers and the treasury of the men's Pension Fund again next Sunday.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, APRIL 28, 1907.

"POP CONCERTS."

The annual series of "pop concerts" in Symphony Hall, which begin on Monday evening, May 6, will continue this year only eight weeks instead of the usual nine. The last concert will be given on Saturday evening, June 29. The first conductor, as last year, will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski announces that he has procured a number of novelties in the way of light and graceful music. The usual number of "special nights" will be given. Full details regarding the season will be announced next week. Tables may now be reserved for the first week.

The sixth and last Boston Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Taursday evening, May 2, at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Olga von Radecki, pianist, and the programme will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Euryanthe"; Arensky, concerto in F minor; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor

BOSTON GLOBE-
TUESDAY, APRIL 23, 1907.

PROF HESS RETIRES.

As Concertmaster of the Symphony Orchestra.

Work Too Hard—Carl Wendling of Germany Succeeds Him.

At his own urgent request Prof Willy Hess has been released from his duties as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. With his family he will sail for Germany next month and will spend next winter in Europe. His reasons for leaving Boston are that his three years here have entailed a vast quantity of very hard work and he wants to rest, and incidentally fill numerous solo engagements on the continent which have been offered to him.

PROF WILLY HESS.

His successor for next season will be Carl Wendling, who comes to Boston next fall on a year's leave of absence from his duties as concert master at the Hoftheater in Stuttgart. Mr Wendling has the reputation of being one of the best violinists and best concert masters in Germany. He was concert master at the last festival in Bayreuth.

The Boston Post
APRIL 29, 1907

BENEFIT FOR THE SYMPHONY

OLIN DOWNES

Last night in Symphony Hall our orchestra gave its second concert of the year for the benefit of the pension fund, repeating by general request the programme of the first concert, which consisted of the Wagner overtures and preludes in chronological order, including the funeral march from "Gotterdamerung."

An audience gathered which amply supported Bernard Shaw's contention that Wagner's music is essentially music for the people, be they musicians or laymen. Every seat in the hall was occupied and there were many standees.

If the first concert was a gratifying success, the second was a veritable triumph. It has rarely been our experience to enjoy a performance where conductor and players were so absolutely in unison. The men were filled with enthusiasm, and they surpassed themselves in carrying out the faintest suggestion of their leader, who had but to make the slightest indication of his wishes and see them fulfilled with a perfection hardly attainable save in an orchestra so thoroughly at home in the works performed and possessing such superb virtuosity as our own.

The "Rienzi" overture is pointed at with the finger of scorn in these days. Yet there are in it intensely and genuinely dramatic pages. In spite of the circus tune, which serves for a coda, and other banal moments, it is the music of a youthful genius; it flames with youthful ardor and glowing inspiration. Dr. Muck brought these facts home in an incontestable manner by a performance which squeezed the last drop of musical content from every phrase.

Both this and the "Dutchman" overture received wellnigh unsurpassable performances, and our conductor was compelled to have his men rise and acknowledge the hearty tribute to his and their skill at the conclusion of the thrice-blessed introduction to "Tannhauser."

As before, the most wonderful moment of the evening was the "Tristan" prelude; there was the same epic strength, breadth and overwhelming sonority about the Funeral March, the joyous abandon and remarkable elasticity of tempo about the "Meistersinger" introduction, which gave the men requisite freedom to abundantly express the surging joy and festivity of the glorious music.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1907

THE LAST CONCERTS OF THE YEAR

The Symphony Orchestra Ends the Season with Three Concerts Next Week—Minor Announcements

Earlier than in any other city in America, the Symphony Orchestra begins the musical season in Boston at the middle of October, and rarely do other concerts come before November. Now, a week later than the season runs elsewhere, and after other concerts are well behind us, it will end our musical year. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening it gives its last pair of concerts for the current season with a programme of familiar pieces—Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Liszt's tone-poem, "The Battle of the Huns," with the climax of its battle hymn; and Volkmann's overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.," which may tax all Dr. Muck's power of reanimation. Beethoven's symphony tempts expectation that the conductor may make his playing of it as stirring as was that of Brahms's first symphony or of Beethoven's seventh at past concerts. With it he takes leave of his public here until next autumn.

Tomorrow evening, besides, at eight o'clock, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck and the orchestra give the second concert of the year for the profit of the Pension Fund of the men when the years or chance disablement take them from their work. Three overtures, four preludes and one orchestral fragment, all from Wagner's operas, make the programme. Dr. Muck has arranged them in chronological order—the overture to "Rienzi," the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the overture to "Tannhäuser," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "Tristan," the prelude to "The Mastersingers," Siegfried's apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal." It is, indeed, a repetition of the programme of the earlier concert for the Pension Fund last December when Dr. Muck's audience first discovered his powers as a conductor of Wagner's music. The stir that the concert made among those who heard it and in widening circles since has amply justified, as we tried to explain in this column on Thursday, a repetition.

On Thursday evening, likewise, the Symphony Orchestra gives the last concert of its series at Cambridge with the assistance of Miss Olga von Radecki, the pianist, who has lately reëstablished herself here. She will take the piano in Arenski's concerto in F minor. The purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," and Brahms's first symphony—Dr. Muck's masterpiece of the year in his performances of the classics.

BOSTON HERALD
APRIL 29, 1907.

SECOND CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Repeats Its Wagner Programme Before Big House.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave the second concert in aid of its pension fund last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was the same as that of the first Pension Fund concert this season, and consisted of the following works by Wagner: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhaeuser," preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers," "Parsifal," and the funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung."

The size of the audience last evening fully justified the decision to repeat the former programme, for the hall was crowded, and many stood throughout the concert. Whether the audience consisted mainly of those who were "turned away from the box office" at the previous performance, or of Wagnerites who came eagerly a second time, it is evident that the Wagner cult in Boston has not been run into the ground. Nor is it dependent upon th capricious support of visiting opera companies, as used to be predicted. It is a wonder that Wagner's music ever survived its phase of injudicious exploitation; but it has survived, proving its fitness, and what was once a morbid taste has at last developed into a healthy appetite.

The top gallery at the opera is no longer the scene of an orgy on Wagner nights; the Wagnerite of today is not the curious specimen he was; and last evening's audience was the same audience that today finds pleasure in earlier and later composers, and would even admit the possibility of musical salvation for such as Debussy or Richard Strauss.

The performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, such a performance of these works as is really heard in concert hall or opera house. The audience was quick to appreciate the work of the orchestra and of Dr. Muck, and paid a greater tribute than applause in the absolute silence with which it listened. After certain numbers, Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled, and at the end of the "Tannhaeuser" overture he made the orchestra rise to share the honor.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
APRIL 28, 1907.

Symphony Concert.

Dr Karl Muck offered an entertaining novelty to the Symphony orchestra patrons at the 23d concert of the season last evening, in the Victor Bendix symphony in D minor, No. 4. Not only was this composition given for the first time in Boston, but it is the most recent work of the composer, having been written last year. It has many elements of appeal to a Symphony audience, especially toward the close of the season, when one's spirits instinctively crave the lighter if not so substantial musical diet. The works of this composer are not very familiar to Bostonians, having been rarely played, although his brother, Otto Bendix, was for many years a member of the Boston colony of teachers of music. It is probable that more opportunities to hear the Bendix productions will be given, since Dr Muck is an admirer and a worthy interpreter of the music of the Danish conductor.

In the symphony played last evening the art of the composer is distinctly admirable in leading up to a climax, for the concluding movement is a tremendously forceful development of the preceding three. Only in the final movement does the composer utilize the full orchestra for his best effects, and therein he compels the outburst of enthusiasm which has been so steadily gathering.

From the opening bars of the first movement, allegro animato, the themes are apparent in their simplicity. Though rather delicately developed by the strings the composer reveals ingenuity of instrumentation in place of the strength of purpose in building about his themes. There is much of graceful writing in the intermezzo in the leading parts given to the flute and oboe, and the subordination of the strings in these movements leaves instead of lack of satisfaction just a suggestion of failure to be complete.

But the beauty of this symphony lays materially in the third and final movements. The predominance of the English horn in opening the third movement presages its breadth and freedom, and as the melody is taken up and developed by the violins, later augmented by flutes and clarinets, the thought of the composer is expressed with an almost bewildering facility of instrumentation. Hardly has this been appreciated when there comes a phrase for horn, then clarinet, then oboe with string accompaniment which brings the movement to a close with the first display of forceful expression of the composition.

In the last movement are fervid fortissimo passages with a particularly passionate theme for the violins, while the coda written in D major is so spirited that the symphony is ended with a rare volume of harmony.

Under Dr Muck's direction the Bendix symphony received more than favorable interpretation, in fact, appreciation of the earlier movements may be said to have been largely due to the orchestra.

The other two numbers on the program were the "Espana" rhapsody by Chabrier, with its manipulation of the typical dance music of Spain, and Smetana's rarely heard overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride." The audience was in a mood for the Chabrier work, for Dr Muck found the most enthusiastic response to this number.

The season will close with this week's rehearsal and concert at which the following program will be played: Volkmann's overture to "Richard III," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Battle of the Huns," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Pension Fund Concert.

The last opportunity that the general public will have this season to hear the Symphony orchestra under Dr Muck will come tonight at the second pension fund concert which will be given in Symphony hall. The program will comprise Wagner's seven overtures and preludes and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." This program was given Dec 30, and that there has been a very general desire to have it repeated finds evidence in the very large sale that has been going on at Symphony hall for the past week.

The program in full is as follows: The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser"; the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Boston Symphony Quartet.

With the departure of Prof Hess for Europe it has been decided to give up the Boston Symphony quartet, of which he was the leader, as well as the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Thus, for the first time since the organization of the Kneisel quartet, which had substantial support from Mr Higginson until it was placed on a paying basis, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be without a chamber music organization under the direct patronage of the management.

The reason for this action is that it has been found almost impossible so to arrange a schedule of concerts and rehearsals for the quartet which does not interfere with the more important work of the orchestra. The Kneisel quartet left the orchestra after it had secured a profitable patronage in this country, because the work in both organizations was so heavy that justice could not be done to either. The Boston Symphony quartet was organized in the fall of 1904 as the successor of the Arbos quartet, which had succeeded the Kneisel quartet.

"The Pops" Will Soon Begin.

The annual series of Pop concerts in Symphony hall which begin on Monday evening, May 6, will continue this year only eight weeks instead of the usual nine. The last concert will be given on Saturday evening, June 29. The first conductor, as last year, will be Timothee Adamowski. Mr Adamowski announces that he has a number of novelties in the way of light and graceful music that he will put on his programs. The usual number of "special nights" will be given. Full details regarding the season will be announced next week. In the meantime tables may now be reserved for the first week.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The sixth and last Boston symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening. The soloists will be Miss Olga von Radecki and the program as follows: overture "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Arensky; symphony No. 1, in C minor, Brahms.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
APRIL 29, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Victor Bendix. Symphony No. 4, D minor.
Chabrier. "Espana." Rhapsody for Orchestra.
Smetana. Overture. "The Sold Bride."

We are getting along bravely without soloists at most of our symphony concerts, and we thank Dr. Muck for impressing this lesson upon the public. We cannot so unreservedly praise his choice of new symphonies, however, taking Mr. Bendix's as an example. As Bendix was a pupil of Gade (whom the irreverent called "Mrs. Mendelssohn"), it was to be expected that he would not be very heterodox in form. Nor did he go quite as far as Richard Strauss in the amplitude of his orchestral forces. He has scored the work about as heavily as Beethoven did his ninth symphony,—and he has made it about as long. Unfortunately, however, he has not as much to say as Beethoven had.

The first movement opens promisingly with a rugged chief theme in which trumpets and kettle-drums play an important part. There is a good tributary passage which ends with an impressive diminuendo and ushers in the subordinate theme. Here matters begin to fall off in interest. This subordinate subject is not either striking or well-contrasted with what has preceded. One seeks in vain for the lyric character which should relieve both the masculine style of the chief theme and the intellectual character of the development. There were the usual modern complexities of rhythm, skilfully made and skilfully played.

There was no scherzo in this work, which remained either gloomy or warlike throughout. The intermezzo, which came second and took the place of the scherzo, was of a melancholy and semi-pastoral character. It gave many opportunities to the wood-wind instruments which were taken full advantage of. There was much figure treatment, until one felt like charging Bendix, as Falstaff charged Prince Henry,—"Oh, thou hast damnable iteration!"

Matters grew somewhat better in the last two movements. There was much excellent work for the French horn to do in the adagio and it was excellently played. But here again there was an excess of thematic development. It seemed as if Mr. Bendix were aspiring to become a Danish D'Indy in what Wagner would have called "ciphering with notes." It was all quite as logical as if one were doing a sum in arithmetic, and about as interesting as if the sum were worked out in 10 different ways.

The finale seemed to be the best movement. It was more martial than any other part of the symphony and its march-like theme, its fugal touches, its antiphonal effects for horn and trumpet and its earnestly worked-up climax made a good impression.

But Czerny's velocity studies, or even Schmitt's finger exercises, would have seemed fairly romantic after some portions of the symphony, and it was followed by one of the most popular of selections. Small wonder therefore that Chabrier's Spanish omelette was found savory. It was a work in which the imagination could not go astray.

We have heard of auditors who managed to weave romantic and beautiful sea-dreams out of Debussy's muted horns, oboe shrieks and unresolved dissonances, which is about as difficult as to imagine a snow-storm on seeing a canvas covered with green paint; in this work no such mental gymnastics were necessary, for the jota and the fandango stood out until one could almost smell garlic. The work reminded of Bizet's style in its frank abandon, its hearty animal spirits. Chabrier uses his orchestra as if it were a great guitar. By the use of harps combined with pizzicato string effects, the effect of the bandurria (the great guitar of Spain) is attained in a magnified degree. There are other auricious effects in the color scheme of Chabrier, rapid bassoon work and the most daring of trombone and tuba phrases, and the entire score is ingeniously made.

"Vulgar?" Yes, but only as some phases of national music ought to be. To refine this picture would be to spoil it, and Dr. Muck had the wisdom to see this and give it with an abandon that was glorious. He sliced the dish until all the pepper was piled up. The orchestra played with an "élan" that was marvellous.

Public applause is not a test of true merit. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," or Wagner's "Master-Singers" prelude, have never been applauded as this orchestral sketch was on this occasion. But, while we cannot quite join in the frenzied delight of the audience, we can still pay honest tribute to a work that is entirely successful in its school. Chabrier and Bizet would both have scorned the modern French "cerebral music."

Smetana's "Sold Bride" must have felt badly sold, poor young lady, to have been forced to march in the train of these Spanish gypsies. But she did not march, she ran! for Dr. Muck took the pace quicker than we have ever had it. Even that catchy "Fugue of Imitation," which begins the overture, was taken furiously fast. Yet it was effective and clear and the work ended a remarkable concert in a sprightly manner.

Louis C. Elson.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The season's second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting, repeated last evening, by general request, the Wagner programme of Dec. 30, which was:

Overture—"Rienzi."
Overture—"The Flying Dutchman."
Overture—"Tannhauser."
Vorspiel—"Lohengrin."
Vorspiel—"Tristan und Isolde."
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger."
Funeral March from "Die Gotterdammerung."
Vorspiel—"Parsifal."

Last evening's concert, to a crowded and demonstrative house, gave a superb showing of Wagner overtures. Dr. Muck conducted with the divine fire of genius and with unsurpassed Wagnerian authority. Wagner, no longer of uncertain standing or merit, is well known to concertgoers. "Motives," climaxes and vivid bits of color are all more or less anticipated by the listeners, but Dr. Muck with his wonderful interpretive ability throws new light upon these richly colored tone pictures. His interpretations are like the finest possible hangings for great pictures, where tempered light subtly reveals the soul of the artist through his work.

The evening's programme, chronologically arranged, gave excellent opportunity of showing the composer's evolution from "Rienzi" up to "Die Meistersinger" and "Gotterdammerung," with slow, dramatic beginning, worked well to its bombastic climax. "The Flying Dutchman," descriptive of wind, waves and mystery, was followed by a superb performance of "Tannhauser," where the warring religious and pagan elements were depicted with great art. Dr. Muck received prolonged applause at its conclusion.

"Lohengrin," delicate and finely spun, but with values of strength as well as delicacy, and the human love music of "Tristan and Isolde" exquisite numbers. In the sombre yet crashing tragedy of the Funeral March from "Die Gotterdammerung was the climax of the concert reached, for the final "Parsifal" selection was as a spiritual downpouring to restore the Sabbath calm.

J. K. H.

Boston Journal
April 29-07

SYMPHONY BENEFIT CONCERTS COME TO A CLOSE

Wagner Program Given Under Dr. Muck's Direction—Orchestra Receives an Ovation—Arthur Hartmann Has Recital in Jordan Hall.

The last of this season's concerts for the benefit of the Symphony Orchestra pension fund was given at Symphony Hall last evening. The program was the same as at the preceding concert in December, being made up of Wagner music entirely, in the following progression: Overture, "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser"; preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung," prelude, "Parsifal."

As before Dr. Muck's ability as an interpreter of the Bayreuth master's music was compelling and altogether fine. The varying styles and the growth of the composer were admirably expressed, and altogether the event was one long to be remembered.

OVATION FOR ORCHESTRA AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The twenty-third Symphony concert was sharply divided into two sections, one dull and depressing, the other brilliant and exhilarating. The new symphony in D minor by Victor Bendix furnished the first portion. While this work had certain features to commend it, such as sanity, form and occasional beauty, its chief impression is that of machine made music by a fairly well-grounded professor of his art. Nowhere is there any deeply felt inspiration, any new and impressive melodic style, any splendor of orchestration or glow of color. The first movement is a commonplace grouping of things that have been said before and the second a feeble attempt at pathos. The slow portion is perhaps the best of the work, for here, indeed, we find grace and a not unattractive line of melody. But this is long-drawn out beyond all reason, and what might have charmed by its simplicity and restful appeal becomes tiresome. The finale has spirit of a certain not very spontaneous sort, yet here again a baldness of instrumental grouping prevents thorough enjoyment.

And then the other side—all fire and rhythmic fascination—the side introduced by the magnificent "Espagna" of Chabrier; one of the most dazzling men with an orchestra who ever lived in France. This masterpiece of compelling melody and intoxicating lilt is familiar, but not in the way it was played on this occasion, for Dr. Muck brought out of it an astonishing amount of newness, an instrumental speech of passion and variety that has not been heard before in this city. Its effect was almost enough to bring the audience to its feet, and did the members of the orchestra to theirs in answer to such bursts of applause as do not often disturb the classic serenity of Symphony Hall on Saturday evening.

An equally brilliant and highly colored performance of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" sent its hearers away with complete forgetfulness of the dull symphony that began the [illegible]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
WEDNESDAY, MAY 1, 1907

WHO SHALL CONTROL THE SYMPHONY?

To the Editor of the Transcript:

There is a rumor abroad that some fifteen of the present players of the Symphony Orchestra are to be discharged at the end of the current season and their places filled by new importations. As a concert-goer whose attendance on Saturday night has been, since 1889, nearly as constant as the recurring weeks upon the calendar, and as a lover of the members of the orchestra jointly and severally, I find this rumor disquieting from several points of view.

First, a year ago the orchestra was declared the peer of almost any European Orchestra. Is it possible that in the short time since such deterioration can have taken place as to require that percentage of expulsions? Or does the reason for such deterioration lie elsewhere? Is it possible, if the tenure of office is in the power of the conductor, that he can in one year sufficiently judge the players' individual powers as to justify many summary dismissals? Is it advisable, in view of the short contract of the conductor, that fifteen vacancies be created that may readily recur one year hence, shall the incoming conductor see fit? Amalgamation of new material takes time; will the orchestra at the end of Dr. Muck's service be improved by the substitution of even better players perhaps at one-seventh or one-sixth of the desks?

Second, the effect on the men of a loose tenure of office is of the very worst. The feeling that a slip, or even several slips, may cause discharge, creates a nervous condition conducive to the making of those slips. No one wishes to introduce the life tenure said to obtain in Germany, but some middle ground giving reasonable assurance of continuance in office may be found. The falling-off in skill of the players under this strain occasionally works great hardship in our orchestra. The members deserve special consideration owing to the difficulty in obtaining new positions. Having resigned from the Musical Union, they must seek readmittance, which is at best problematical and accompanied by a severe fine.

The very pension fund is endangered. If ten years' service (as I understand) is required, what reason is there for enthusiasm in playing, and rehearsing for two or three extra concerts, when any one of the players may at any time find himself out of the organization and all its benefits? It is sincerely to be wished that the rumor is false and that the men whose loyalty and endeavor are undoubted may find assurance and stability in office.

CHARLES PEABODY

Cambridge, April 29.

[The facts in the case are briefly these: The players of the Symphony Orchestra are engaged under contracts of varying length, without understanding of any kind as to their renewal. At the end of the current musical year several of the expiring contracts will not be renewed, but the number is considerably less than fifteen. The sole reason for this action is want of due efficiency on the part of the men affected. Of that efficiency in a body of ninety-five men, someone must be the final judge and authority, and that one in an orchestra, organized as is ours, is necessarily the conductor. No one knows so well as he by daily and intimate knowledge the capacity of his men for the work in hand and the spirit in which they approach it. No one is so directly responsible for the [illegible] nance and the raising of its standard of proficiency. If he believes that certain of his men are inefficient, when other men can be found to take their places and acts accordingly, there can be no appeal from his decision. If he were to be swayed by the preferences of one or another of his hearers, by personal considerations or by sentimental sympathies, there would be an end to the discipline and decision necessary to the control of such an organization as the Symphony Orchestra. High as its rank is, it may still be possible to make it better, and no orchestra can stand still, however painful personally changes in it may be. The conductor in such matters acts like the head of any other organization in business or in the professions, who is responsible for its efficiency and sets that efficiency above every other consideration. As for the Pension Fund, the ordering of it from the first has been in the hands of the men. Retiring players receive its benefits, if under its rules they are entitled to them, or else their own contributions to the fund.]

The Boston Post
MAY 4, 1907

HESS PLANS A VACATION

Concert Master Will Tour Europe With His Family and Some of His Pupils

Professor Willy Hess talked with a Post reporter last night concerning his plans for the coming year.

He is to sail on the Blucher of the Hamburg-American line for Berlin. He will then travel, with Mrs. Hess, through Europe, eventually settling in one of the large cities, his choice depending largely on the selection of a satisfactory vocal teacher for his daughter. A number of the professor's American pupils will follow him for purposes of study.

He is at present considering the offer of a New York manager, and may decide to tour the States for a series of 30 or 40 concerts next winter, beginning in December.

"Is there any truth, professor, in the report that your request for leave was the result of a disagreement with the powers that be?" was asked.

"Most emphatically no," answered he. "Conditions have been as satisfactory and friendly as they could possibly be. I have asked for leave solely because of the fact that I have taken part in 160 orchestral concerts, besides those of my quartet, and my various appearances as soloist. My time has been so fully occupied with these and constant teaching that I require an absolute rest, which to me means travelling in Europe for the present, and appearances as a soloist, possibly in America as well as Europe, during the following winter. I shall return the season after next ready to continue my labors. At present I look forward to a change and relaxation from the high pressure at which I have worked since my arrival in this country."

BOSTON JOURNAL
MAY 4, 1907.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
CONDUCTOR
"POP" CONCERTS.

THE "POP" CONCERTS.

The twenty-second season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will begin next Monday evening and will continue every week night until June 29. This year, therefore, they will last but eight weeks, instead of the usual nine, the regular season of the Symphony Orchestra having been lengthened one week. The conductorship this year, as last, will fall to Timothee Adamowski, Max Zach and Gustav Strube, each of these gentlemen having a third of the season in the order named. The orchestra will consist of fifty-five men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program for Monday night is: March, "Parade" (first time), Richard Strauss; waltz, "Mon Reve," Waldteufel; selection, "Grand Mogul," Luders; overture, "Semiramide" (first time), Rossini; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner; selection, "Madam Butterfly" (first time), Puccini; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky: Suite No. 1, "Carmen" (first time), Bizet-Hoffmann; overture, "Fledermaus," J. Strauss; waltz, "Jolly Widow" (first time), Franz Lahar; selection, "Mlle. Modiste," Herbert; march, "Mattchiche," Borel-Clerc.

[184]

BOSTON POST, FRIDAY, MAY 3, 1907

DR. KARL MUCK, ON EVE OF DEPARTURE FOR EUROPE, PAYS HIGH TRIBUTE TO SYMPHONY

(Photo by Post artist.)
Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, who are going abroad for the season

Dr. Carl Muck emerged from a strenuous orchestral rehearsal, his eyes flashing, every line of the face and tense, wiry figure aglow with nervous energy, and spoke with a Post reporter yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

"The season I have spent here, and the results of my work," said Dr. Muck, "have been exceedingly gratifying to me. The American public I have found to be an enthusiastic and intelligently receptive one. Of your orchestra I only say that there are but two in Europe capable of comparing with it—the Royal Orchestra of Berlin and the institution of the same name at Vienna."

"And has Mrs. Muck found conditions here to be equally satisfactory?"

"Ausgezeignet!" and the eloquent look which accompanied the word spoke volumes.

It may here be said that in the annals of Symphony Hall there have been few such satisfactory seasons as the past one. The relations between conductor and players have been of the warmest and most cordial description, and there is the utmost harmony between all parties concerned.

Dr. Muck leaves this city on the 10th of the month, proceeding directly to Berlin, where he will conduct performances at the Berlin opera until the close of the season there June 20. From Berlin he will retire to his "palace" at Dobelbad bei Graz, in Styria, to rest from his labors, and to recuperate for the work of next winter.

Boston Herald

May 5, 1907.

THE POP CONCERTS.

The 22d season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will begin tomorrow evening and the concerts will be given every week night until June 29. This year they will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, for the regular season of the Symphony Orchestra was lengthened one week. The conductors will be Messrs. Timothee Adamowski, Maz Zach and Gustav Strube. The orchestra will consist of 55 men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the "Pop" concerts were removed from Music Hall to Symphony Hall, there was a decided falling off in the attendance. Symphony Hall seemed far out of the way. In the last two or three seasons, however, patronage has steadily increased and last year was the best since the days of the old Music Hall; in fact, the attendance equalled all but the most prosperous years down town. This year is expected to be even better, if only for the reason that the public is becoming used to going up town for its summer music.

Mr. Adamowski, the first conductor of the "Pops," has spent not a little time this past winter in search of novelties. Victor Herbert, for example, will be represented by selections from "The Red Mill" and "The Magic Knight," and Gustav Luders by his "The Grand Mogul." It will be strange to see the name of Richard Strauss on such a programme, but when the composer was younger he wrote a military march which will be played. Other novelties will be as follows:

Bizet, Suites Nos. 1 and 2; Puccini, selections from "Madame Butterfly" and "Tosca"; Taven, fantasia "Coppella," "Manon," "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame"; Acerbi, "Dall' Italia"; Mascheroni, "Dans les fleurs"; Morena, "Kinkerlitzchen"; Fuscik, "Entrance of Gladiators"; Hoffman, "suite Nuptiale"; Glikh, "Lustspiel Overture"; Fleuron, "La Charmeuse"; Fuscik, "Under the Admiral's Flag"; Nevin, "A Day in Venice"; Ziehrer, waltz, "Sammt und Seide"; Lehar, "Cupido Waltz"; Lincke, "Verschmahte Liebe" and "Nachfalter" waltzes; Eugene, "Cupid's Garden"; Laume, "Les Marionettes"; Ganne, "Marche-Tartare."

The programme for the first concert will be:

1 March, "Parade" (first time).....Strauss
2 Waltz, "Mon Reve".....Waldteufel
3 Selection, "Grand Mogul" (first time) Luders
4 Overture, "Semiramide".....Rossini
5 March, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
6 Selection, "Madame Butterfly" (first tome).....Puccini
7 Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
8 Suite No. 1, "Carmen" (first time) Bizet-Hoffmann
9 Overture, "Fledermaus".....J. Strauss
10 Waltz, "Jolly Widow" (first time) Franz Lehar
11 Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
12 March, "Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

MAY 5, 1907.

GIVE GODSPEED TO SYMPHONY HEAD

Last Night's Concert Was the 24th and Last of the 26th Season.

BEETHOVEN'S MIGHTY DIRGE MOVES AUDIENCE

Music of Battle, Murder and Sudden Death Feature of Programme.

BY PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." Volkmann
Symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns" Liszt
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven

The Herald discusses elsewhere in this issue the programmes arranged by Dr. Muck during the season.

Was the thought of heroism and of battle, murder and sudden death in the conductor's mind when he arranged the programme of last night? First we have Richard III., the Richard of Shakespeare and Colley Cibber, the bogy man as impersonated by Kean, Kirby—"Wake me up when Kirby dies!"—and Barry Sullivan, not the monarch whitewashed by the latest historians and by the most recent biographer, Sir Clements R. Markham, the philanthropic ruler who lived happily with the Lady Anne and would not have murdered the princes in the Tower for crown on crown and untold gold. There is the Battle of Bosworth Field, the singularly anachronistic tune, "The Campbells are Comin'," the thought of Richard shouting wildly for another horse.

And lo! immediately another battle scene, the music of Liszt to translate the legendary fight pictured by von Kaulbach into tones. There are ghosts of Richard's victims in Volkmann's overture; there are ghosts of Huns who arise to the combat in Liszt's symphonic poem. If the English soldiers arrayed against the tyrant are typified by a Scottish tune, called by Volkmann an old English war song, the Christians as opposed to the Huns are typified by the church melody of "Crux fidelis."

A Hymn of Triumph.

In overture and in symphonic poem the ending is a hymn of triumph and exultation. Righteousness has prevailed.

And after these works came a frankly heroic symphony, though to some the symphony is not so heroic in character as the fifth. Here the hero is borne to the grave, and what is supposed to happen in the finale, with its variations Beethoven only knew.

Volkmann's overture was never fully appreciated here until we heard Smetana's symphonic poem with Richard as the hero. The subject impressed the Bohemian deeply, but at the time Smetana was not a master of expression. Volkmann, unlike Smetana, gave no programme with his overture, and the few commentators quarrel among themselves about the significance of certain themes. The composer wrote his overture and incidental music for the theatre. "For Shakespeare's tragedy" is clew enough. If you find Rubinstein's "Iwan the Terrible" on a concert programme, you know at once what you have a right to expect, a suggestion of cruelty, horror, suffering; and in this instance you, hearing, are tortured in turn.

Liszt, as was generally his habit, talked and wrote much about "The Battle of the Huns" before it was performed, and even before it was completed. He said it would be no "guitar piece," and he evidently thought well of it. But unless Dr. Muck had set his heart on a row of heroic, battle pieces—he might have added Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture—it might have been a pleasure to hear still more familiar symphonic poems by Liszt, or those that have not been played here. In the former case, "Tasso" or "Mazeppa"; in the latter, "Hamlet." (By the way, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" is unknown to the Symphony audience.) How many have heard Liszt's "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" and "Heroide Funebre"? The "Hungaria" has been played here only once, I believe, and the inadequate performance was nearly 16 years ago.

Cause for Rejoicing.

Beethoven said nothing about the programme of his "Eroica." There is a story that the title page of the manuscript bore the word "Bonaparte" and that when the death of Napoleon at St. Helena was announced the composer remarked grimly that he had foreseen the catastrophe when he wrote the funeral march in the symphony. Does Dr. Muck accept the theory of Wagner; that the hero in this symphony is "the whole, the full-fledged man"? The music remains the same, whatever the explanation may be. As Dr. Muck began the season with a symphony by Beethoven, so he ended it.

Let us rejoice that in the programme, however singular it may have seemed to some, there was no attempt at a spectacular close with the full strength of the company and a grand pyrotechnical display. Let us also be thankful that there was no "sadness of farewell"; for Dr. Muck will return to us in the fall.

A man of the opera house, he undoubtedly chose the pieces by Volkmann and Liszt for the dramatic effects he finds in them. It is not necessary to hold that a conductor of the rare force and intelligence which characterize Dr. Muck believes in the plenary inspiration of every work he chooses for performance. Volkmann was a man of the utmost sincerity, but he was seldom inspired. And how about Liszt? Did he always believe in his own inspiration? Was he sincere in the works which were suggested to him by religious subjects?

Read the interminable letters he wrote to his princess and you would infer that his sole thought in life was concerning the good of the church and his own salvation. Was he honest in all this? Probably at the time he wrote, for he was a sentimentalist as well as a mighty influence, a man of indisputable genius, which is sometimes shown even in his musical compositions.

All these questions in been suggested by the p
The performance, th justified the programme
overture has aged, and t picturesque in it when it was is now as common-place as by a naturally inferior man.
that the workmanship is routine way does not save scene. Only the suggestions what might be called the psy portions are of importance
Dr. Muck's interpretation
symphonic poem gave a ch
the work that has been misse mer occasions. The poem episodic and of a higher
There was no need of program any one who had seen von Kaulb picture. There were the opp forces and the final triumph
Cross. Romantic in itself, the was read romantically.

Was Vivid and Virile.

The performance of the "Eroica" must be ranked among the great performances of the season. It was one of uncommon and sustained eloquence. It was virile and vivid throughout. In treatment of detail and in general breadth and sweep. There was no forced intrusion of the conductor's individuality. The hearer was conscious of Beethoven's mighty voice, which came direct and not as through a ventriloquist. Grandeur and tenderness, nobility of lamentation, titanic assertiveness and mirth, these made their irresistible way. Nothing stood between the composer and the hearer.

Thus ended a most interesting and brilliant orchestral season, a season that will be memorable in the history of the organization, a season conspicuous, not by reason of the assisting singers or players, but first of all by the performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck.

That the audience appreciated his ability and his work was shown by the prolonged welcome at the beginning of the concert and the hearty God-speed at the end. May he return to us refreshed and in high spirits for the 27th season!

[185]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1907

DR. MUCK'S FIRST YEAR

HIS PROGRESS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Obstacles at the Beginning—The Quickness and the Openness of Mind with Which the Conductor Has Come to Know His Men, His Public and the Traditions of the Orchestra—The Gradual Influence of This Knowledge Upon His Programmes—The Appeal of His Personal Traits—The Qualities of His Conducting as the Year Has Ripened It—The Maintaining and the Broadening of the Standards of the Orchestra

Nearly seven months ago on a Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conducted before his first American audience. It received him cordially; it watched him with eager curiosity; it listened to his reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony intently; and it departed well pleased with the first new conductor the orchestra had had in seven years and warm in anticipation of the future. Yesterday, at the last afternoon concert of the musical year, and with Beethoven's third symphony, Dr. Muck took leave, until next October, of the same audience. It applauded him warmly when he came first to the stage; it listened with an attentive animation, that neither the end of the season nor the familiarty of the programme had dulled; and at the close of the concert, it remained in its place until it had twice recalled him very heartily. By every sign that an audience might give, the anticipations of last autumn had been fulfilled, and Dr. Muck stood firmly established with half his public here. The other half, at the concert of tonight, is as sure to testify to its liking and appreciation. Thus Dr. Muck has won his place more quickly and surely than there was reason to expect last October, and in the face of considerable obstacles.

Like all the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, except Mr. Henschel, Dr. Muck came to a public to whom he was practically unknown and of whom he himself was no better informed. Like them, too, he came with more reputation as a conductor of opera than of orchestral concerts. Outside short journeys in Europe, he had made his career wholly in Germany and practically as one of the conductors at the Opera House in Berlin. In Germany he was of established rank; elsewhere in Europe he was known and esteemed; but in Boston and in New York, except to a few informed connoisseurs, he was barely a name. Orchestral concerts, moreover, had been only incidents in his work, and in them he had followed the rather rigid rules and customs of musical Germany. Report, however unjustly, represented him as a classicist and a conservative, disliking most of the music that had been written since the death of Wagner, and making no secret of his distaste. Noted operatic conductor though he was, rumor also denied him warmth of temperament and elasticity of style. On the other hand, Dr. Muck himself was coming to an orchestra of which he knew only the prestige and to a public of whom he knew still less—a public accustomed to very catholic programmes and to the frequent hearing, in particular, of ultra-modern music. He was, moreover, succeeding a conductor who in his thirteen years of service had made the Symphony Orchestra one of the finest instruments of its kind in the world; who had established it and its public in certain traditions, and whom especially in the broadening of his later years his audiences warmly cherished.

From the very start Dr. Muck has proved his alert intelligence and openness of mind. More quickly than any of his predecessors he has come to know his men, his audiences and the enduring traditions of the Symphony concerts. Almost from the beginning his men have respected and liked him. He has exacted much and sedulous work from them, but he has exacted more from himself. He was a conductor, as they speedily discovered, who knew more of the technic and the possibilities of the different instruments of the orchestra than did any of his predecessors. On occasion he has instructed the brasses in the capabilities of their instruments as though he himself had played them. Or he has summoned a single choir, like the strings or the woodwinds, to rehearsal by itself and surprised the men by his knowledge of its resources. He has maintained discipline and enforced authority, but he has been neither querulous nor fussy. No conductor could be quicker than he to bid his men share in any unusually warm applause after mutual conquest of many difficulties. At moments, as in the playing of some of the classic symphonies, he has even left the orchestra to itself. He has asked of his men the same alacrity of spirit and the same pursuit of perfection that he has brought to his own work. He has come to know not merely their skill, but their temper and idiosyncrasies, and he has judged them accordingly, with friendliness, but also with justice and with regard for work and for the standards of the orchestra above all else. In a season, by this use of one instinctive capacity that goes to the making of a conductor, he knows his men.

In the same way and with the same quickness and breadth of intelligence Dr. Muck has come to know his public and the traditions of the Symphony concerts. For a month or two at the start, he and it were practically discovering each other, while he also had to learn and measure his forces. As any conductor would do under like circumstances, he confined himself to familiar pieces and often to the older classics. As any conductor of his antecedents would do, he shaped his programmes at first on the rather stiff and narrow German model. Through December and beyond, the more impatient of the audiences doubted and feared. Were we to move in a round of established classics, mainly German? Were they to move in a weekly order of overture, concerto, symphony or the reverse? Were we to hear no new music, no French, no American, no ultra-modern music and so forth and so on? Little by little, especially through the second half of the season these alarms have vanished. As soon as Dr. Muck had mastered his forces, grasped the traditions of the concerts, and understood the long musical training, catholicity and curiosity of his public, and the varied likings that it represents, he has discreetly adjusted them all. The tone-poem and the miscellaneous piece have regained their established place. New or unheard music has come to performance, and for the most part justified itself either by its intrinsic interest or by the prestige of its composer. Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Debussy's "The Sea" have been played for the first times. Reger has found a place on the programmes. Our audiences have practically discovered Sibelius with interest and pleasure. Bruckner has been made known afresh to them. The music of the Scandinavian symphonists has had unusually ample hearing. American composers from Paine to Hadley have not been neglected. The list of the classics runs from Bach to Wagner with few missing names. Except the new Englishmen, there is hardly a group of composers unrepresented in the final enumeration of eighty-six pieces.

Thus has Dr. Muck broadened his point of view and assimilated the desires of his public as he has gradually learned them. In one respect, however, his programmes have been thoroughly his own. He believed at the start, he still seems to believe, in the "unified" programme—that is a programme that contains music of a similar mood and spirit; that belongs to a single epoch; or that represents a single group of composers. There is much to be said for such unity of design. There is something to be said against the lack of contrast and variety by which this unity may weaken or dull a single programme. The American tradition from Theodore Thomas through Mr. Gericke has been that of more diversified programmes, in which the several "numbers" were as foils to each other and as spurs to the varying interests of the listeners. In this respect Dr. Muck has chosen his own "unified" way and oftenest followed it. His public, according to its tastes, has liked, or in almost equal numbers frankly disliked it.

Long before the audiences at Symphony Hall could fairly estimate Dr. Muck's worth as a conductor, they found him interesting as a man. Some conductors cultivate a romantic aspect like that of heroes of "musical" novels; others would display a dishevelled energy; others still have advanced to their work as to a solemn ceremonial; while yet others have courted the slightest whiff of applause. Week after week his public has seen Dr. Muck come unobtrusively to his place and leave it as unobtrusively, hesitating even to acknowledge applause unless it were plainly warm and insistent. His aspect and bearing have been those of a cultivated, finely bred and finely poised man of the world, who esteems its conventions neither too highly nor too lightly. To see, he has suggested the absorbed and eager, more than the musician. No idiosyncrasy or trick of the concert-room has tarnished the quiet aristocracy of his bearing. The least of his desires has been to ask attention to himself. In his absorption in his work he has seemed to forget his audience. His beat, with all its precision and nervous vitality, and his gestures, with all their clear suggestion of rhythmic and tonal shadings, have been steadily of an unostentatious authority. Yet from the first concert of last October, many in his audiences have felt the charm, the distinction and the fine individuality of the man, and nearly all have found in him the intangible qualities that make a personality interesting and not commonplace. Every able and individual conductor must have a force of personality that sways his men. A few of them have also a similar fascinating force for their audience, and it the more potent when the conductor himself seems unconscious of it. It is a legitimate attribute, and to many of his hearers it dwells in Dr. Muck.

From these traits of the man have sprung some of the qualities of the conductor. It is the high and fine tradition of our orchestra that the conductor must subordinate all else to his work. He must not spare himself or his men. Whatever his mood, he must subdue it to its task. Whatever his own liking for particular music, he must give to it the utmost of his powers. He may miss neither the large effect nor the significant detail. He must work as one who courts perfection as a mistress and as an ideal. Steadfastly Dr. Muck has maintained and strengthened this tradition. His industry in study of scores, in the preparation of parts for the players, and in actual rehearsal has been zealous and unflagging. He has frankly told his friends that through the season he had little time for aught but work. He has come as tirelessly and with as little heed of the mood of the moment to the weekly and (on the journeys to other cities) to the daily, concerts. Upon music that he little esteems, like Strauss's "Domestica," or Debussy's sea-pieces, he has lavished the largest and the finest of his powers, striving at each repetition to disclose more clearly and intensely every significant quality it may contain.

Another tradition, another necessity indeed, requires the maintenance of a very high technical standard in the orchestra. One of its glories is the technical resources and the technical felicity of its men. From their virtuosity spring the mellowness, transparency and vibrancy of tone, the balance and euphony, the range of shading, the fine precision that have long been distinguishing traits of our orchestra. Mr. Gericke's unusual and exquisite fineness of ear and sensitiveness to tonal adjustments steadily fostered them. On the whole, Dr. Muck has maintained these qualities, but hardly heightened them. There have been occasions, indeed, when the perfect euphony has seemed a little to wane, when the precision has been a little less absolute and the mellowness a little roughened. But in the next concert the familiar perfections have returned, and almost from the beginning Dr. Muck has added others to them. The mellow tone has become more elastic, and gained time and again a larger sonority. The orchestra has learned a new incisiveness of accent alike in the isolated phrase and the long progression. It can be at need more "songful," more declamatory, more piquant to the ear, more potent to the imagination. In a word, Dr. Muck has infused into it a fresh vitality, and out of that vitality have come a new suppleness and fire. Its technical and executive qualities are distinctly more alive.

Again, from Dr. Muck's personal qualities may come his fine objectiveness as a conductor. Some of his brethren seem to begin in their hearts with congratulations to the composer that he and his music are to be the means through which they will "interpret" themselves. They can leave no passage unmarked with some token of their insight, and not a measure escapes their preternatural sense of "inner meanings." Two or three minutes of unmodified pace, unvaried rhythm or steady accent vex them. Thus do they contrive and establish their "individual" readings. Dr. Muck, in contrast, has sought only to give the music before him its fullest and most characteristic voice. He has kept himself steadily the unobtrusive medium of its utterance. He has sought to serve the composer and no other, and to serve him in the composer's own way.

There is a kind of routine objective[illegible] that takes all things, with detache[illegible]ainess, for what they are on t[illegible]surface. Dr. Muck's is of a finer pe[illegible]ation and discrimination. A symphony [illegible] Mozart has its characteristic manner, accent, flow—the qualities that make it Mozartean and of its time. A symphony by Beethoven or Brahms has its peculiar and distinguishing eloquence. A symphony by Tschaikovski or Sibelius speaks in yet other tones; and a "poem" by Strauss or a "sketch" by Debussy runs almost in a musical dialect of its own. Dr. Muck's objectiveness first discovers, then differentiates, and finally heightens, these characteristic traits. He does not merely give the music an unforced voice, but he gives it the peculiar voice with which the composer seems to speak in the score. The range, the sensitiveness and the discrimination of Dr. Muck's objectiveness are its distinctions. Never, moreover, has his continence been the continence of listlessness. If he has let the music flow placidly in some of the older pieces it is because they plainly demanded it, and always that flow has been undulating. When the composer has asked elasticity, incisiveness, contrast, vividness, Dr. Muck has been as quick to understand and achieve his purpose. With the classic symphonies in particular, the crown of his objectiveness has been its vitalizing quality. Whatever music he has played, he has given it propulsive and communicating power.

By its results we listeners know unmistakably this power. "Vera incessu patuit Dea." It is the sign of the born and made conductor, but like most such results, it is singularly baffling of analysis. Perhaps, with Dr. Muck, the secrets of it are four. In him surely are those qualities of musical intellect, so to say, that enable him to grasp the structure, the design, the architectural and proportioning qualities of a symphony, an overture or a tone-poem. He has a very keen sense of the form, the organic development, the gradual evolution from and within itself of a composition. He apprehends equally its large contours and significant details. By the same musical intellect he grasps the melody which is the thought and the fibre of the music. Thereby he enters into its very spirit and substance, and finds the pace that most truly and significantly imparts them. Equally in Dr. Muck is the power of musical temperament and imagination that keeps melodic lines undulating, stirs rhythms, rounds phrases and gives to all that it touches the songful quality that has been one of the distinctions of his conducting. Then may enter, perhaps, the element of responsive poetic and dramatic imagination—the discovering and sympathizing, the discriminating and communicating, power by which Dr. Muck has given to almost all the music that he has played a characteristic and intense eloquence and a pervading and individual atmosphere. A suite by Bach, an overture by Brahms, a symphony by Tschaikovski or a tone-poem by Strauss, each in its kind has "sounded" with poetry or beauty, with significance or power. And last there is in Dr. Muck the sense of the instinctive and practised conductor, and especially of the able operatic conductor, for just effect upon the ears and the imaginations of his hearers. Almost from the beginning he has proved his feeling for the incisive phrase, the searching instrumental voice or contrast, the heightened or the insinuating emphasis, the long sweep and the final break of climax. These are the qualities of a conductor who first imagines and then orders his imaginings, and whose largest power still leaves a sense of power controlled. It is this blending of many traits in Dr. Muck and the excess of none that has made him so satisfying a conductor for the purposes of our forty-eight concerts and the range of music they must traverse. He has met to the full the first necessity of them—to wear well and ripen in the wearing.

H. T. P.

The "Pops"

On Monday evening, a week later than usual, the twenty-second series of "Pop" concerts begins at Symphony Hall. They will continue each evening, except Sundays, from eight o'clock until eleven, through Saturday, June 29, and the arrangements are practically those of previous years. Fifty-five men from the Symphony Orchestra will make the band, and Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Zach and Mr. Strube of the orchestra will conduct, each for a third of the series. Tables will replace the seats on the floor; smoking will be permitted there, and drinks of both kinds and eatables will be served. In the first balcony seats can be reserved, while the second is open for general admission. Practically the only change will be a general freshening of the programmes, an effort to put more new and light music in the list, and to quicken the spirit of the performances. Selections from Puccini's operas, for example, and from the newest musical pieces of the theatres, are to be played, and Mr. Adamowski, who is to conduct the first third of the series, has made a diligent search of the programmes of similar concerts on the Continent for music that has not been heard at the "Pops," even to an early military march by Richard Strauss. He has found and chosen:

Puccini: Selections, "Madame Butterfly," "Tosca."
Herbert: Selections, "The Magic Knight," "The Red Mill."
Luders: Selections, "The Grand Mogul."
Tavan. Fantasia from "Coppelia" (Délibes), "Manon" (Massenet), "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" (Masscnet).
Acerbi: Dall' Italia.
Mascheroni: Dans les fleurs.
Morena: Kinkerlitzchen.
Fucik: Einzug der Gladiotoren, Unter der Admirals-flagge.
Hoffman: Suite Nuptiale.
Glikh: Lustspiel Overture.
Fleuron: La Charmeuse.
Richard Strauss: Parade March.
Nevin: A Day in Venice.
Ziehrer: Waltz, "Sammt und Seide."
Lehar: "Cupido" Waltz.
Lincke: "Verschmähte Liebe" Waltz, "Nachtfalter" Waltz.
Eugene: Cupid's Garden
Laume: Les Marionettes
Ganne: Marche Tartare.

For the first concert on Monday, the programme, with an unusual array of new pieces, is:

March, "Parade".....Richard Strauss
Waltz, "Mon Reve".....Wauldteufel
Selection, "Grand Mogul".....Luders
Overture, "Semiramide".....Rossini
March, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikovski
Suite, from "Carmen".....Bizet-Hoffman
Overture, "Fledermaus".....J. Strauss
Waltz, "Jolly Widow".....Lehar
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
March, "Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
MAY 7, 1907

FIRST OF 'POP" CONCERTS

Every Available Table Seat Occupied and Galleries Crowded—Programme Received With Enthusiasm.

Spring may be backward, but not so the people for whom the opening of the season of "Pop" concerts is fixed by the management of the Symphony Orchestra, for the first "Pop" of 1907 was given last night at Symphonty Hall before an audience that filled the galleries and occupied about every available table seat.

And it was an enthusiastic gathering of people that were ready to believe that the snow-shovels were really put away for a time, and that the almanac had recovered from its brainstorm. In short that the time had arrived to enjoy popular music and beer, if not strictly al fresco, at least under circumstances that bred thoughts of the briny deep, the clear mountain air soon to be realities rather than dreams.

And it was a decidedly popular programme, as witness:—

March, "Parade".....Richard Strauss
Waltz, "Mon Reve".....Wauldteufel
Selection, "Grand Mogul".....Luders
Overture, "Semiramide".....Rossini
March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Selection, "Madame Butterfly".....Puccini
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikovski
Suite, from "Carmen".....Bizet-Hoffman
Overture, "Fledermaus".....J. Strauss
Waltz, "Jolly Widow".....Lehar
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
March, "Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

The opening number was new to most, few seeming to realize that Richard Strauss has "dropped into" popular marches. The other "new" numbers, including the noisy "1812" overture, were welcomed as more or less familiar friends.

Mr. Adamoski, who conducts for the first third of the season, was given a hearty greeting and responded kindly to some of the requested encores.

All in all it was a fitting opening of the now time honored institution and gave promise of a most successful series of entertainments.

[186]

THE SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, MAY 5, 1907.

Fewer Soloists Than Usual at the Symphony Concerts; "Erminie" in Jordan Hall; the "Pops" Commence Again.

BY PHILIP HALE.

THE season of 1906-07, which was brought to a close by the Symphony concert last night, was a distinguished one in certain ways.

The Symphony orchestra played under a new conductor; another orchestra was established here; Mr. Lang, the conductor of the Cecilia Society from its foundation, laid down the baton.

Foreign composers visited us. Mr. Leoncavallo came first with a queer orchestra and a still queerer assortment of Italian singers. He behaved in a dignified manner and took his music seriously, even when he was conducting the overture to "Roland of Berlin." A brave man, too, for he did not turn a hair during the performance of the grand septet from "I Medici."

Mr. Camille Saint-Saens, who was used by the critics in New York as a club to lambast his countrymen of the ultra-modern school, beamed on us and played three of his own waltzes in rapid succession; but even his Canary waltz did not console us for a programme which did not include any one of his symphonic poems.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor came and did not conduct any one of his choral works at a Cecilia concert. His chamber music did not turn from the error of their ways those who do not believe that the American music of the future must be based on Negro, Indian and Creole tunes.

The Handel and Haydn performed Handel's "Belshazzar" for the first time, it is said, in America. After the performance this statement was readily believed by some, who forgot that "David," by the Chevalier Neukomm, was once a favorite oratorio in Boston.

The Cecilia performed for the first time in this city Pierne's "Children's Crusade" and an abridged version of Paine's "Azara."

The end of the season saw the death of the Choral Art Society, for its leader, Mr. Goodrich, is now the conductor of the Cecilia.

There were visiting prima donnas, who gave song recitals and concerts: Mmes. Melba, Sembrich, Eames, Gadski, and Schumann-Heink. Mme. Melba shone resplendent. Nor should Mme. Nordica be forgotten, who gave one of the most entertaining vaudeville shows ever seen in the town.

Pianists visited us for the first time; Mme. Goodson, who came prudently provided with letters to patrons and patronesses of art; Miss Schnitzer, who brought no letters and revealed a surprisingly developed mechanism and a poetic, fiery, imaginative soul; Dr. Neitzel, a scholarly critic with a pretty wit.

Mr. Macmillen of Marietta played the violin and showed that the reports of his proficiency which were published in the London journals were not wholly incredible. Mr. Hartmann, known here some years ago as a child wonder and then as a student, returned a well equipped virtuoso.

"Madam Butterfly" was performed here (in English) for the first time by Mr. Savage's company and later (in Italian) by the Metropolitan Opera House Company. "Hansel and Gretel" was performed here for the first time in an adequate manner and in German. Mr. Converse's music to "Jeanne d'Arc" was heard in connection with Mr. Mackaye's play.

The week of grand opera vouchsafed to us by Mr. Conried was made conspicuous chiefly by the impersonations of Miss Geraldine Farrar, the vocal wealth of Mr. Caruso, the pluck and intelligence of Mme. Jacoby, the general excellence of the performances of "Madam Butterfly" and "Tosca," and the unspeakably poor performance of "Martha," which was after all a worthy response to the "wishes of prominent subscribers," who insisted on hearing again the "delightful old tunes."

There were excellent chamber concerts, and the announcement was made that in future there will be no Boston symphony quartet, no quartet supported directly by the Boston symphony orchestra.

But the true feature of the season was the performance for the first time in this city of Debussy's "Sea," the symphony and violin concerto of Sibelius—the superb performance of the concerto by Maud Powell is naturally included—and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Performances of familiar orchestral works as led by Dr. Muck were also memorable.

The True Features.

For greater than virtuoso, operatic heroine, prima donna in song, orchestral conductor, is the work performed.

Dr. Muck brought out compositions that justly provoked the question: "Why did he do it?" Was there any good and sufficient reason for spending time and labor on the symphonies by Bendix and Brockway, and "Olaf's Wedding Dance" by Ritter?

There was good reason for producing Reger's Serenade. The man is much discussed; he has hysterical followers and bitter foes. It was only fair to the composer and to the audience that his music should be heard. The "Polyeucte" music of Tinel will in all probability not be played here again, but Tinel was already known as the composer of the oratorio "Franciscus," and there might have been curiosity to become acquainted with his chief orchestral work.

No doubt there are many who did not like the compositions by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss, which have been named above. No doubt there are many who were bored by them. This was natural and to be expected. Music of this radical nature must inevitably provoke stormy opposition. The ultra-moderns are sharing the fate of Monteverde, Gluck, Beethoven, Berlioz, Schumann, Verdi, Wagner, Franck, Brahms, Tschaikowsky.

I do not say that the works by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss are immortal or that they will be as impressive 100 years hence as they are today, for there is nothing more uncertain and also more laughable than prophecy in matters of art. The gaunt and terrible old man smiles at the prophet and with a stroke of his scythe cuts him down together with those for whom the prophet had already shaped pedestals. I do say that this music should be heard under the best possible conditions; that it should be judged not in comparison with music by Beethoven or Brahms, not with music by Bach and Schumann, but by itself or in comparison with music of those contemporary in thought as in life. For there are composers who are even now publishing though they are dead.

Unless there be fierce discussion over art, that art is commercial, hypocritical or stagnant, and there is no judgment in the hearer.

Every phase of development in music should be as interesting as any phase of development in chemistry, electricity, surgery. Does any one believe for a moment that form in music was established long ago, rigidly and forever? Does any one believe that a melodic thought must always have an orthodox contour; that an experimenter in harmonic schemes is necessarily a dangerous person; that a new colorist is a blasphemer; that the impressionist in music should be led to the stake?

No one, on the other hand, is so foolish as to insist that the newcomers should drive out the classics who in their own day were revolutionaries. Can there not be evolution in music, in musical taste? Should we all be obliged to grovel in the dust before the shrine of the sonata form?

Dr. Muck's Programmes.

It is a good thing also that the programmes arranged by Dr. Muck have excited debate.

The Herald has often discussed the question of programme-making, and it does not now purpose to inquire curiously into this art.

If any one without prejudice should look over Dr. Muck's programmes of last season, he would be struck first of all by the catholicity of the man. The classics, old and new, the romanticists from Bach to Debussy, were impartially represented. Dr. Muck has welcomed the Finn and the Frenchman, the Pole and the Norwegian. That most sensitive person, the American composer, has every reason to applaud this admirable conductor. Brockway, Chadwick, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Paine are the names of the Americans whose works were heard, and their music was rehearsed as diligently and performed with as much care as though they had all received foreign wreaths and diplomas.

However singular the arrangement of some of the programmes may have appeared, Dr. Muck had undoubtedly a purpose in the arrangement. One programme was classical; another was modern and romantic; one was of an almost strictly national character; another was a study in the development of the symphony. Probably the least ef... was the one in which Smetana follow... ak followed Smetana's "Ha... kowsky's "Pathetic" symphony as the final number. That two Bohemians were thus grouped with a Pole was unfortunate, for a similarity in tonal color brought monotony. Dr. Muck's dramatic insight and his imaginative faculty were never better displayed than when he placed Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" immediately after Chabrier's dazzling "Espana." There was no anti-climax; there was a contrast without a loss of intensity; neither composition suffered.

Timothee Adam...

Whether it be wise to introduce more than one important novelty in a concert is a question. It seems injudicious. A new work is perhaps more easily judged, its merits recognized, its faults disclosed, when the attention is not forced again on other music that is unfamiliar.

When Dr. Muck came here he was unacquainted with the history of Symphony concerts in this city, and the library of the orchestra. He had not been in the habit of arranging programmes for a series of 24 concerts in one season. It was natural that he should endeavor to ascertain in a measure the tastes of the symphony audience.

A programme-maker will never satisfy everybody. He is lucky if he will satisfy six in every ten hearers.

Dr. Muck has been thoroughly consistent in this: that the public should become acquainted with important modern works irrespective of his own likes and dislikes. He is not a Regerite, yet he produced the composer's serenade. Much of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is repugnant to him, yet he was eloquent in the interpretation of it.

Fewer Soloists.

The number of soloists in the Symphony concerts was smaller than usual. The singers were Mmes. Melba, Fremstad, Child. The violinists were Mme. Powell, Messrs. Adamowski, Hess, Petschnikoff. Mr. Wranke, the 'cellist, appeared and Mr. Ferir played the viola solo in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." The pianists were Mmes. Goodson, Samaroff, Szumowska and Messrs. Gabrilowitsch, Neitzel, Rosenthal.

The list might be made still smaller to advantage. Suppose that the concert master fiddles ex-officio. Why should it be the custom for other members of the orchestra to play annually? If a violinist is chosen, why should not a flutist, or an oboist, or even a trombone be a soloist?

An ideal symphony concert is without a soloist, unless that soloist play in ensemble, as the pianist in d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." Otherwise the individual assumes undue prominence, the programme is not balanced and effective, the musical continuity is disturbed or broken.

Unfortunately soloists are needed to secure subscriptions, for we have not reached the ideal state when a composition is more eagerly anticipated than a virtuoso. Twelve soloists a season should be enough, provided they be of the first rank.

SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 5, 1907.

Close of Symphony Season.

Last night's symphony concert, the 24th and final concert of the 26th season of this organization, wound up a year which has been one of delight so far as the conducting was concerned, which has seen 14 soloists—and an unusual number of people who live in Boston — an unusual number of new works presented, a well-chosen series of programs and more than the usual enthusiasm from the audiences. Altogether it has been a good year, and if at its end Boston loses Prof Willy Hess from the concert master's seat, it retains Dr Karl Muck on the conductor's platform, and so is to be congratulated.

Last night's program moved backward through the years, beginning with Robert Volkmann's overture to Shakspere's "Richard III," pausing to review Liszt's battle of the shades of Huns, grunting and clanging in the air above, and emerging finally into the clear air of the heroic symphony. Had the evening been long enough, it is conceivable that Palestrina might have been reached.

All three works were played with force and fire, the symphony being taken faster in every movement than conductors in Boston have been wont to do. It was well done; the work lost not a whit of dignity—except possibly in the funeral march, which had the air of perfunctoriness, as though the composer was not sorry for the death he was recording.

Liszt's symphonic poem (No. 11), "The Battle of the Huns," has been played here five times before last night by the symphony orchestra, since its first performance in 1885. Without the program notes, and with merely the title to help to its understanding, the work would be impressive, indeed, and indubitably the picture of a battle of savage foes, fighting desperately, and a triumph for what may be expressed by religious music; the story of Kaulbach's painting of the battling ghosts known, the music takes on a thrilling realism that even Liszt did not often attain.

The first number, Volkmann's description of the misshapen villain-hero of Shakspere, is as powerful in its own way. More modern in treatment than either of the other two works, it is still coherent and has unity of thought and expression; the picture is not violated by its contrasts.

Except for the sentimental reasons involved in closing the season with the "Eroica," the program might well have been reversed, or rather the symphony would have been well placed at the beginning, the more intense music after it.

The "Pop" Concerts.

The 22d season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony hall will begin tomorrow evening and the concerts will be given every weeknight until June 29. This year, therefore, they will last but eight weeks instead of the usual nine, the regular season of the Symphony orchestra having been lengthened one week. The conductorship this year, as last, will fall to Timothee Adamowski. Max-Zach and Gustav Strube, each of these gentlemen having a third of the season in the order named. The orchestra will consist of 55 men from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

As might have been expected, when the "Pop" concerts were removed from down town to Symphony hall, there was a decided falling off in the attendance. Symphony hall seemed far out of the way and it has taken some years for the public which patronizes the concerts to find its way regularly to the Back Bay district. In the last two or three seasons, however, patronage has steadily increased, and last year was by all odds the best the concerts have enjoyed since the days of the old Music hall; in fact, the attendance equaled all but the most prosperous years down town. This year is expected to be even better, if only for the reason that the public is becoming used to going up town for its summer music. The ultra formality which characterized the earlier seasons in Symphony hall has disappeared and the concerts are again truly popular.

Mr Adamowski, the first conductor of the "Pops," has spent not a little time this past winter in search of novelties. Victor Herbert, for example, will be represented by selections from his two latest successes, "The Red Mill" and "The Magic Knight," and Gustav Luders by his "The Grand Mogul." It will be strange to see the name of Richard Strauss on such a program, but when the composer was younger and less guileless he wrote a military march, which will be played.

The program for the first concert will be:

March, Parade (first time)	Richard Strauss
Waltz, Mon Reve	Waldteufel
Selection, Grand Mogul (first time)	Luders
Overture, Semiramide	Rossini
March, Tannhaeuser	Wagner
Selection, Madame Butterfly (first time)	Puccini
Overture 1812	Tschaikowsky
Suite No. 1 Carmen (first time)	Bizet-Hoffman
Overture, Fledermaus	J Strauss
Waltz, Jolly Widow (first time)	Franz Lehar
Selection, Mlle Modiste	Herbert
March, Marrchiche	Borel-Clerc

BOSTON JOURNAL—MAY 8, 1907.

ADAMOWSKI LEAVES THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Famous Violinist and Second Concert Meister Resigns to Devote Attention to the Adamowski Trio. Conductor of "Pops."

New York, May 7.—Changes in the constitution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra continue to be made. Timothee Adamowski, the second concert-meister, has resigned his post and will no longer be seen at the first desk of the first violins. Mr. Adamowski has been twenty-three years a member of the orchestra, which he joined soon after his debut in this country as a violin virtuoso. He has frequently appeared as a soloist at the concerts of the organization and has been warmly praised.

Mr. Adamowski retires from the orchestra to devote his entire time to the increasing engagements of the Adamowski trio. This organization consists of Mr. Adamowski as violinist, his brother Josef 'cellist, and the latter's wife, formerly Miss Szumowska, pianist. Mme. Adamowski is a pupil of Paderewski and her playing is much admired. The Adamowski trio will be heard in this city oftener in the future.

BOSTON GLOBE—MAY 7, 1907.

FOR THE 22D SEASON

Pop Concerts Open With a Breezy Program.

Audience of the Faithful Braves the Forbidding Weather.

It seemed hardly possible that this is the 22d season of the pop concerts in Boston, yet last night's program at the opening concert said so brazenly. It made some rub the backs of their heads and feel old, for there were many present who have attended every year from the beginning.

The weather was typical of the spring of 1907, but that didn't affect the attendance nor the costuming.

T. Adamowski, who has the early shift in the conductor's box, officiated last night. The program was as variegated as the costuming, but its general tone was a counter to the weather, for it began with the "Parade" march by Richard Strauss, played for the first time here, and contained the "Contes d'Hoffmann" serenade of Offenbach, selections from "Mlle Modiste," "Mme Butterfly," "Carmen" and "The Red Mill," the overture to "Semiramide" and "Fledermaus," the "Grouen-lighter" waltz and the "Mattchiche" march. All this says nothing of the Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," which the audience vainly tried to have repeated.

The audience did not especially well represent society, but many of the regulars came out, and every table on the floor was filled. There was a surprisingly well filled balcony, too, considering the weather, and even the second balcony had its population.

Mr Adamowski played everything at a good sharp tempo, with the utmost good nature and a willingness to repeat numbers which could be repeated, and altogether the 22d season started off with a pop that was exhilirating.

Tonight's program also contains several "first time" numbers. It is as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "Phedre"	Massenet
Waltz, "Velvet and Silk"	Ziehrer
(First time.)
Fantasia, "Manon"	Massenet
(First time.)
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Selection, "The Red Mill"	Herbert
(First time.)
Wedding March	Goldner-Hoffmann
(First time.)
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Waltz, "Morgenblatter"	Strauss
Selection, "It Happened in Nordland,"	Herbert
March, "Tartare"	Ganne
(First time.)

[187]

DAILY ADVERTISER.

MAY 6, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Volkmann. Overture, "Richard III."
Lisit. Symphonic Poem. "The Battle of the Huns."
Beethoven. Heroic Symphony.

Dr. Muck must have felt rather combative when he made up this programme. There were three battlefields in it, for the development of Beethoven's Symphony, first movement, is as much a battle as that of Bosworth Field, in which Richard dies to a Scotch tune written a century later than the fight. It was a very interesting programme and any soloist would have been an intruder in this earnest orchestral concert. The audience appreciated this, and recalled Dr. Muck, at the end of the concert, over and over again. At the beginning, also, there was a very decided ovation. The public have evidently varied Shakespeare ("Coriolanus") a trifle and regard our conductor as "The uncommon Muck of the World."

"Richard III." received a fine reading. It was a picturesque interpretation from first to last, and it was legitimate programme-music, for any intelligent auditor could follow the main incidents of the plot from the brooding, sinister portrayal of the hero to the fanfares of Richmond's victory; and the elasticity of the reading, the dramatic power of the contrasts, could not have been improved upon.

"The Battle of the Huns" was a revelation. When it was performed here three seasons ago (Nov. 26, 1904), it made no very marked effect. The audience then received it calmly and it seemed one of Liszt's more artificial works. Saturday it impressed one as even more powerful than "Les Preludes," which we have always held to be the best of Liszt's Symphonic Poems, and the auditors were aroused to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

This work is perhaps the first orchestral composition that employs a painting as inspiration to music. Since that time the Swiss painter Boeklin has inspired both Huber and Weingartner, and a couple of paintings by J. Appleton Brown brought forth Paine's "Island Fantasy."

Naturally enough the work is founded upon the battle of two themes. It is far above the conflict of two themes with which Mendelssohn pictures the strife of Protestant and Catholic, and it is far more intelligible and impressive than the musical row in which dissimilar themes, chords and rhythms, black each other's eyes in Strauss's "Heldenleben." People may prate "Realism" as much as they please, but it is not necessary to smear the conductor's baton with blood, or to fill the hall with smoke, in order to picture a battle. Music is a stimulant to the emotions and the imagination, and an intense suggestion of combat, such as Liszt has created, is truer Art than any amount of mere dissonance and noise, scored for orchestra, would have been.

The orchestra played magnificently in this and the cymbalist certainly earned his salary. Dr. Muck's reading was, as already intimated, a revelation. It was the loftiest imaginable interpretation.

Beethoven's Heroic Symphony could not but sound slightly archaic after the brilliant modern orchestration of Liszt. The work is now over a century old. We can only wonder how the concert-goer of 2007 will regard "Heldenleben," the heroic symphony of the present, in which the composer is his own hero and vehemently praises himself.

Dr. Muck did not omit a single repeat. He did not even cut out the repetition of the exposition of the first movement, as is sometimes done by modern conductors. We fancy that he thoroughly enjoyed the work. Yet it was impossible to read anything new into it; we have had many great performances of the Heroic symphony, by Nikisch, Paur and Gericke.

We always dissent from the excessive softness of the strings when the horn enters (tonic chord against dominant) at the end of the development. In this abrogation of the laws of harmony we imagine Beethoven to have pictured his hero as defiant of all rule or precedent,—a law unto himself,—and to glide over the dissonance, by softening one of the harmonies, is to destroy the radical effect desired. It would seem the most innocent of dissonances to our modern composers.

The Funeral March was nobly read and played. Dr. Muck here was careful to avoid the dawdling slowness which might have sentimentalized what Coleridge called "A Funeral in purple." Especial praise may be given to the oboe in this and also to all the woodwind in the Trio. The sobbing, broken-hearted Coda was given very graphically.

The Scherzo was brilliant, as it ought to be. This is practically the first Scherzo movement ever composed, for, although the Scherzo of the second symphony came two years earlier, that has yet much of the character of the Minuet (which the Scherzo was to replace), but in this the Minuet character has entirely disappeared. The horns seemed unnecessarily loud in the Trio of this, and their tone-quality was not as good as we have had it heretofore in the same passages.

The Finale was most effectively given. It seems, even at its best, a falling-off from the rest of the work. Conductors imagine many things about it. Here is Weingartner's vaticination regarding this set of variations on a ballet theme,—

"In the last movement the peoples come together from the ends of the earth, bringing building-stones for a worthy monument to the now fully-recognized hero—a monument which cannot be more beautiful than is the love paid to his memory. This movement surpasses the first two in its boldness of conception and its polyphonic working-out, and makes the so much admired fugue-finale in Mozart's 'Jupiter Symphony' seem like a child's toy. When at last the veil falls from the monument, when the strains of the consecration music arise, and all eyes, filled with tears, look up at the image of the deified hero, then ring upon our ears the sounds that tell us that, with this symphony, music has learned to speak a language for which it hitherto seemed to possess no organ."

All of which is "important if true," yet we always feel that the finale of the fifth symphony would have been more in line with the three first movements of the Heroic symphony. But Dr. Muck's reading brought out something like the loftiness which Weingartner has imagined.

Altogether, this single season of Dr. Muck has been a very great one. He has been broad and liberal in his programmes. His readings have been poetic and elastic. He has abnegated his own preferences in music in order to give us every important modern work that was possible. Sometimes theatrical in his overture readings and given to extremes of slowness in these, he has nevertheless given us performances of some well-known works that became surprising in their novelty because of his great interpretations. We have learned from him the real meaning of the Brahms C minor symphony and of several other works which we thought we fully understood. He has taught us that soloists are not so essential to these concerts as we had imagined. Altogether Dr. Muck has become an important figure in Boston's musical history and will doubtless be even greater in his second season.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON HERAL[illegible] TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1907.

FIRST POP CONCERT OF YEAR AT SYMPHONY HALL

SCENE IN SYMPHONY HALL LAST NIGHT AT SEASON'S FIRST "POP" CONCERT

Philosophy of Beer and Music and of Evening Dress Discussed to the Waving of Adamowski's Baton.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The first "Pop" concert of the 22d season was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the conductor. The programme was as follows:

March—"Parade".....Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Serenade—"Contes d'Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Selection—"Mlle. Modiste".....Herbert
Overture—"Semiramide".....Rossini
March—"Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Selection—"Madam Butterfly".....Puccini
(First time.)
Overture—"1812".....Tschaikowsky
Suite No. 1—"Carmen".....Bizet-Hoffmann
(First time.)
Overture—"Fledermaus".....J. Strauss
Selection—"The Red Mill".....Herbert
Waltz—"Grubenlichter".....Zeller
March—"Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

I took Mr. Herkimer Johnson, the Earnest Student of Sociology, to the concert.

Mr. Comee, the arbiter delicarum, the great high priest of pleasure, welcomed the distinguished guest with the utmost cordiality, and told him two of his choicest stories. Like all deep thinkers, Mr. Johnson has little appreciation of humor. He gravely asked Mr. Comee to repeat them that he might take notes for his colossal work, "Man as a Social and Political Beast" (the first volume is now in press).

"Beer Thicker Than Water."

But when there was mention of beer with the music, Mr. Johnson rose promptly to the occasion, and said in clear, bell-like tones: "Beer is thicker than water."

No sooner were we seated than Mr. Johnson began as a lecturer: "It was the ill-fated Maginn who remarked: 'As for the beautiful mutual adaptation of cold rum and cold water, that is beyond all praise, and indeed forms a theme of never-ceasing admiration, being one of Nature's most exquisite achievements.' The mutual adaptation of beer and music is to me still more wonderful. I am aware that Bismarck said they that drink beer, think beer, and that one Nietzsche wrote bitterly against beer-soaked philosophers, but music is certainly less disturbing to thought when it is accompanied by beer, whether it be light or dark. These glasses, by the way, should be larger. And beer should never be put into glass. There should be steins."

He continued: "I see that some of the company have already ordered light wines, but I still maintain that for an evening like this, beer is more to the purpose, even though the wine were the vintage four years old poured from a two-handled Sabine jar."

Pleasant to Ear and Eye.

The scene was pleasant to the eye as the music was to the ear. Mr. Adamowski had arranged an excellent programme; he conducted with grace and vigor; the orchestra was in fine fettle. For some time Mr. Johnson listened quietly to the music. He enjoyed the barcarolle from "Contes d'Hoffmann," and wished that the opera might be performed here. The chief theme of Elgar's March so closely resembles a peculiar phrase in Delibes' "Sylvia" in melody, rhythm and color that he shrugged his shoulders. The constant intrusion of music from "Boheme" in Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" irritated him, but he was much pleased by the spirited performance of the "1812" overture and by the suite from "Carmen."

At last he began to express opinions. "These concerts should, indeed, be encouraged, yet I would fain see two or three improvements. In the first place, I should insist that no man should be allowed to enter in full evening dress."

And here a word about Mr. Johnson's costume. He wore a pepper and salt cutaway, a waist coat that evidently once went with a frock coat, trousers of neutral shade and pronounced bulging at the knees. One trouser leg was rolled up. His cravat was a passionate, flaring red. His right overshoe was torn at the side, and his umbrella was of the kind known as gamp, or lettuce, or bumbashoot. It is only fair to say that Mrs. Johnson, the peerless Eustacia, has been out of town for a fortnight.

Mr. Johnson's Objections.

"I do not object," continued Mr. Johnson, "to dress suits on formal occasions, but I insist that a 'Pop' concert should be thoroughly informal. Do you remember the club in London to which Artemus Ward was invited by an agreeable stranger? At this club—the Sloshers—the stranger said none of the members appeared in evening dress. He said it was agin the rules of the club. In fact, if any member appeared there in evening dress, he'd be instantly expeld. And yit there's geneyus there, and lofty emotions, and intelleck.'"

And Mr. Johnson added: "I believe there is a literary club in Cambridge that enforces the same rule. A dress suit at once establishes a distinction—not between a waiter and a guest, but between guests. It is not given to every man to wear a dress coat with self-assurance. Some are unduly anxious concerning immaculate quality of shirt front and they drink their beer as though they had a stiff arm and they hold the glass at a long distance. Others are so self-conscious that they feel the necessity of preserving an air of unshaken dignity.

"Again, there should be truly gregarious enjoyment. There should be no suggestion of first and second class tickets—no arbitrary division. Yet I notice a commendable improvement in this respect, though I should like to hear fuller peals of laughter and more general conversation. There should be less critical attention to the music. The music is after all only a pretext for the intimate association of men and women, youths and maidens. Nor do I like any enforcement of attention. Let the music be joyous, rollicking, an unloosener of tongues, an incitement to heels. But tonight is the first; it is eminently successful, when you consider the behavior of unsympathetic Nature."

The Unbending of Bostonians.

Mr. Johnson, like Mr. Cheggs in "The Old Curiosity Shop," is bashful in the presence of ladies, yet he could not help observing the display of imposing coiffures and picturesque hats. He took copious notes and on leaving assured us that his time had not been wholly wasted. "It is always profitable to study the Bostonian when he endeavors to unbend in a public place," and with this remark he suggested the advisability of still another beer.

He would take no "light refreshments," for he is of the opinion that light refreshments induce heavy and dull digestion.

The programme this evening will include overtures by Massenet, Rossini, Suppe, waltzes by Strauss and Ziehrer, marches by Goldner, Hoffmann and Ganne, selections from "Manon," "The Red Mill" and "It Happened in Nordland," a transcription of a polonaise by Chopin and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

[188]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A HEARTY END OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Much Applause for Dr. Muck and a Remarkable Performance of the "Eroica" Symphony — Mr. Kneisel Declines the Philadelphia Conductorship and His Quartet Is to Continue—Arenski's Piano Concerto in Cambridge—Mr. Bryce's Faulty Theatrical Memory—News of the Day

As the way is at the Symphony concerts, Dr. Muck's second leave-taking on Saturday evening was heartier and more festal than that of Friday afternoon. His music-stand was covered with greenery and decked with a large bouquet. Before he could begin Volkmann's overture, he had twice to acknowledge the applause of his audience. It recalled him as many times after Liszt's tone-poem; and at the end of the concert, his audience and his men both lingered. The conductor shook the departing Mr. Hess warmly by the hand, bowed and smiled to the clapping players who were now on their feet and then turned to the eagerly applauding audience. Twice and three times it recalled him, even to cheers, and from first to last the spirit of the leave-taking was very spontaneous and sincere. It was the just reward of all the stimulus Dr. Muck has given to the orchestra and of all the high, keen and varied pleasure he has given his audiences through the long season—the testimony to expectations fulfilled, the anticipation of fine achievements to come.

It pleased Dr. Muck to end the season somewhat as he began it. Last October the fifth symphony of Beethoven and shorter pieces that disclosed his powers as a dramatic conductor made his programme. On Saturday he ended the concert with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and before it came Volkmann's overture to "Richard III.," and Liszt's tone-poem of "The Battle of the Huns," to confirm again those dramatic talents. More even than Wagner's "Faust" overture and the prelude to "The Meistersingers" at the first concert, it proclaimed them. Wagner's music is dramatic in itself. Whoever the conductor, it speaks. Volkmann's, on the other hand, needs the vitalizing touch of a conductor who can give by ingenious emphasis a momentary vividness to its thoughtful "effects." Liszt's tone-poem in turn may easily fall away into thunderous scraps of musical melodrama. Again on Saturday night Dr. Muck gave it the large proportions and coloring of a tonal fresco and the large voice of grandiose declamation. It sounded big, and it did not sound empty. Often in the concerts of the winter has Dr. Muck seemed so to amplify and exalt essentially dramatic music.

The glory of the leave-taking, however, was the performance of Beethoven's symphony. Dr. Muck spared none of its lengths, and there was no need to spare them. In not a classic symphony of the year has his conducting been at once of more integrity and of more vitality. The symphony rose in its large outlines and its intimate details before the ears and the minds of his hearers. The music seemed to spring on and on, out of itself into spontaneous fulness and rounded completeness. Yet within this impression of creating design and within all this integrity of structure was adroit variety of melodic line and transformation, of rhythmic accent and contrast, of supple modulation, of tonal weight and color, of adroit transition, of gathering climax. Not once did Dr. Muck seem to be forcing the music. Rather, so spontaneous did it all seem, he was seizing its transparent possibilities. Recall the variety of orchestral tone with which he filled the first movement; the dramatic accent in gradations and colorings and contrasts of tone with which he intensified the funeral march; the keen rhythmic zest of the scherzo; the elation of movement and of mood that made the variations of the finale high rhapsody. Throughout the symphony moved on large and lofty planes; throughout its voice was noble. The listeners felt the exaltation of such beauty and power of sound. The symphony needed no speculations as to the hero of Beethoven's imagination. It was heroic in its own right.

H. T. P.

Mr. Kneisel Remains with His Quartet

In New York yesterday Mr. Kneisel told a reporter of the Times that he had finally declined the invitation to become the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; that he should continue with the Kneisel Quartet; but that henceforth it would travel less from city to city than it has in recent years. His words were: "I would have made up my mind sooner were it not for the fact that I have a contract with the Institute of Musical Arts, where I direct the stringed instrument department. Had it released me from that contract I would have been able to decide sooner. The Philadelphia Orchestra offered me $12,000 a year for a season of twenty-two weeks. The contract was to run for three years. However, inducements of a private nature were offered to me in New York which will not make it necessary for me to travel as much as I have been obliged to do in the past. I shall remain here with the Kneisel Quartet, though it is not likely that we shall give more than the usual number of public concerts in New York." Since the Quartet has never counted its monthly journeys to Boston a burden of travel, it is safe to infer that it will continue its chamber concerts here. A month or two ago Mr. Kneisel began the quest of a new 'cellist, to succeed Mr. Schroeder, and soon, probably, he will go to Europe to continue it. He has already made proposals, we believe, to Mr. Gérardy and to Mr. Casals, both of whom have been heard in America in recent years, and who are among the new 'cellists of international reputation. Mr. Casals, by every sign that he gave when he visited this country in 1902, would make a most admirable player in a quartet. It is no secret, moreover, that many of Mr. Kneisel's warmest friends and admirers believe that by temperament, experience and achievement, he is far better fitted for his present post than for work as conductor.

With the double test of Mr. Schroeder's retirement and the possibility that Mr. Kneisel might become a conductor in Philadelphia, our neighbors in New York have been singing for a week past the praises of the Kneisel Quartet. They have, indeed, been high, just and deserved praises, but, as the way of New York is, it has pleased the songful reviewers to waive the fact that the Kneisel Quartet had its beginnings in Boston; that all its players from 1885 through 1903 were also members of our Symphony Orchestra; that during its struggling years, which were not few, Mr. Higginson maintained and fostered it, and that without the advantages that Mr. Kneisel derived from the picking of his men from the orchestra and from Mr. Higginson's protection it would hardly have gained its place among the three or four notable quartets of the world. For almost twenty years, until its members left the Symphony Orchestra in 1903, it called itself "The Kneisel Quartet of Boston," and when it then became "The Kneisel Quartet of New York" its lean and waiting years were ended and its reputation was established.

In the autumn of 1885 at Mr. Gericke's request Mr. Kneisel left the Bilse concerts in Berlin to become the principal violinist of the Symphony Orchestra. From the string choir of the band he forthwith formed his quartet as its foster child, maintained out of its treasury. Mr. Fiedler played the second violin; Mr. Svecenski, the viola; and Mr. Giese, the 'cello. Mr. Fiedler retired in 1887, and Otto Roth, likewise and still of the Symphony Orchestra, succeeded him. Mr. Giese withdrew in 1889, and for two years Mr. Hekking, the principal 'cellist of the orchestra, took his place. Then, in 1891, Mr. Schroeder succeeded to both posts, and for the eight years during which the quartet largely achieved its reputation, its membership remained unchanged. Mr. Roth left it in 1899, and, in order, two other members of the orchestra replaced him—Mr. Ondricek through 1902, and then the present second violin, Mr. Theodorowicz. A year later the quartet, now known up and down Europe and America, ended by resignation all connection with the orchestra. Thus, from the beginnings of 1885 to the established position of 1907 the successive players in the Kneisel Quartet have come from the strings of the Symphony Orchestra. Those that knew the quartet in its early days still recall what notable abilities and zeal Mr. Giese, the 'cellist, brought to it. For longer still and equally with Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Schroeder helped to gain its present place; Mr. Ondricek was the ablest second violin it has yet had; and Mr. Svecenski's record of twenty-two years as the viola player speaks for itself. From the beginning Mr. Kneisel could make what choice he would from the string choir of the orchestra. When it was bettered by the coming of Mr. Schroeder, for example, the quartet shared the advantage equally. Moreover, it is still easy to recollect the years in which the quartet played to a handful of auditors in the New York that now cherishes it for its own, and when other cities barely knew that it existed. We in Boston would not abate one jot of New York's just pride in Mr. Kneisel, or subtract one tittle from his exceptional talents or from his endless work in the establishment and the development of the quartet. It is none the less the child of the Symphony Orchestra. Fostered and protected by it, and by Mr. Higginson behind, it came into being, survived the long years in which it was making its way, and finally reached its goal. H. T. P.

Arenski's Piano Concerto in Cambridge

At the last concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge in Sanders Theatre last Thursday Miss Olga von Radecki played Arenski's piano concerto in F minor (Op. 2). Although this was not the first performance of the concerto in the neighborhood of Boston, for Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman played it at a Symphony concert here Oct. 14, 1899, it is still a sufficiently unfamiliar piece to deserve a word of comment. Obviously an early composition and doubtless written while Arenski was studying at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, it is probably an unfavorable example of his talent. The first movement is of slender musical material, the second theme is rather emptily pretentious. The general style of the first movement and the treatment of the piano part bears a strong resemblance to those of Chopin. It is indecisive, unassertive. The slow movement has a certain romantic charm, a more individual poetic sentiment. The Scherzo-Finale, written throughout in five-four time, has the most original character, yet even here the thematic development is not striking, although the treatment of the orchestra shows more freedom. However, the faults of the work are those of youth and inexperience; there is abundant promise of better things to come. Nevertheless the music of Arenski that has been heard here shows grace, delicacy and finish rather than strength or conspicuous individuality. That we are ignorant of the best side of his talent may be assumed from the following extract from a letter of Tschaikovski to Serge Taneieff about Arenski's opera, "A Dream on the Volga": "Arenski's opera did not please me much when he played me fragments of it in St. Petersburg after his illness. I liked it a little better when he played it to you at Altani's; far more when I went through it myself this summer, and now, having seen it actually performed, I think it one of the best of Russian operas. It is very elegant and equal throughout; only the end lacks something of inspiration. It has one defect; a certain monotony of method which reminds me of Korsakoff. . . . Arenski is extraordinarily clever in music; everything is so subtly and truly thought out. He is a very interesting musical personality."

E. B. H.

CONCERT MASTER ADAMOWSKI, WHO LEAVES SYMPHONY

BOSTON SYMPHONY LOSES ADAMOWSKI

Famous Violinist and Conductor Resigns as Second Concert Master.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the well known violin virtuoso and conductor, has resigned his position as second concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The last season saw his 22d year of continuous service as violinist in the orchestra.

Mr. Adamowski will continue to conduct the "Pops" for one-third of the present season as was arranged. Next season he expects that the activity of the Adamowski trio will be greater even than it has been in the past. He will also revive the Adamowski quartet and his associates will be Messrs. Kuntz, Zach and Josef Adamowski. It is said that Mr. Josef Adamowski will also resign his position as violoncellist in the orchestra.

When Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler withdrew from the orchestra, Messrs. Arbos and Adamowski were appointed concert masters in their place. This was in 1903. Mr. Arbos in 1904 was succeeded by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Adamowski's connection with the orchestra has been a brilliant one. He has been engaged as soloist in Boston at Symphony concerts 21 times. He has introduced at these concerts the following works: Saint-Saens' concerto No. 1, Bernard's concerto in G major, Moszkowski's concerto, Saint-Saens' concerto No. 3, Paganini's caprice in A minor (arranged and orchestrated by Gorski), Dvorak's concerto and Strube's concerto No. 2. His first appearance with the Symphony orchestra as soloist was on March 7, 1885. His last was on Dec. 29, 1906.

But he was known in Boston as a violinist before the Symphony orchestra was organized. He played here for the first time on Oct. 24, 1879. He was then in his 22d year, for he was born at Warsaw March 24, 1858. He studied at Warsaw with Kontchi and later with Massart at the Paris Conservatory. He came to the United States in 1879, and travelled as soloist with M. Strakosch, Clara Louise Kellogg, and at last with a company of his own. His string quartet was organized in 1888 and reorganized in 1890. He has long been known as a conductor of the "Pops."

Nor is his reputation as a solo violinist confined to cities of the United States; he has played on various occasions in London, Paris and Warsaw.

Mr. Adamowski has been so intimately associated with the Symphony orchestra that he will be sorely missed. It is a pleasure to know that he will continue to make Boston his dwelling place and that the chamber clubs which bear his name will here be at home.

BOSTON POST, TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1907.

Society Welcomes Adamowski and His "Pop" Orchestra and Fills the Symphony Tables

The opening of the "Pops"

Women, beautiful all, exquisitely gowned, society's fairest representatives, accompanied by their escorts in evening dress, crowded the floor space of Symphony Hall at the first of the "Pop" concerts last evening.

In spite of the inclement weather the attendance could not have been greater, at least on the floor. Every table was taken, and these were placed as close together as possible. In the upper balcony the weather showed its effect, a thin line of music lovers leaning at ease upon the cushioned rail was all that this portion of the great hall could boast.

The first balcony, however, was cut up into sections, and was fairly well filled.

The hall began to fill early, and by the time Mr. T. Adamowski made his bow to the expectant groups seated around the tables the floor was a scene of life and color.

One most noticeable feature of the evening was the unusual number of young girls, evidently debutantes, who, with their pretty, bright and piquant faces lent charm and life to the occasion.

During the intermissions many took advantage of the opportunity to promenade in the outer hall, and and here one had a clear chance to note the handsome gowns and wonderful "creations" which adorned the head of many a fair woman.

Although music was nominally the chief attraction and drew in a great measure the attention of those in the balconies, those on the floor, seated about the tables upon which could be seen all manner of cool refreshment, made merry, chatting and laughing with one another until after repeated encores the dying strains of the last selection announced the end of the evening's enjoyment.

The programme which was played is as follows:

March, "Parade" ..... Richard Strauss
First time.
Serenade, "Contes d'Hoffmann" ..... Offenbach
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste" ..... Herbert
Overture, "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Selection, "Mme. Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
First time.
Suite No. 1, "Carmen" ..... Bizet-Hoffmann
First time.
Overture, "Fledermaus" ..... J. Strauss
Selection, "The Red Mill" ..... Herbert
First time.
Waltz, "Grubenlichter" ..... Zeller
March, "Mattchiche" ..... Borel-Clerc

BOSTON JOURNAL--TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1907.

"POPS" FIRST NIGHTERS APPLAUD ADAMOWSKI

"Pops," those delightful medleys of symphonic orchestrations and formal informalities, started last night on their twenty-second annual season. As heretofore, a potpourri of popular airs alternating with the world's greatest orchestrations comprised the evening's concert.

The entire floor of Symphony Hall is now reserved with tables where refreshments and smoking are permissible and the two balconies are reserved for the lovers of music alone.

T. Adamowski conducted the orchestra and for his first night's offerings submitted for popular airs the snappiest gleanings from "Mlle. Modiste," "Mme. Butterfly" and "The Red Mill," the latter performance still being a stranger to Boston.

New Strauss Number.

The opening march, "Parade," by Richard Strauss, was entirely new to "Pops," and although given before the real crowd was seated, received the most fervent applause of the evening from the most ardent music lovers that packed the balconies.

Before 9 o'clock the entire floor of the huge auditorium was filled to overflowing with Boston's music lovers, the inevitable first nighters having their choicest seats early claimed.

Inclement weather apparently dampened not the ardor of the crowd, who waxed enthusiastic over the Adamowski conducting.

Tonight's program will be:

1. Polonaise .....
2. Overture, "Phedre" ..... Chopin
3. Waltz, "Velvet and Silk" ..... Massenet
First time. ..... Ziehrer
4. Fantasia, "Manon," ..... Massenet
First time.
5. Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
6. Overture, "William Tell" ..... Rossini
7. Selection, "The Red Mill," ..... Herbert
First time.
8. Wedding March ..... Goldner-Hoffmann
First time.
9. Overture, "Light Cavalry" ..... Suppe
10. Waltz, "Morgenblatter" ..... Strauss
11. Selection, "It Happened in Nordland" ..... Herbert
12. March, "Tartare" ..... Ganne
First time.

Society's Representation.

Among those who last night braved the storm to listen to the opening night's offerings were: Col. and Mrs. W. A. Barron, Dr. and Mrs. J. Foster Bush and their two pretty daughters, Mrs. Ernest Fenollosa with party of six, Mr. Francis I. Amory with his daughter, Miss Priscilla Stackpole and two male guests, Robert Otis Brigham, Ralph Menard, Jerome Booth, Stephen Townsend, Miss Lida Low, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Inman and their house guests, Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Major, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert, J. Bernard Ferber, Harry Sherman and his fiancee, Miss White; Russell Churchill, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Parker and party of five, Susan Risteen and jolly auto party, Mr. George Shattuck, Mrs. R. C. Dixey and party, Miss Laura Hawkins, Mrs. T. Adamowski with Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Philip Hale, Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, having the youngest sister of Mrs. Andrews—Pauline Shaw and party, the Misses Abbie and Mary Manning, Alfred Brooks Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Landry, Robert Winsor, Jr., and Mr. Brooks with ladies, "Buzz" Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Badger, Lieut. Comdr. J. H. Dillaway with Mrs. Laisey of Ohio, Miss Mildred Bond with party, Mr. and Mrs. William Ames, Mr. and Mrs. George Shattuck, Mr. Charles Rollins with party of four, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Roteh, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Chick, Willie Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Boylston Beal with party, Mr. and Mrs. James Lowell Putnam.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, JUNE 5, 1907.

IT WAS TECH NIGHT AT THE POPS AND SOMETHING DOING ALL THE TIME

TECH MEN, YOUNG AND OLD, SING, SHOUT AND MAKE MERRY AT THE POP CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL.

Tech men, young and old, graduate and undergraduate, in the vicinity of Boston and even from far off, gathered last evening at Symphony hall for the annual Tech night at the Pops. The galleries were filled with "Tech ladies," and down came confetti and streamers while handkerchiefs were waved from time to time.

But the real fun was on the floor. The orchestra did not have a ghost of a show against the noise that came from the thousand throats. If the tune happened to be anything but the air of a Tech song, the Tech men paid little attention. But when Tech tunes were given, song rose to the roof and old men bellowed with the young.

The seniors occupied the post of honor in front with a large block of tables. Nearly 200 of the new members of the alumni were there with all kinds of noise and cheers.

The classes came into the hall in double file, headed by their class banner, and seated themselves at their tables marked by large pennants. Each class was given a demonstration as it marched in, especially the old-timers. The alumni, coming as they did direct from their class dinners and reunions, were feeling very happy and were ready for anything. The class of '82 was conspicuous with its silken banner and new yell. Nearly every member of this class, which has been celebrating its 25th anniversary, was present.

Pres Pritchett marched in with '93, this delegation being headed by an enormous orange banner with the numerals '93. When "Prexy" appeared in the doorway everybody was up with a yell, and there was pandemonium until he was seated. Nineteen hundred and two came in with a flourish, every member wearing a great button and blue ribbon. Nineteen hundred and five and '06 were conspicuous by their banners and large numbers.

After all the classes had entered the fun began in earnest. Confetti was tossed about, long streamers went whizzing across the hall and cheering was profuse. Tech songs were taken with a vim and a roar. Old men fraternized with the younger. The seniors cheered every class and every other class cheered the seniors.

Then came the rushing of the favorite professors. J. Blachstein, an instructor familiarly known as "Blacky," was picked up bodily and rushed to the stage amid great excitement. He was excused with a bow, for speaking was out of the question.

Gaetano Lanza was given a great ovation, but was not given a ride on the shoulders of the men.

Homer Albers, who every week dispenses law for an hour to the whole third-year class, was spied by the juniors. He was hoisted ahigh and carried to the stage.

Then Prof E. F. Miller, the genial head of the steam engineering course, came in for the ride of honor.

Prof C. E. Allen, known by the civil engineers as "Pa," was waltzed up to the stage on the shoulders of about 20, to the destruction of bottles and a great overturning of tables.

Then the freshmen and sophomores became the centre of attraction. The class of 1902 threw down hundreds of squares of tissue paper with the class numeral upon it from the balcony in the rear. These came down like snowflakes upon the two lower classes. Some one cried "Grab 'em," and the roughhouse of the evening started.

Each and every man tried to catch all of the floating bits that he could. Tables went over, glasses were sent flying, and chairs were smashed. The rush was terrific while it lasted. The men piled on top of each other and were soaked with the liquid refreshments while the unlucky ones at the bottom of the heap were rolled about on the floor. This was quieted by the ushers, who were upper-class men, and some of the alumni.

The junior class then gave a few stunts. A pyramid was formed with one man high in the air. Then a big circle was formed with every man sitting on the lap of the next. The class cheer was given with all forming a closed ring.

The old "Stein Song" brought all to their feet and was given with a gusto. "On Rogers Steps" was another favorite, while the new cheer song, "Dear Old M. I. T.," was given as the last song of the evening.

Everett Morss '85 and Giles Taintor '87, were the alumni cheer leaders, while Lawrence Allen '07, president of the senior class, and John H. Leavell '07 were the undergraduate leaders. Emerson H. Packard '07 led the singing.

As the last cheer before going, Allen led the count of classes, beginning with '68 and ending with '10.

[191]

BLANK PAGE

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

I.0 I.1 I.25 I.4 I.6 I.8

1.0 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm — ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

COLORED PAPER

12 PAGES

THE SUNDAY HERALD

MAGAZINE SECTION

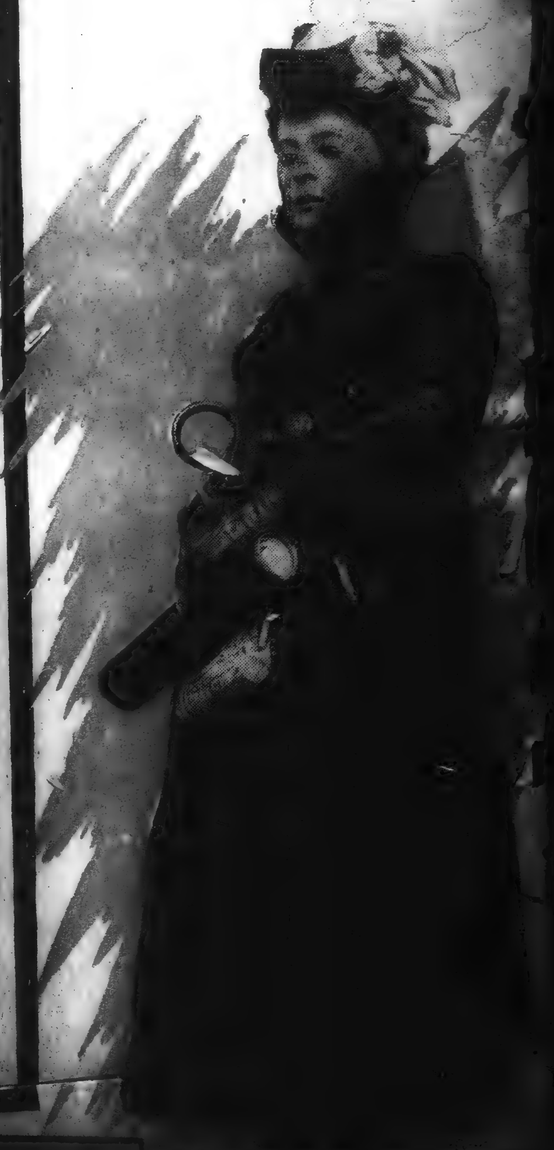
BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1906.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY THE BOSTON HERALD CO.

THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL LIN

Passers-by Extend Sympathy to Men and Women Who do Not Ask for It.

Sometimes There are Several Seekers for Each of the 505 Available Seats.



AT THE HEAD OF THE LINE.

Hall stand-in-liner, even the self-conscious melomaniac, may dread the coming of the worst days of the year and the factag of cross currents of cold blasts, snow, sleet and ice, at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, but he gives few signs of his dread.

It seems to be part of the creed of the typical stand-in-liner that personal discomfort is not to be considered when there is a chance to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearse on Friday afternoons.

Ever since the new home of the orchestra was opened, the stand-in-liners have been in their places hour after hour every Friday the orchestra is there. The top of the thread of mercury in the thermometer may be down near the zero mark, the hands of the big clock on the storage warehouse nearby may be frozen up and motionless, the street car inspector and the policeman may be slapping their arms across their chests, shifting from foot to foot, or pacing nervously up and down trying to keep warm, but the stand-in-liner, even the self-conscious melomaniac, may dread the coming of the worst days of the year and the factag of cross currents of cold blasts, snow, sleet and ice, at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, but he gives few signs of his dread.

BEGINNING YOUNG.

It seems to be part of the creed of the typical stand-in-liner that personal discomfort is not to be considered when there is a chance to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearse on Friday afternoons.

Ever since the new home of the orchestra was opened, the stand-in-liners have been in their places hour after hour every Friday the orchestra is there. The top of the thread of mercury in the thermometer may be down near the zero mark, the hands of the big clock on the storage warehouse nearby may be frozen up and motionless, the street car inspector and the policeman music lovers, true to his creed.

[redacted]ch of the hebdomadary rehearsals of the Symphony is almost as much a Boston institution as the Symphony orchestra itself, and week in and week out the stand-in-liners are living up to the best traditions of the institution.

What It Means in Winter.

It doesn't take any great amount of love for music to make a person stand in line two or three hours in the early autumn, when furs are ample protection against searching winds and overcoats keep a man warm enough. It has been a fad with some persons to do the trick just for the doing of it and for the gathering of material for little boasts afterward.

Those fair-weather enthusiasts drop away at this time of year. An everyday sort of love for music will not keep a person in the rush line when he must stand in two or three inches of snow, when the pavements are wet and the water soaks through to the feet in a way to make the average person think of pneumonia, and when it is necessary to stand or sit in a cramped position and hold up an umbrella to keep off the rain and the drippings of the neighboring umbrella.

It may be that in any city but Boston no considerable group of persons would be found with large enough musical egos to bear those little hardships. It all justifies very strikingly the statements of the "psychologist who writes like a novelist," Prof. William James of Harvard, that in Boston many persons feel bound to cultivate a musical ego.

A craving for the best music to be heard in the United States, and as good as is to be heard anywhere in the world, plus the chance to save money—to get more than 25 cents' worth of entertainment and instruction for a quarter—are the things that lead persons to the rush line and keep them there for hours.

That there is no lack of money among some of the stand-in-liners is shown by their conversation with the Symphony attendants after the last of the fortunate 505 has smiled at those who were so near and are yet so far. They have offered the Symphony attendants $2, $3 and $4 for a seat inside, and the attendants have to refuse gently and firmly. These fallings away from the spirit of the true stand-in-liner are not uncommon, but there are no records in the archives of $4 doing what 25 cents could not do.

On the days of days, the occasions when the famous soloists are to appear, the line may form as early as 8 o'clock. When the rush to the city is on, and cars loaded to the doors with men and women going to work bowl along the Huntington avenue boulevard, the early comers of the stand-in-liners are up on the steps of Symphony Hall, as near as may be to the doors.

Additions come singly and in groups. They form a line along the top step. The overflow extends along on the second, and winds in and out until the whole space is so jammed that there is hardly room for another. They are beneath the very walls of the temple of music, and they are sure of being in the forefront of the rush at 1:30.

By 12 o'clock there may be many more than the fortunate 505 in the long line extending down the avenue. There have been as many as 1000 men, women and children in the ranks, and they usually stay to the last, hoping against hope that something will happen to give them a chance at a seat inside at 1:30.

The only seats to be had outside are those furnished by the cold stone steps. The enthusiasts have with them a little basket or bagful of lunch, papers or books to read and newspapers to make cushions on the steps. There is an inviting apothecary shop directly across the road, where hot chocolate and soups are to be had with salted biscuits, but none of that is for the stand-in-liners. It is an inviolate rule of the rush line that once a person leaves his place he forfeits all right to it, and must take up his station at the very end of the column.

THE LONG LINE.

SHE FELT SURE OF GETTING IN.

The only solace in the way of support on the sidewalk is the rail fence, and against that have leaned hundreds of weary persons, wondering if they may not perhaps get in. There is no chance even to sit on the curbstone. The children in the windows of the nearby hospital look at them wonderingly, and have a little pleasure all their own every Friday. Proxies are unheard of in the line. The messenger boy who used to hold a place by night in the long lines of Morris chairs at Harvard just before the sale of football tickets has no entry here.

And Everybody Is Contented.

A look at the line shows all sorts of persons. There are some poorly dressed. There are children who have been lugged along by parents or brothers and sisters. There are students conning their books. There are men with eyes on the sporting pages of the newspapers. There are women who look to be septuagenarians, men whose hair and beards are white. There are rosy-cheeked girls, students at the New England Conservatory of Music, who chat and laugh and believe that they are on a great lark. There are youths who affect the bohemian habit as to their hats and their hair. There are staid looking men whom one would expect to see behind desks, adding up rows of figures, rather than adding to the number of those who have come too late.

And nearly everybody seems perfectly content, no matter what the weather may be, and no matter how many hours of waiting are ahead. They are usually entirely undisturbed by the wondering glances of the passersby. They are becoming accustomed even to the camera. They point out the persons in line who may be known as year in and year out stand-in-liners. If a well known critic or musician passes along, as often happens, there are scores in the line who know him.

GETTING IMPATIENT.

The ranks begin to close up and to be more regular as the hour for opening approaches. Three or four policemen from the Back Bay station are on hand, and two or three of the Symphony Hall attendants. The necks of those in the rear stretch out to take still another look at the distressingly long line in front. Then the doors are open, and the whole line begins to dribble up beyond the big pillars.

The principle of "first come, first served," which obtains in the forming of the line, is not observed inside. The person who buys the first ticket gets no coupon. He must trust to his luck to take him quickly to the most desirable seat. It may be that the second or third man at the ticket office gets the best. But there is no unseemly rush, even after the tickets are on sale, the courtesy which prevails outside being the proper thing all the time. "Rush line" is really a misnomer.

An Unwritten Code Prevails.

Two women from Winthrop are pointed out usually the first comers. They think nothing of being at their posts as early as 8 o'clock. The policemen and the clerks in the stores near have come to know them by sight. They are an indication, in a measure, of the length the line will have by half-past 1. If they are unusually early, the indications are for a line of at least a hundred or two more than can be accommodated. It was a matter of comment among the police men a few weeks ago when one of them came late and was not in even the first hundred admitted. On "off days" persons may come as late as 1 o'clock or half-past 1, hoping that the best seats will not all be taken. As often as not, they may find that there is no hope.

Semi-occasionally there are breaches of the unwritten statutes made and provided. Two or three weeks ago a young man, totally ignorant of the precedents established years ago and religiously adhered to, dropped out of his proper place in one of the lines near the bottom step and slipped up ahead of 20 or 30 persons who should have had their choice of seats before him. The policemen and the attendants have usually the easiest of tasks, however, the code of the stand-in-liners being of a kind that gives no occasion for even little disputes. The policemen become accustomed to the stand-in-line phenomenon years ago, but they can't understand why persons stand in line for hours on the cold days when they themselves are chilled.

The persons who occupy the floor and first balcony seats have had them in advance, and there is nothing in their entrance to the hall which may not be seen in the lobby of a theatre on nights of the week. They do not come until two or three-quarters of an hour after their more fortunate brothers and sisters are resting in well earned second balcony seats, waiting for the opening at 2:30. There is no great dissimilarity in the appearance of the two classes, and they are alike in one respect—most of them are wo

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.5 mm
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

COLORED PAPER

12 PAGES

THE SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1906.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY THE H

COLORED PAPER

THE SUNDAY HERALD

MAGAZINE SECTION

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1906.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY THE BOSTON HERALD CO.

BEGINNING YOUNG.

THE LONG LINE.

SHE FELT SURE OF GETTING IN.

GETTING IMPATIENT.

stand-in-liner, even the self-conscious melomaniac, may dread the coming of the worst days of the year and the facing of cross currents of cold blasts, snow, sleet and ice, at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, but he gives few signs of his dread.

It seems to be part of the creed of the typical stand-in-liner that personal discomfort is not to be considered when there is a chance to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearse on Friday afternoons.

Ever since the new home of the orchestra was opened, the stand-in-liners have been in their places hour after hour every Friday the orchestra is there. The top of the thread of mercury in the thermometer may be down near the zero mark, the hands of the big clock on the storage warehouse nearby may be frozen up and motionless, the street car inspector and the policeman may be slapping their arms across their chests, shifting from foot to foot, or pacing nervously up and down trying to keep warm, but the stand-music lovers, true to his creed.

The rush at the hebdomadary rehearsals of the Symphony is almost as much a Boston institution as the Symphony orchestra itself, and week in and week out the stand-in-liners are living up to the best traditions of the institution.

What It Means in Winter.

It doesn't take any great amount of love for music to make a person stand in line two or three hours in the early autumn, when furs are ample protection against searching winds and overcoats keep a man warm enough. It has been a fad with some persons to do the trick just for the doing of it and for the gathering of material for little lectures afterward.

These fair-weather enthusiasts drop away at this time of year. An everyday sort of love for music will not keep a person in the rush line when he must stand in two or three inches of snow, when the pavements are wet and the water soaks through to the feet in a way to make the average person think of pneumonia, and when it is necessary to stand or sit in a cramped position and hold up an umbrella to keep off the rain and the drippings of the neighboring umbrella.

It may be that in any city but Boston no considerable group of persons would be found with large enough musical egos to bear those little hardships. It all justifies very strikingly the statements of the "psychologist who writes like a novelist," Prof. William James of Harvard, that in Boston many persons feel bound to cultivate a musical ego.

A craving for the best music to be heard in the United States, and as good as is to be heard anywhere in the world, plus the chance to save money—to get more than 25 cents' worth of entertainment and instruction for a quarter—are the things that lead persons to the rush line and keep them there for hours.

That there is no lack of money among some of the stand-in-liners is shown by their conversation with the Symphony attendants after the last of the fortunate 505 has smiled at those who were so near and are yet so far. They have offered the Symphony attendants $2, $3 and $4 for a seat inside, and the attendants have to refuse gently and firmly. These fallings away from the spirit of the true stand-in-liner are not uncommon, but there are no records in the archives of $4 doing what 25 cents could not do.

On the days of days, the occasions when the famous soloists are to appear, the line may form as early as 8 o'clock. When the rush to the city is on, and cars loaded to the doors with men and women going to work bowl along the Huntington avenue boulevard, the early comers of the stand-in-liners are up on the steps of Symphony Hall, as near as may be to the doors.

Additions come singly and in groups. They form a line along the top step. The overflow extends along on the second, and winds in and out until the whole space is so jammed that there is hardly room for another. They are beneath the very walls of the temple of music, and they are sure of being in the forefront of the rush at 1:30.

By 12 o'clock there may be many more than the fortunate 505 in the long line extending down the avenue. There have been as many as 1000 men, women and children in the ranks, and they usually stay to the last, hoping against hope that something will happen to give them a chance at a seat inside at 1:30.

The only seats to be had outside are those furnished by the cold stone steps. The enthusiasts have with them a little basket or bagful of lunch, papers or books to read and newspapers to make cushions on the steps. There is an inviting apothecary shop directly across the road, where hot chocolate and soups are to be had with salted biscuits, but none of that is for the stand-in-liners. It is an inviolate rule of the rush line that once a person leaves his place he forfeits all right to it, and must take up his station at the very end of the column.

The only solace in the way of support on the sidewalk is the rail fence, and against that have leaned hundreds of weary persons, wondering if they may not perhaps get in. There is no chance even to sit on the curbstone. The children in the windows of the nearby hospital look at them wonderingly, and have a little pleasure all their own every Friday. Proxies are unheard of in the line. The messenger boy who used to hold a place by night in the long lines of Morris chairs at Harvard just before the sale of football tickets has no entry here.

And Everybody Is Contented.

A look at the line shows all sorts of persons. There are some poorly dressed. There are children who have been lugged along by parents or brothers and sisters. There are students conning their books. There are men with eyes on the sporting pages of the newspapers. There are women who look to be septuagenarians, men whose hair and beards are white. There are rosy-cheeked girls, students at the New England Conservatory of Music, who chat and laugh and believe that they are on a great lark. There are youths who affect the bohemian habit as to their hats and their hair. There are staid looking men whom one would expect to see behind desks adding up rows of figures, rather than adding to the number of those who have come too late.

And nearly everybody seems perfectly content no matter what the weather may be, and no matter how many hours of waiting are ahead. They are usually entirely undisturbed by the wondering glances of the passersby. They are becoming accustomed even to the camera. They point out the persons in line who may be known as year in and year out stand-in-liners. If a well known critic or musician passes along, as often happens there are scores in the line who know him.

may dread
rst days of ng of cross and ice, at lassachusetts is dread.
f the typical rt is not to
to hear the on Friday

rchestra was en in their
the orches-
of mercury ear the zero
the storage and motion-
policeman

music lovers, true to his creed.

The rush at the hebdomadary rehearsals of the Symphony is almost as much a Boston institution as the Symphony orchestra itself, and week in and week out the stand-in-liners are living up to the best traditions of the institution.

What It Means in Winter.

It doesn't take any great amount of love for music to make a person stand in line two or three hours in the early autumn, when furs are ample protection against searching winds and overcoats keep a man warm enough. It has been a fad with some persons to do the trick just for the doing of it and for the gathering of material for little boasts afterward.

Those fair-weather enthusiasts drop away at this time of year. An everyday sort of love for music will not keep a person in the rush line when he must stand in two or three inches of snow, when the pavements are wet and the water soaks through to the feet in a way to make the average person think of pneumonia, and when it is necessary to stand or sit in a cramped position and hold up an umbrella to keep off the rain and the drippings of the neighboring umbrella.

It may be that in any city but Boston no considerable group of persons would be found with large enough musical egos to bear those little hardships. It all justifies very strikingly the statements of the "psychologist who writes like a novelist," Prof. William James of Harvard, that in Boston many persons feel bound to cultivate a musical ego.

A craving for the best music to be heard in the United States, and as good as is to be heard anywhere in the world, plus the chance to save money—to get more than 25 cents' worth of entertainment and instruction for a quarter—are the things that lead persons to the rush line and keep them there for hours.

That there is no lack of money among some of the stand-in-liners is shown by their conversation with the Symphony attendants after the last of the fortunate 505 has smiled at those who were so near and are yet so far. They have offered the Symphony attendants $2, $3 and $4 for a seat inside, and the attendants have to refuse gently and firmly. These fallings away from the spirit of the true stand-in-liner are not uncommon, but there are no records in the archives of $4 doing what 25 cents could not do.

On the days of days, the occasions when the famous soloists are to appear, the line may form as early as 8 o'clock. When the rush to the city is on, and cars loaded to the doors with men and women going to work bowl along the Huntington avenue boulevard, the early comers of the stand in-liners are up on the steps of Symphony Hall, as near as may be to the doors.

Additions come singly and in groups. They form a line along the top step. The overflow extends along on the second, and winds in and out until the whole space is so jammed that there is hardly room for another. They are beneath the very walls of the temple of music, and they are sure of being in the forefront of the rush at 1:30.

By 12 o'clock there may be many more than the fortunate 505 in the long line extending down the avenue. There have been as many as 1000 men, women and children in the ranks, and they usually stay to the last, hoping against hope that something will happen to give them a chance at a seat inside at 1:30.

The only seats to be had outside are those furnished by the cold stone steps. The enthusiasts have with them a little basket or bagful of lunch, papers or books to read and newspapers to make cushions on the steps. There is an inviting apothecary shop directly across the road, where hot chocolate and soups are to be had with salted biscuits, but none of that is for the stand-in-liners. It is an inviolate rule of the rush line that once a person leaves his place he forfeits all right to it, and must take up his station at the very end of the column.

THE LONG LINE.

SHE FELT SURE OF GETTING IN.

GETTING IMPATIENT.

The only solace in the way of support on the sidewalk is the rail fence, and against that have leaned hundreds of weary persons, wondering if they may not perhaps get in. There is no chance even to sit on the curbstone. The children in the windows of the nearby hospital look at them wonderingly, and have a little pleasure all their own every Friday. Proxies are unheard of in the line. The messenger boy who used to hold a place by night in the long lines of Morris chairs at Harvard just before the sale of football tickets has no entry here.

And Everybody Is Contented.

A look at the line shows all sorts of persons. There are some poorly dressed. There are children who have been lugged along by parents or brothers and sisters. There are students conning their books. There are men with eyes on the sporting pages of the newspapers. There are women who look to be septuagenarians, men whose hair and beards are white. There are rosy-cheeked girls, students at the New England Conservatory of Music, who chat and laugh and believe that they are on a great lark. There are youths who affect the bohemian habit as to their hats and their hair. There are staid looking men whom one would expect to see behind desks, adding up rows of figures, rather than adding to the number of those who have come too late.

And nearly everybody seems perfectly content, no matter what the weather may be, and no matter how many hours of waiting are ahead. They are usually entirely undisturbed by the wondering glances of the passersby. They are becoming accustomed even to the camera. They point out the persons in line who may be known as year in and year out stand-in-liners. If a well known critic or musician passes along, as often happens, there are scores in the line who know him.

The ranks begin to close up and to be more regular as the hour for opening approa Three or four policemen from the Back Bay tion are on hand, and two or three of the S phony Hall attendants. The necks of those the rear stretch out to take still another look the distressingly long line in front. Then doors are open, and the whole line begin dribble up beyond the big pillars.

The principle of "first come, first serv which obtains in the forming of the line, is served inside. The person who buys the ticket gets no coupon. He must trust to his to take him quickly to the most desirable It may be that the second or third man at ticket office gets the best. But there is no seemly rush, even after the tickets are bou the courtesy which prevails outside being proper thing all the time. "Rush line" is re a misnomer.

An Unwritten Code Prevails.

Two women from Winthrop are pointed o usually the first comers. They think nothi being at their posts as early as 8 o'clock. policemen and the clerks in the stores ne have come to know them by sight. They ar indication, in a measure, of the length the will have by half-past 1. If they are unusua early, the indications are for a line of at les hundred or two more than can be accommod It was a matter of comment among the po men a few weeks ago when one of them c late and was not in even the first hundred mitted. On "off days" persons may come as as 1 o'clock or half-past 1, hoping that the seats will not all be taken. As often as not, t may find that there is no hope.

Semi-occasionally there are breaches of the written statutes made and provided. Two three weeks ago a young man, totally ignor the precedents established years ago and ri ously adhered to, dropped out of his proper p in one of the lines near the bottom step slipped up ahead of 20 or 30 persons who sho have had their choice of seats before him. policemen and the attendants have usually easiest of tasks, however, the code of the st in-liners being of a kind that gives no occa for even little disputes. The policemen bec accustomed to the stand-in-line phenomenon ago, but they can't understand why persons in line for hours on the cold days when t themselves are chilled.

The persons who occupy the floor and first cony seats have had them in advance, and the is nothing in their entrance to the hall wh may not be seen in the lobby of a theatre nights of the week. They do not come until h or three-quarters of an hour after their fortunate brothers and sisters are resting in well earned second balcony seats, waiting for opening at 2:30. There is no great dissimilar in the appearance of the two classes, and t are alike in one respect—most of them are wom

[193]

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 25

BSO

1907 - 1908

B
LRD

#12

HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS
3 MILK STREET, OLD SOUTH BUILDING, BOSTON.

Job No. Z250
Duplicate this book by sending the above number

BLANK PAGE

THE SUNDAY HERALD---

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 15, 1907

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

Announcement of Sales of Tickets for Rehearsals and Concerts.

The auction sales of seats for the coming season of the Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Oct. 1. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 3, and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 4. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 o'clock. The usual rules will prevail. The seats will be sold as they are situated in the hall and will go to those bidding the highest premium over the upset price. The maximum number of seats sold under one bid will be four.

As in the past 24 years, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, coming on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except six when the orchestra will be out of town. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, respectively.

Full announcement regarding the plans of the season will be made in advertisements to be found in the Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning papers of Sept. 21 and 22.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE-

SEPTEMBER 15, 1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The auction sales of seats for the coming season of the Symphony orchestra will open at Symphony hall Monday morning, Sept 30, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday, Oct 1. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold Thursday, Oct 3, and the $10 seats for the concerts Friday, Oct 4. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 o'clock, and the usual rules will prevail.

The seats will be sold as they are situated in the hall, and will go to those bidding the highest premium over the upset price. The maximum nu nber of seats sold under one bid will be four. As in the past 24 years, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, coming successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except six when the orchestra will be out of town. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be give Friday afternoon, Oct 11, and Saturday evening. Oct 12, respectively.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SEPTEMBER 15, 1907

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The auction sales of seats for the coming season of the Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 30, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Oct. 1. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 3, and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday, Oct. 4. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 o'clock. The usual rules will prevail. The seats will be sold as they are situated in the hall and will go to those bidding the highest premium over the upset price. The maximum number of seats sold under one bid will be four.

As in the past 24 years, there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, coming on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except six when the orchestra will be out of town. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, respectively.

From .....

Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date .....

Establi

It is very doubtful if Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work. The last news that C. A. Mills, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano, which he will play on his tour of this country, which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one, and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties, which will appear on his programmes.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Establishe

Ten Concerts, Five Orchestras

Novel Programme for a Winter's Music

HOFMAN, SCHELLING, GADSKI, PACHMAN, CARRENO AND NIELSEN AMONG THOSE TO BE HEARD IN CINCINNATI —"THE MESSIAH" A FEATURE OF CHRISTMAS SEASON.

Plans for the season of the Cincinnati Orchestra association are so far perfected that it is possible to speak of them with certainty. A series of ten different concerts will be given during the winter months. These concerts will be five matinee and five evening performances, presented by five different orchestras. The novelty of the situation will be that at each performance a different programme will be offered. On November 18 and 19 the Chicago orchestra, Ferdinand Stock, conductor, will open the season. For these concerts, Josef Hofman, pianist, will be the soloist.

On December 6 and 7 the Russian Symphony orchestra of New York will be heard with Ernest Schelling, pianist, in two concerts of Russian music. These concerts will be of exceptional interest from the fact that director and musicians composing the band are chiefly Russians and their specialty is quite consistently playing the music of Russian composers. The New York Symphony orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will appear for their share of the symphonic season on January 8 and 9. The soloist for these concerts has not yet been decided, but there is every probability that some one of the great singers, Gadski or one of her artistic calibre, will be heard on these occasions. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give two concerts, afternoon and evening, on January 31 and Feb. 1. The concert of this famous band at Music Hall last season is still recalled as one of the most brilliant episodes of an unusually brilliant musical season. If there was a drop of bitterness in the cup, it was that this technically perfect organization played for us a concert of entirely modern music, when we were athirst for the classics. But for this season the Boston people have promised to play us the music we like to hear from them. The January and February concerts of the symphony season may safely be anticipated as those likely to offer a classical programme. On February 28 and 29 the Pittsburg orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor, will conclude the orchestral season, which will at least have all the charm that novelty of plan and variety of offering can comprise.

Two concerts which are announced or early in the autumn are the piano recitals of Vladimir de Pachman, which is anticipated for a date in October, and that of Theresa Carreno in November.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go west for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programs.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Establi

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

Conried's New Conductor—Caruso in Vienna—"Tannhäuser" and Berlin—Texan Pianists—A Word for the Guitar—American Musical Instruments—Dangerous Song Recitals—Joachim Anecdotes

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Columbus will each have one, and Cincinnati will have two on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him an interesting lot of novelties, which will appear on his programmes.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Ernest Schelling, the pianist, will play his new fantastic suite for piano and orchestra with the Konzert Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg's direction, on Oct. 10. He will play the work during the week following at one of the Museum Concerts in Frankfort, and then start for America, where he has been invited by Dr. Muck to play his new work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Schelling's tour will begin in the Middle West, and he will not reach New York until the holidays.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Establ

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one, and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties, which will appear on his programmes. An unusual number of new faces will be seen in the orchestra next season. The year's leave of absence given to the concert master, Prof. Willy Hess, and the resignation of Timothee Adamowski, will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Prof. Hess' place will be Karl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, and of the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. In Mr. Adamowski's place will be Julius Thornberg, of Copenhagen. The vacancy in the first violins, caused by the death of Arnold Moldauer, will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. A new viola will share the first desk of that section of the orchestra, with Emile Ferir, in place of Max Zach, who has been appointed conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. There will be a new bass clarinet in place of Mr. Prietsche, who died last spring, a new bassoon, two new horns, this giving the orchestra a full complement of eight, and a new tuba. There will be some other minor changes in the string choir.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Establ

Silence as to the Musical Season.

The plenitude of announcements in the journals of other cities bearing upon the outlook for the musical season places Providence in a position of awkward contrast, since for this locality no definite arrangements seem to have been made as yet for the season's concerts. Either we are to have none of the artists with us this winter or those who undertake the management of musical affairs are "lying low," prepared to spring their announcements ensemble. In view of the exceptionally brilliant season last winter, which afforded Providence many and excellent concerts, all of which were well patronized, it would seem a pitiful retrogression if musical opportunities here were not to be even richer this winter than heretofore.

One attraction is certain, though it has remained for announcement of it to come from Boston, that of the Symphony Concerts. They are to be only three in number—a meagre allowance for Providence, which could easily support a longer season and thereby bring itself into the class of other cities of its size where the Boston organization is heard in ten or a dozen concerts every winter.

The musicians that are visiting America this year are legion, many of them the newer claimants to fame who have won part of their laurels in Providence in recent seasons, and others, the artists who are the world's foremost and should be induced to appear here again. There are newcomers, too, whom Providence should have an opportunity to enjoy. It is early, of course, for the entire season to be announced, but it is waxing late for no signs of activity to be evident. The musical growth of the city was proven in more ways than by its patronage of the concerts last year, an increased appreciation of chamber music and other evidence of a more widely appreciative taste for the concert in all its forms evidencing the presence of a larger body of the musically educated; and if the present delay means anything it may certainly be hoped that it means an extended and varied season for the many people who await only the opportunity of musical enjoyment and culture to avail themselves of it.

From TRIBUNE

Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date SEP 13 1907

Establ

MUSICIANS' WINTER PLANS.

Karl Muck to Sail Soon for America —Artists' Bookings.

Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with the new symphony on which the has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that Mr. C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano which he will play on his tour of the country which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programmes.

[3]

From TIMES

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date Sep 15 190?

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Elaborate plans for the musical edification of the metropolis during the coming season have been formulated, and an incident of promising interest to Brooklyn is that it will have twice the usual number of orchestral concerts. Heretofore five such concerts have been given at the Baptist Temple by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will again be heard during the coming season in a like series. In addition, there will be five concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, which has recently become a permanent organization, devoting its attention exclusively to high-class orchestral concerts.

In a review of a concert by the New York Orchestra at the Baptist Temple in March last the Brooklyn Times said: "Why may we not have a series of concerts here by this orchestra, to supplement those by the Boston Orchestra? Brooklyn could well afford two such series, and the programmes could be so arranged as to meet a broad demand in public taste. How about this Brooklyn Institute?" That the time is ripe for giving reality to the purport of this suggestion has evidently been recognized, and it is fair to presume that the double series will have a good effect upon Brooklyn. Possibly the new order of things will inaugurate a brighter outlook, which may be expected to give a reminiscent aspect to interest in musical affairs, leading up to what may be called a rallying optimism to be focused by the new Academy of Music.

This double series of concerts will give opportunity for a diversity in programmes that will meet a local desire, and there need be no ground for unpleasant comparison between the two orchestras, providing the programmes are arranged to avoid exact similarity in musical scope. The Boston Orchestra is in a class by itself, and has maintained a position of the first importance, by holding consistently to an artistic ideal. It has been intimated that this orchestra might adapt its undertakings to the general average of public taste. But this is on the way to uphold the highest standard, and such intimations have been ignored, as they should be. The New York Orchestra has done excellent work, and under the new dispensation, which permits of the exclusive control of its members, it will no doubt go forward to greater excellence. Brooklyn can well afford to give adequate support to both orchestras.

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date SEP 15 190

Est.

Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his not completing his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano which he will play on his tour of the country which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over a hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programmes.

From

Address

Date

Establis

Est 1884

Notizen aus dem Kunstleben.

Die Pläne des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters für die kommende Saison liegen nunmehr vollständig vor. Das berühmte Orchester wird in Boston wie üblich 24 öffentliche Generalproben und ebenso viele Konzerte veranstalten, in New York wie üblich 10 Konzerte, in Cambridge 6, in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore und Washington je 5, in Providence und Worcester je 3. Einige Konzerte in mehreren anderen Städten hinzugerechnet, wird das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester in der kommenden Saison über 100 Konzerte zu absolviren haben. In der letzten Januarwoche gehen die Bostoner für 6 Konzert-Aufführungen nach dem Westen, wobei Cincinnati, Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis und Columbus berücksichtigt werden sollen. Herr Dr. Muck, welcher auch in der kommenden Saison das berühmte Orchester leiten wird, wird in der zweiten Hälfte des laufenden Monates Europa verlassen, um sich hierher zu begeben. Er hat mitgetheilt, daß er eine ganze Reihe hervorragender Novitäten mit sich bringe. Innerhalb des Rahmens des künstlerischen Personals des genannten Orchesters treten in der kommenden Saison bemerkenswerthe Veränderungen ein. Konzertmeister Prof. W. Heß ist auf ein Jahr beurlaubt und Herr Timothée Adamowski hat bekanntlich resignirt, wodurch die zwei ersten Violinen des Orchesters durch neue Männer besetzt werden mußten. An die Stelle Prof. Heß' tritt Herr Carl Wendling, bisher Konzertmeister des kgl. Hoftheaters in Stuttgart, an Stelle Adamowski's Herr Jul. Thornberg aus Kopenhagen. An Stelle des verstorbenen Herr Arnold Moldauer kehrt Herr Theodorowicz, welcher die Bostoner vor einigen Jahren verlassen hat, um als zweiter Geiger im Kneisel Quartett thätig zu sein, wieder zurück; an Stelle von Herrn Max Zach tritt Herr Emile Ferir als Bratschist. Ferner wird noch eine Baß-Clarinette (an Stelle des verstorbenen Herrn Frietsche), ein Fagott, zwei neue Hörner und eine Tuba, neu besetzt werden.

From Standard Union

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano which he will play on his tour of the country which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

From

Address

Date SEP 15

Establish

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester wird in diesem Winter eine Anzahl neuer Mitglieder aufweisen. Der einjährige Urlaub, den man Prof. Willy Heß bewilligt und die Resignation des Herrn T. Adamowski werden zwei neue erste Violinen bringen, und zwar Karl Wendling, Concertmeister des kgl. Theaters in Stuttgart und des Bayreuther Festspielhauses, und Herrn Jul. Thornberg von Kopenhagen. Die durch das Ableben Arnold Moldauer's erfolgte Vakanz unter den ersten Violinen wird von Herrn Theodorowicz, bisher zweite Violine des Kneisel-Quartetts, ausgefüllt werden. An Stelle des Herrn Max Zach wird auch ein neuer Violakünstler eintreten, desgleichen für den im Frühjahr verstorbenen M. Frietsche. Dr. Karl Muck, der Leiter des Orchesters, hat den Sommer in Dobelbad, Oesterreich, verbracht, ist eifrig mit der Zusammenstellung und dem Lesen neuer Partituren beschäftigt.

From Standard Union

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 15

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boton, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one, and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programmes.

From STAR

Address INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Date SEP 15 190

CHANGES IN BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An unusual number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. The year's leave of absence given to the concert master, Prof. Willy Hess, and the resignation of Mr.

Timothee Adamowski will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Prof. Hess's place will be Karl Wendling, concert mster of the Court Theater of Stuttgart and of the Baireuth Festival Theater. In Mr. Adamowksi's place will be Mr. Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen.

The vacancy in the first violin caused by the death of Mr. Arnold Moldauer will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. A new viola will share the first desk of that section of the orchestra with Mr. Emile Ferir in place of Mr. Max Zach, who has been appointed conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society.

There will be a new bass clarinet in place of Mr. Frietsche, who died last spring; a new basso and two new horns, thus giving the orchestra a full complement of eight, and a new tuba. There will be some other minor changes in the string choir.

Dr. Carl Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, has spent the summer at Dobelbad, in Austria. He returns to Berlin for a few days on Sept. 10 and will sail for this county toward the end of the month. All the new members of the orchestra that are coming from abroad were engaged by him. This work, together with the making of programs and the studying of new scores, has given him a busy summer.

From

Address

Date

Ernest Schelling, the pianist, will play his new Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra with the Konzert Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg's direction on October 10. He will play the work during the week following at one of the Museum Concerts in Frankfort, and then start for America, where he has been invited by Dr. Muck to play his new work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programs.

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Coming.

BOSTON, Sept. 14—(Special). — Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that Mr. C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano which he will play on his tour of the country which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

From

Address

Date

Cable Address, "Beike" New York — NEW YOR

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m ress

e SEP 15

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over a hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programme.

1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

t

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the usual 10 concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over 100. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programs.

From

Address

Date

Establis

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that Mr. C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason of his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano which he will play on his tour of the country, which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June. The orchestra will give five concerts in Baltimore.

From

Address

Date

Esta

Paderewski and His Symphony

Although there is still some hope that Paderewski will bring to this country with him the new symphony on which he has been at work, it is very doubtful, for the last news that Mr. C. A. Ellis, his manager, has from him indicates that it is not yet finished to his satisfaction. It will be remembered that he planned to come to America last season to play a few times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to hear his symphony produced by that organization. His failure to come was due entirely to his failure to complete his symphony, for the only reason for his then coming to America was to hear his new work played for the first time by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck. He is to bring, however, some new compositions for the piano, which he will play on his tour of the country, which begins in the end of October. Among these is a set of variations on an original theme which he played with great success in London last June.

1884

From

Address

Date

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and three each in Providence and Worcester.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

te SEP 1

1884;New Yor

[4]

k, 1884

From PHILADELPHIA, PA

Address

ate SEP 15

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the usual 10 concerts in New York, six in Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the Orchestra, as last year, will go West for concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one, and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, will play his new fantastic suits for piano and orchestra with the Konzert Gebouw Orchestra, of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg's direction, on October 10. He will play the work during the week following at one of the museum concerts in Frankfort, and then start for America, where he has been invited by Doctor Muck to play his new work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Est 1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

CHANGES IN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An unusual number of changes will be noted at the first concert of the Boston Symphony in this city. Concertmaster Willy Hess has gone to Europe on a year's leave of absence, and Timothee Adamowski resigned in the spring in order to make a long concert tour. This will leave the first desk to Karl Wendling, concertmaster from the Stuttgart Court Theatre and the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. Julius Thornberg, of Copenhagen, replaces Mr. Adamowski. Theodorowicz, second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, fills the vacancy in the first violins made by the death of Arnold Moldauer. A new viola player, a bass clarionet, a bassoon, two horns and a new tuba are among the minor changes in this famous organization. All were personally engaged by Dr. Karl Muck, who after spending the summer at Dobelbad, in Austria, sails for this country the end of this month.

Est 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dates Of The Concerts For This Winter.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts this winter in the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. Three soloists are announced—Paderewski, whose only appearance with the Orchestra it will be; Melba, whose only appearance in Baltimore it will be, and Theresa Carreno, the pianist. Details regarding the subscription sale will be announced in due time.

Esta 1884

From .....

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Date SEP 19 1907

MELBA COMING TO LYRIC

Paderewski Will Also Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts this winter in the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18.

Three soloists are announced—Mme. Nellie Melba, the prima donna; Ignace Paderewski and Mme. Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist.

It is announced that this will be Melba's only appearance in Baltimore the coming season, and that it will be Paderewski's only appearance with the orchestra.

Esta

From NEW YORK EV'G POST

Address .....

Date SEP 21 1907

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

The Russell Opera Company—Pachmann's Advice to Critics—Lucky Louis Lombard—Viking Music—Paderewski—Opera in England—The "Mikado" and the Shoguns—Grieg—Joachim and Liszt—Paganini's Violin

Paderewski will make his only appearance with an orchestra in New York this season with that of the Boston Symphony Society. Other soloists will include Anton Van Rooy, Theresa Careño, Fritz Kreisler, and Carl Wendling. The subscription sale will open at Carnegie Hall October 14.

Estab

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1907

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

MUSIC AND DRAMA

EIGHT OR EIGHT-FIFTEEN AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A Plea for a Later Beginning That Better Suits the Habits of Their Public—The New Members of the Kneisel Quartet—Hall Caine, the New "Christian" and the London Reviewers—News of the Local Theatres—A Future for One-Act Plays

Is there a single good and obvious reason, except the unbroken custom of twenty-six years, why the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should begin at eight o'clock, instead of the more convenient eight-fifteen? Not one of the concerts of last season continued more than two hours, and most of them ended by half-past nine or a quarter to ten. With a beginning at eight-fifteen scarcely two of them would have lasted beyond ten o'clock, and there is no reason to suppose that Dr. Muck will make any lengthier programmes for the new season than he has in the past. A relatively small part of the audience at the concerts of Saturday evening comes from the remoter suburbs. Ten o'clock is not a late hour at which to ask such hearers to make their way homeward, and, with a beginning at eight-fifteen, they would gain a quarter of an hour in their coming to the concerts, when leeway in time is often more useful and agreeable. As everyone knows, the dinner hour tends to become later and later among that part of the community whence the public of the evening concerts comes. On Saturdays, if it is "going on" to Symphony Hall, it must dine earlier than usual, dine a little hurriedly, or reach the concert too late to hear the first number except through the cracks of the closed doors. No one goes to a concert as cheerfully or as receptively when he or she has made top speed in dressing or at dinner in order to reach it on time. It is a wise manager that humors his public in such things, and while fifteen minutes is little in itself, in that little often lies the difference between comfortable and uncomfortable preparation. Grumbling over too early a beginning has long been a weekly pastime from October through April in the corridors of Symphony Hall.

Thanks to Dr. Muck—and his cigarette—late-comers last winter had the consoling assurance of at least five minutes' leeway. They would be much more consoled did they know that their grace was not dependent upon the rate of combustion in the conductor's cigarette, but upon an official largess of fifteen minutes more. Besides, when the orchestra goes to New York, or Philadelphia, or Chicago, its concerts begin at eight-fifteen and sometimes the programmes are longer than they are in Boston. Wisely it does not disarrange the habits of its hearers in those cities by the bidding of them to concerts at eight o'clock. Its public at home as a rule dines no earlier, and has no shorter journey to make to the concert room. Yet it insists that we must be in our places at eight. In every large American city, except Boston, the established hour for the beginning of concerts is eight-fifteen, and it seems to satisfy audiences and performers equally. In Boston last season, at chamber and other concerts, there was a distinct and welcome tendency toward the later hour. If the Symphony Orchestra were to adopt it for the new season, the change would be definitely accomplished. To be "peculiar" in these things in the Boston of 1907 is also to be—a little provincial.

H. T. P.

From .....

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 21 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of five concerts in the Baptist Temple of this city during the coming musical season. As in the past the concerts will be given on Friday evenings. The dates are as follows: November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. The soloists announced for Brooklyn are Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be, Fritz Kreisler and Teresa Carreno. Full details regarding the sale will be published in due time.

Estab 1884

From CITIZEN

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 21 1907

Anna Otten, the violinist and Clara Otten, the pianist of the Otten String Quartet, spent the summer in Europe, whence they recently returned, bringing with them a younger sister, who will be the 'cellist of the quartet this season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of five concerts in the Baptist Temple of this city during the coming musical season. As in the past, the concerts will be given on Friday evenings. The dates are as follows: Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21, and March 20. The soloists announced for Brooklyn are: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be; Fritz Kreisler and Theresa Carreno. Full details regarding the sale will be published in due time.

Estab 884

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1907

PADEREWSKI, MELBA AND CARRENO, SOLOISTS WITH THE SYMPHONY

The first symphony concerts of the season of 1907-1908 will be given on the afternoon of Oct. 11, and the evening of Oct. 12. The auction sale of seats for the concerts will begin Sept. 30, at 10 a.m. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the sale of the $10 rehearsal seats will begin. The $18 seats for Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Oct. 3, beginning at the same hour, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules covering the sales in the past will prevail.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive in New York Oct. 1. There will be 16 new members this year, and the total membership of the orchestra will be 98, an increase of two over last year. By death and resignation the orchestra has lost since the close of last season five members. Mr. Timothee Adamowski's successor will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen. In place of Mr. Moldauer will be Julius Theodorowicz. Mr. Josef Adamowski's successor will be A. Arthus Kautzenbach, a distinguished 'cellist from Berlin. Dr. Muck has chosen Mr. Zach's successor, but has not sent his name over.

It may be authoritatively stated that no plans whatever have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra in 1908-1909. Everybody who has the interest of the orchestra at heart hopes sincerely that arrangements may be made during the coming winter thereby Dr. Muck will continue in the position he is filling so admirably. The management is not sanguine that this end can be attained, but nothing will be left undone to retain him in Boston.

MME. MELBA,
Who will be Symphony soloist sometime in January.

The general scheme of the season calls for a few more than 100 concerts, about the same number as last year. Of these 48 (including the public rehearsals) will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. The series of Boston concerts begins on the afternoon of Oct. 11, and ends on the evening of May 2.

TERESA CARRENO,
The woman pianist who has not been in this country for years.

The problem of soloists for symphony concerts has become very difficult to solve. Of first-class singers, there are hardly any in the market. Practically all that are in America for the season belong to one or the other of the operas in New York. As both of these operas give six or seven performances a week, it is difficult to get them to release a singer for the four days necessary for an appearance with the orchestra in Boston, and when they do the prices are appalling.

The plans of the orchestra for the coming season call for at least 12 soloists of the very highest possible grade, so that there can be absolutely no chance of failure and criticism. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of another if he can be secured. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be soloist at one of the early concernts, and in January Madame Melba will sing.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, and this year there is no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America at the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give 80 concerts in various parts of the country. Second only to Paderewski in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno, after an absence of several years. From all accounts her playing still has the distinguishing marks that made her the greatest of women pianists.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master, will, of course, appear among the soloists, as will his colleague at the first desk.

From .....

Address TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 21 1907

In addition to a series of five concerts, one a month, beginning on November 8, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be a series of five afternoon concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, beginning on November 23. Dr. Muck will again conduct the Boston Orchestra this season, having obtained a further leave of absence from the German Emperor to enable him to do so, and the New York Orchestra, which has become a permanent organization, claiming the exclusive attention of the members, continues under the direction of Walter Damrosch. Among the soloists to appear with the Boston Orchestra are Paderewski and Mme. Carreno. With the New York Orchestra will appear Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Emilio de Gogorza and others of recognized standing.

Estab

ess .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati two.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FACT AND FORECAST ABOUT THE NEW SEASON

The Usual Arrangements in the Routine of the Concerts—A Considerable Change in the Personnel of the Band and the Reasons for It—A Word About the New Comers and a Roster of the Orchestra—No Programmes as Yet from Dr. Muck—The Changing Policy as to Soloists and the Justification of It—Visions of the Future—Dr. Muck's Continuance Beside last season, the new year of the Symphony Orchestra begins in comparative routine. Last autumn Dr. Muck came from Berlin as a conductor new to Boston, and to all America, whose just reputation in Germany and throughout northern Europe had hardly preceded him. Now his prestige is established, alike in Boston and in every city that the orchestra visits, as one of the ablest of conductors in general, and unquestionably the ablest conductor now at work in America. His talents and the results of them, his traits and his temperament, have all commended him. He has won and held his public alike by the merit of his work and the charm of his personality. A year ago the prices for seats at the concerts were appreciably raised. This autumn there will be no change in the charges then established. Last winter the orchestra made its first Western journey in years. Next January it repeats the venture, and hereafter a "Western trip" is likely to be an annual part of its itinerary. In the announcements of last September the number of assisting singers and virtuosi was materially decreased from that of many preceding years. For the new season, the management of the orchestra continues in the same policy. It also announces the addition of two horn-players to the band, raising the number of that choir to eight, and that of the orchestra to ninety-eight. Deaths, resignations and retirements among the men have brought fourteen other changes, and it is some years since there has been so considerable an alteration in the personnel of the band. Dr. Muck has already sent to Boston the names of the new players that he has chosen for the vacancies. As yet, however, he has sent no programmes, or any list of the new compositions that he intends to include in them. On that score, therefore, the annual announcement is barren.

THE USUAL ARRANGEMENTS

The twenty-four afternoon concerts of the orchestra in Boston for this, its twenty-seventh year, will begin in Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 11, and continue through Friday, May 1, but there will be no concerts on the Fridays of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Jan. 31, Feb. 21 and March 20, when the band will be playing in other cities, and on April 17, the Friday of Holy Week. Then, as usual, the afternoon concert will be shifted to Thursday. The twenty-four evening concerts will begin on Saturday, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall and continue through Saturday, May 2; but there will be no concerts on the Saturdays of Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 21, when the orchestra will be busy outside Boston. Presumably in the course of the winter the band will give its two concerts on Sunday evenings for the increase of its pension fund, and possibly an extra concert or two, when exceptional circumstances, like the visit of an eminent conductor or composer, invite it. Presumably, too, the afternoon concerts will begin as heretofore at 2.30, and the evening concerts at eight. There has been no change, moreover, in the minor rules and regulations that govern them. The prices of seats remain those established last year—$18 and $10—according to the place and plus the premiums of the auction, for the full season. For the afternoon concert, seats at $18 will be sold at Symphony Hall on Monday, Sept. 30, beginning at ten o'clock, and the seats at $10 in the same place and at the same hour on Tuesday, Oct. 1. For the evening concerts, the seats at $18 will be sold in Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 3, beginning at ten o'clock, and the seats at $10 in the same place and at the same hour, on Friday, Oct. 4. On all four days the auction will be conducted precisely as it has been in previous years.

Outside Boston, the orchestra will make its monthly journeys, from November through March, to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In New York it will give ten concerts, with every likelihood that for them Carnegie Hall will be filled to the last seat, and for the most part by subscription, as is Symphony Hall in Boston. More and more New York speaks and writes of our orchestra as though it were one of its own bands. In each of the other cities named the orchestra will give five concerts, and in all of them an established public awaits it. The Western journey fills the week of Jan. 27, and in the course of it, the band will play in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, and twice in Cincinnati. Chicago, it seems, though the orchestra was enthusiastically received there last winter, has no place in the new itinerary. Nearer home, Dr. Muck and his men will give occasional concerts in Worcester, Providence and other cities of New England, with the usual series at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. In all the scheme for the new season provides for a hundred concerts and a few more—a generous year's work, but one that in the past the orchestra has thoroughly accomplished.

THE CHANGES IN THE PERSONNEL

So much for custom and routine. The innovation, so to say, for the new year is the considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra. Two horn-players, as already noted, have been added to it to make the double quartet of these instruments that ultra-modern music of large dimensions oftener and oftener asks and to free the conductor from dependence upon extra men. One of the new players, Karl Schmid of Vienna, becomes the first horn of the band. For the remaining changes, death has taken Mr. Moldauer from the first violins, where he had served almost from the beginnings of the orchestra, and Mr. Frietsche from his place as bass clarinetist. Mr. Hess, the concert master, has leave of absence for a year, to appear as a virtuoso in Germany. Mr. Timothée Adamowski, his companion at the first desk, has left the band to cultivate chamber music, and his brother, Josef, for the same purpose has resigned from the choir of 'cellos. Mr. Sokoloff, of the first violins, has also resigned to pursue further studies with Mr. Loeffler. Mr. Zach, one of the first violas, pianist as well, when Berlioz or d'Indy added a piano to the orchestra, and player upon the celesta in new music, has been chosen as conductor of the Choral Symphony Society in St. Louis, and in his departure the orchestra has lost one of its most useful men. The other changes from the former personnel have been made—to put the matter bluntly—"for the good of the service."

Dr. Muck came fresh to the orchestra. Naturally he watched his men closely, listened to them intently, estimated their capacity carefully, and tried them both by their individual skill and their worth to their particular choir and to the band as a whole. Instinct, training and experience has made Dr. Muck acute in these things. He has formed his judgments and he has acted accordingly, and in each and every case, hard as it may be for those affected and for their friends to believe, he has a single and wholly sincere motive, to better the quality of the particular choir and raise the general efficiency of the orchestra. Every organized body of ninety odd men tends to fall into routine. It needs on occasion to be scrutinized and sifted. Dr. Muck has accomplished this scrutiny and sifting. As the final authority, responsible for the discipline, the efficiency and the prestige of the orchestra, he has spoken the decisive word. Happily most of the players who have thus been retired and who have served long and well, are enjoying their share of the pension fund, which, by the generosity of the public of the concerts, is now fulfilling its excellent purpose.

Most of the new members of the orchestra will come from Europe, and Dr. Muck has diversified what passes for the leisure of the summer in the discovery and the choice of them—a long and trying task, made the more exacting by the keen competition of the Continental orchestras for able men and their common unwillingness to let their players pass over sea. For example, Dr. Muck believed he had found a violinist to succeed Mr. Adamowski, but the Conservatory at Vienna, which counted him its best teacher of the violin, refused to release him. In Copenhagen Dr. Muck made a second choice, and then sickness deprived him of the expected recruit, and now at last he has found a third fit to take his place among the virtuosi of our orchestra. Dr. Muck knows well the quality of the more distinguished members of the orchestras of Germany, Austria and northern Europe, and from them, testing them by severe standards, he has drawn most of the players that next month come newly to Boston. From the opera house and the orchestral concerts of Stuttgart and from the Festival Theatre at Baireuth, he has taken the new concert master, Carl Wendling, whom he chose, last spring, as one of the few men particularly fitted for the place. A telegram that reached Boston only yesterday announced that Mr. Czerwonky is to succeed Mr. Adamowski, but gave no particulars concerning him. Mr. Theodorowicz, the accomplished violinist, once of the orchestra and long of the Kneisel Quartet, takes Mr. Moldauer's chair. Mr. Ribarsch replaces Mr. Sokoloff, and Mr. Traupe, already of the orchestra, passes to the first violins. The new second violins are Mr. Goldstein and Mr. Rennert, whom Dr. Muck found in Boston. Berlin gave him the 'cellist, Mr. Kautzenbach, who succeeds Josef Adamowski, and Vienna provided the new double basses, Messrs. Agnesy and Huber. Mr. Zach's successor among the violas is Mr. Scheurer; and Mr. Stumpf is the new bass clarinetist. Mr. Litke, formerly a member of the orchestra, joins the bassoons, and Mr. Helleberg, at need, takes the contra-bassoon. Mr. Heim, the new trumpeter of last spring, remains with the band, and Mr. Lorenz now takes the tuba.

One of the new horn players is still unchosen. With that omission, the roster of the orchestra for the new season will run as follows:

First Violins—Carl Wendling, concertmeister, Mr. Czerwonky, O. Roth, D. Kuntz, J. Theodorowicz, W. Krafft, J. Hoffmann, G. Strube, F. Mann, H. Eichheim, Eledler, R. Rissland, A. Bak, A. Ribarsch, W. Traupe, J. C. Mullaly.

Second Violins—C. Barleben, J. Akeroyd, P. Fiumara, W. W. Swornsbourne, H. Tischer-Zeit, H. Goldstein, E. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, J. E. Eichler, A. Kuntz, B. Fiedler, B. Rennert, F. Currier.

Violas—Mr. Scheurer, E. Férir, H. Heindl, G. F. Sauer, A. Kolster, F. Zahn, H. Hoyer, M. Kluge O. H. Krauss, A. Gietzen.

Violoncellos—H. Warnke, J. Keller, A. A. Kautzenback, E. Loeffler, R. Nagel, H. Heberlein, C. Barth, A. Heindl, A. Hadley, L. Nast.

Basses—K. Keller, M. Kunze, K. Agnesy, T. Seydel, E. Huber, G. Gerhardt, R. Schurig, S. Elkind.

Flutes—A. Maquarre, Paul Fox, A. Brooke, D. Maquarre, G. Longy, G. Sautet, C. Lenom.

English Horn—F. Müller.

Clarinets—Grisez, P. Mimart, A. Vannini.

Bass Clarinet—Mr. Stumpf.

Bassoons—P. Sadoni, E. Regestein, H. Sitke.

Contra-Bassoon—J. Helleberg.

Horns—A. Hackebarth, M. Hess, K. Schmid, H. Lorbeer, J. Phair, F. Hain, C. Schumann.

Trumpets—L. Kloepfel, G. Heim, J. F. Mann, C. Merrill.

Trombones—C. Hampe, A. Mäusebach, L. S. Kenfield.

Harp—H. Schuecker.

Tuba—H. W. Lorenz.

Tympani—A. Rettberg, F. Kandler.

Drum—C. R. Ludwig.

Cymbals, Triangle, Etc.—T. Senia, H. Burkhardt, J. F. Dworak.

Librarian—J. Sauerquell

THE PROGRAMMES

Of the programmes for the new season little can now be said. Dr. Muck has sent none as yet to Boston, and he is unlikely to announce any until he arrives here at the beginning of October. He has been diligent in the summer in the hearing of new music at the German festivals. The publishers have piled his table with their newest scores, while composers have still further heaped it with their manuscript. Friends have advised, doubtless, and acquaintances have suggested, but few conductors keep their own counsels more closely or follow them more straightforwardly than Dr. Muck. Unless he has suddenly changed his ways he has sought out by himself such new music as seems to deserve performance, and through the second half of last season he gave ample proof of his open-mindedness. At least the array of possible new compositions is tempting. For the French writers we have still to hear d'Indy's new tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," and not one of Albéric Maignard's applauded symphonies has yet been played in America. We in Boston have heard only one of Mahler's symphonies, and he adds one to their number almost every year. The rising young Germans write. Glazounoff and other prolific Russians are diligent. Sibelius's tone-poems we have still to hear—and the more eagerly for his symphony of last winter. We know nothing of the new generation of composers—Bantock, Holbrooke and the rest—who are emancipating and recreating English music. Josef Suk, the Bohemian, has written a symphony of Death that impressed German audiences last winter. And so forth and so on with other music that is interesting to hear. In the making of his programmes last winter Dr. Muck gave the classical composers ample place on his programmes, and with them and with the ultra-moderns kept the balance true between the old and the new, the familiar and the unfamiliar. Whether the hearer liked or disliked the method and the idiosyncrasies of the conductor's programmes, almost always they were interesting.

THE CHANGING POLICY WITH SOLOISTS

The time has long passed in which the Symphony Orchestra needed the glamor of the name of any singer or virtuoso to swell the audience at its concerts. Instead, the time has come when only singers and virtuosi of the first and of world-wide rank can appear with the orchestra and not bring a sense of incongruity. The wandering violinist, for example, who does not excel, or at least equal, the best of the violinists sitting behind him has no place at the Symphony Concerts. What his audience is accustomed to hear from its own people, so to say, mocks his efforts and leaves it dissatisfied. The days in which a concerto for violoncello, however well played, interests many hearers are passing, as those for concertos for oboes or for flutes passed long ago. The rank and file of touring pianists do not touch the standards of our concerts, and only the pianist of established distinction or of significant and rising individuality accords with his surroundings. The singer, however eminent, has little and ungrateful opportunity at the Symphony Concerts. Her "numbers"—to choose the more numerous sex—are sandwiched, and sometimes stifled, between orchestral pieces. She can sing but two at most. She can avail herself of few of the auxiliary arts that serve her in the opera house and have helped to make her reputation. She is a vocal anomaly in a concert that is primarily and insistently instrumental. To be of the quality and the rank that our concerts demand, she must oftenest come from one or the other of the opera houses of New York, and usually she comes hurriedly. Moreover, in them as everywhere else, the singing-actress is gradually replacing the singer pure and simple, and singing-actresses often have little liking and less aptitude for concerts. The singer displays her full and true powers not at an orchestral concert, but in the opera house or at the song recital. The opera house we lamentably lack, but for that reason it is hardly fair to expect the Symphony Orchestra to deploy the "stars" of Mr. Conried's and Mr. Hammerstein's companies before us. The song recitals we have in plenty.

Out of these conditions and considerations, and out of the increasing preoccupation of the audience with the orchestra and the music that it plays, has come the gradual reduction of the number of singers and virtuosi at the Symphony Concerts and the gradual raising of the standard that governs the choice of them. Through the new season hardly more than twelve of them will appear, and at least two—the new first violins, Mr. Wending and Mr. Czerwonky, will come from the orchestra itself. The other violinist engaged thus far, is Fritz Kreisler, by common agreement the most distinguished of the younger players upon his instrument. Needless to say the pianists chosen comprise Paderewski, Harold Bauer and Teresa Carreño, who revisits America after many years of absence. All three are established among the foremost pianists of our time. From the younger generation in turn come the highly individual Rudolf Ganz to play with the orchestra for the first time in Boston, the rising and interesting Mme. Samaroff, and Mme. Goodson, whose performance of Grieg's concerto last winter was genuinely impressive. With six pianists thus assured, no others are likely to be called. For singers only two are announced, and both are of the first rank, Mme. Melba, who comes in January, and Mme. Schumann-Heink, who has not sung with the Symphony Orchestra for some years. In due course, a "man singer," as the old phrase goes is likely to be engaged from one or the other opera house.

THE FUTURE

For twenty-six years years the Symphony Orchestra has given its concerts in Boston. Three weeks from yesterday it begins its twenty-seventh series of them. In all those years, through at least one, if not two, musical generations, the general scheme of the concerts has not materially changed. Yet in that time the whole face of musical conditions in Boston, in America, and in some respects in Europe, has gradually become altered. The "star" conductor has risen and, like the prima donna or the virtuoso, he now wanders up and down the earth, sharing the orchestras of the musical capitals of Europe and America with their regular conductors. In Paris and in London, as well as on occasion in Germany, choral music in its largest forms has begun to have a place in orchestral concerts. The opera has become firmly established in America, though our only opera houses are still in a single city. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become an established and famous institution—the foremost orchestra in America, ranking with the two or three best orchestras of Europe, and by the testimony of many a practiced and comparing hearer, outranking them. Its position is almost thrilling. It is one of the few things in the Boston of today that a cosmopolitan world knows and praises.

Its possibilities are as thrilling as its position. To set them beside the musical conditions of the hour in America and in Boston in particular is forthwith to dream dreams and to see fair visions. In one of these, the dreamer may find the great conductors of Europe coming to our orchestra for an occasional concert as they go now to M. Colonne's in Paris or to Mr. Wood's in London. In another the visionary fancies that he catches the sound of choral music performed in Symphony Hall by a chorus that matches the orchestra to which it has been joined. Yet again, for roseate and stirring climax, he may see the Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, and the rich, the cultivated, the loyal, the ambitious public of its concerts as the nucleus and the means to the opera house that Boston so much needs if it is to keep its place among musical capitals. For the first time the orchestra has at its head an operatic conductor of high rank and eager ambition. In a year he has found as eager a following. In him, and the possibilities of the band at his command and of the public that he has won, is the hope of opera in Boston. But will Dr. Muck continue at the head of the orchestra after the present season? No one knows. Every effort will be made to persuade him to continue in his post and to adjust conditions in Germany to permit his continuance. The decision will rest with him and with the powers that be in Berlin. His own voice is likely to be the most potent in the matter, and thus far he has given no sign of his plans and purposes beyond May of next year. And yet, and yet—would a conductor have so scrutinized and changed the personnel of his orchestra, so renewed nearly a fifth, and a very important, part of it, and largely sacrificed the leisure of his summer to such work, did he intend to continue here only through a single season? Dr. Muck loves reticence.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

SATURDAY MORNING.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1907

SOLOISTS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS ARE SCARCE

MELBA, PADEREWSKI AND CARRENO ENGAGED

New Faces Will Be Seen in the Orchestra to Fill Places of Artists Resigned.

The first symphony concerts of the season of 1907-1908 will be given on the afternoon of Oct. 11, and the evening of Oct. 12. The auction sale of seats for the concerts will begin Sept. 30, at 10 a.m. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the sale of the $10 rehearsal seats will begin. The $18 seats for Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Oct. 3, beginning at the same hour, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules covering the sales in the past will prevail.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is due to arrive in New York Oct. 1. There will be 16 new members this year, and the total membership of the orchestra will be 98, an increase of two over last year. By death and resignation the orchestra has lost since the close of last season five members. Mr. Timothee Adamowski's successor will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen. In place of Mr. Moldauer will be Julius Theodorowicz. Mr. Josef Adamowski's successor will be A. Arthus Kautzenbach, a distinguished 'cellist from Berlin. Dr. Muck has chosen Mr. Zach's successor, but has not sent his name over.

It may be authoritatively stated that no plans whatever have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra in 1908-1909. Everybody who has the interest of the orchestra at heart hopes sincerely that arrangements may be made during the coming winter thereby Dr. Muck will continue in the position he is filling so admirably. The management is not sanguine that this end can be attained, but nothing will be left undone to retain him in Boston.

The general scheme of the season calls for a few more than 100 concerts, about the same number as last year. Of these 48 (including the public rehearsals) will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. The series of Boston concerts begins on the afternoon of Oct. 11, and ends on the evening of May 2.

The problem of soloists for symphony concerts has become very difficult to solve. Of first-class singers, there are hardly any in the market. Practically all that are in America for the season belong to one or the other of the operas in New York. As both of these operas give six or seven performances a week, it is difficult to get them to release a singer for the four days necessary for an appearance with the orchestra in Boston, and when they do the prices are appalling.

The plans of the orchestra for the coming season call for at least 12 soloists of the very highest possible grade, so that there can be absolutely no chance of failure and criticism. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of [illegible] distinguishing [illegible] greatest of [illegible] violinists [illegible], who [illegible]. Carl [illegible], will, of [illegible], as will [illegible] her playing still has the distinguishing marks that made her the greatest of women pianists.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. C. Wendling, the new concert-master, will, of course, appear among the soloists, as will his colleague at the first desk,

Mme. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be a soloist at one of the early concerts, and in January Madame Melba will sing. The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, and this year there is no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America at the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give 30 concerts in various parts of the country. Second only to Paderewski in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno, after an absence of several years. From all accounts

[6]

SYMPHONY CONCERT ON OCTOBER 11

Dr. Muck, the Conductor, Sails from Germany Next Week.

CHANGES ANNOUNCED.

The first symphony concerts of the season of 1907-1908 will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The auction sales of seats for concerts will begin on Monday morning, Sept. 30, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the sale of the $10 rehearsals seats will begin. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday. Oct. 3, beginning at the same hour, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules covering the sales in the past will prevail.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, sails from Bremen on the Crown Prince Wilhelm on next Tuesday, Sept. 24, and is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday of the following week. On various ships on the ocean at the same time are coming the new members of the orchestra whom he has engaged during the past summer. There will be sixteen new members this year and the total membership of the orchestra will be ninety-eight, an increase of two over last year. By death and resignation the orchestra has lost since the close of last season five members. Those who died were Arnold Moldauer, one of the best known of the first violins; and Otto Frietsche, the bass clarionet. Those who resigned are Timothee Adamowski, the second concert master; his brother, Josef Adamowski, one of the 'cellos, and Max Zach, who was at the first desk of the viola section. Professor Willy Hess will also be an absentee and this year has a leave of absence to stay abroad until the fall of 1908.

As announced last spring, Professor Hess's substitute for the year will be Carl Wendling, who comes from Stuttgart, where he has for several years been concert master of the Court Theatre.

Timothee Adamowski's successor will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen. In place of Mr. Moldauer will be Julius Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra in 1903 to be second violin of the Kenisel Quartet, and having severel his connection with that organization, returns to Boston. Another new first violin will be A. Ribarsch of Vienna, and William Traube has been promoted from the second violin to the first. Josef Adamowski's successor will be A. Arthus Knutzenbach, a distinguished 'cellist from Berlin. Dr. Muck has chosen Mr. Zach's successor, but has not sent his name over.

Changes In Orchestra.

The other changes in the orchestra are briefly as follows: Two additional horns, making the complement of the orchestra a double quartet, Karl Schmid of Vienna being the new first horn; two new second violins, B. Rennert and H. Goldstein, both of this city; two new double basses, K. Agnesy and E. Huber, both of Vienna; a new second bassoon, H. Litke, formerly a member of the orchestra, but for several years a resident of New York; a new bass clarinet; a new tuba and two changes in the percussion section.

The season of 1906-1907, measured by whatever standard, was the most successful in the history of the orchestra, and there is no reason why the coming season should not show improvement on even its immediate predecessor.

The series of Boston concerts begins on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and ends on Saturday evening, May 2. The orchestra will be away the following Fridays and Saturdays: Nov. 8 and 9, Dec. 6 and 7, Jan. 10 and 11, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1, Feb. 21 and 22, and March 20 and 21. The 17th of AApril being Good Friday, after the established custom the rehearsal scheduled for that day will be given on the preceding afternoon, Thursday, April 16.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Esta 884

Orchestral Concerts.

There will be no dearth of orchestral music in this city and neighborhood during the season. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, undoubtedly the finest organization of its kind in the world, is booked for a concert in the Krueger Auditorium. Frank L. Sealy will conduct a series of four orchestral concerts by fifty or more musicians from the New York Symphony Orchestra in Wallace Hall. Encouraged by the interest shown in his efforts to provide worthy musical entertainment in the form of the young people's concerts, given in that hall last season, Conductor Sealy will strive to arrange such programs as will make the coming series even more fruitful in enjoyment than was the last.

Symphony Orchestra Season Opens Oct 11.

·PADEREWSKI·
·SOLOIST·

·TERESA·CARREÑO· ·SOLOIST·

·MME. MELBA·
·SOPRANO·

·FRITZ·KREISER· ·VIOLINIST·

·HAROLD·BAUER·
·PIANIST·

The first Symphony concerts of the season of 1907-1908 will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The auction sales of seats for the concerts will begin on Monday morning, Sept. 30, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning, at the same hour, the sale of the $10 rehearsal seats will begin. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday. Oct. 3, beginning at the same hour, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules covering the sales in the past will prevail.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, sails from Bremen on the Crown Prince Wilhelm next Tuesday. About at the same time are coming the new members of the orchestra whom he has engaged during the past summer. There will be sixteen new members this year and the total membership of the orchestra will be ninety-eight, an increase of two over last year. As announced last spring, Professor Hess's substitute for the year as concert-master will be Carl Wendling, who comes from Stuttgart, where he has for several years been concert-master of the Court Theater. He has also been concert-master of the Wagner Theater in Bayreuth, Mr. Timothee Adamowski's successor will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen. Mr. Josef Adamowski's successor will be A. Arthus Kautzenbach, a well-known 'cellist from Berlin. Dr. Muck has chosen Mr. Zach's successor, but has not sent his name over.

The season of 1906-1907 was the most successful in the history of the orchestra, and there is no reason why the coming season should not show improvement even on its immediate predecessor. The orchestra possesses in Dr. Muck a conductor who has shown rare qualities. It may be authoritatively stated that no plans whatever have been made concerning the conductorship in 1908-1909. Everybody who has the interest of the orchestra at heart hopes that arrangements may be made during the coming winter whereby Dr. Muck will remain. The management is not sanguine that this end can be attained, but nothing will be left undone to retain him in Boston.

The series of Boston concerts begins on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and ends on Saturday evening, May 2. The orchestra will be away the following Fridays and Saturdays: Nov. 8 and 9; Dec. 6 and 7; Jan. 10 and 11; Jan. 31 and Feb. 1; Feb. 21 and 22, and March 20 and 21. April 17 being Good Friday, the rehearsal scheduled for that day will be given on the preceding afternoon.

The plans for the coming season call for at least twelve soloists of the very highest possible grade, so that there can be absolutely no chance of failure and criticism. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of another if he can be secured. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be soloist at one of the early concerts, and in January Melba will sing. The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski and this year there is no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give eighty concerts in various parts of the country. Second in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno after an absence of several years. From all accounts her playing still has the distinguishing marks that have made her the greatest of women pianists. Another favorite returning is Harold Bauer; and a pianist new to symphony concerts, but one who has made a most favorable impression in Boston, is Rudolf Ganz. Olga Samaroff is scheduled to appear, as is Katharine Goodson, these artists representing the younger generation of women pianists.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master, will, of course, appear among the soloists, and so will his colleague at the first desk.

Dr. Muck, having discovered how Boston hungers and thirsts for new music, will probably bring with him a trunk full of new scores, and now that he knows Boston and its tastes it is certain that the Symphony patrons may look forward to even a more interesting season than last.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Esta 884

NO NEW ORCHESTRAS.

Up to the present writing there are no new orchestras announced, for which the gods be praised, and our old friends, with a notable exception, will not depart very greatly from the customs heretofore in vogue. The exception is the New York Symphony, under Walter Damrosch, which has been put upon a weekly salary basis and after its season in New York will be heard on tour as far as the Pacific coast.

The New York concerts will consist of the usual eight symphony concerts on Saturday nights, and twenty weeks of Sunday concerts also at Carnegie hall, with the best available soloists.

In the matter of soloists, Dr. Muck, who guides the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not as promising; on the contrary, the great German is absolutely opposed to them, and while he will not be so radical as to eliminate them altogether, he will modify the use of them, much to the dismay of the artists themselves, and quite as much, if not more, of the public. The usual ten concerts will be given, with one in Brooklyn between the Thursday and Saturday dates, which are November 7, 9, December 5, 7, January 9, 11, February 20, 22 and March 19, 21. There will be many changes in the personnel of the orchestra, beginning with the concert master, Karl Wendling, who will replace Willy Hess, who is on a year's furlough.

Theodorowicz, who resigned from the orchestra with the Kneisel quartet when that notable organization announced its declaration of independence, has returned to his old haunt and will be welcome anywhere he sees fit to cast his excellent work. Among the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy, Teresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler, Karl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be the Polish pianist's only appearance in New York with orchestra.

The New York Philharmonic society wil lenter its sixty-sixth year and its second year under the guidance of Wassili Safonoff, who is just returning from Moscow, where he spent the sumer with his family. The usual sixteen concerts will be given on the following dates: November 16, 16, 29, 30; December 13, 14; January 3, 4, 24, 25; February 7, 8, 28, 29, and March 13, 14. Katherine Goodson, who will be the pianist of the Worcester festival, will be one of the soloists with the Philharmonic.

it meant the breaking into ensemble of the new cellist and second violin, Willeke, from Vienna, and Julius Roentgen, who, in addition to being a violinist is a nephew of the celebrated inventor of the X rays.

The Olive Mead quartet which established itself among the foremost of chamber music organizations, will give its usual series in New York after a tour as far as the Northwest. These talented young women have set a pace hard to reach by any organization outside of the Kneisels.

The Flonzaley quartet, which is actually the possession of Mr. de Coppet, the millionaire, who takes his recreation and pleasure out of the chamber music organization, instead of horses, carriages and yachts, will be heard in public more fequently this season. They usually appear by courtesy of Mr. de Coppet, who contributes their services both for charity and for educational purposes.

AND THE SOLOISTS!

The flow of soloists to these shores is almost overwhelming. Indeed they are almost beyond recount. The pianists include Harold Bauer, Mark Hambourg, Josef Hofmann, Richard Buhlig, De Pachmann, Ernest Schelling, Paderewski, Katharine Goodson, Teresa Carreno, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, Jan Sickesz, Myrtle Elwyn, Rudolph Ganz, supplemented by several of our talented Americans such as Mme. Samaroff, Augusta Cottlow, Ernest Hutcheson and others.

Violinists seem almost as numerous and include Francis Macmillen, who will open the season at Carnegie hall October 6; Fritz Kressler, who will probably play 125 concerts; Kubelik, who will play a number of joint recitals with Mark Hambourg; Maud Powell, who holds the distinction of being the greatest violinist of her sex living, and Karl Klein, a young American violinist who will make his New York debut with the New York Symphony at Carnegie hall December 1. There will be two great 'cellists in the field, and we will probably hear Willeke, of the Kneisel quartet. These are Albert Rosenthal and Gerardy. The former is a nephew of the noted American painted, Toby Rosenthal, who has spent the past fifteen years in Italy. Singers—but why enumerate?

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Esta 884

Olga Samaroff's Hans Sachs.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who is again to make a tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston, is now in Munich, where she went for the Wagner and Mozart festivals. She spent the Summer in a little out-of-the-way village in the Bavarian Alps. She not only adopted the costume of the peasants, but learned their dialect as well, so that she became quite one of them.

Geraldine Farrar, her intimate friend, spent a part of the Summer with her. She told Mme. Samaroff if she would walk down Fifth avenue in this costume, especially the shoes, and let Miss Farrar kodak her, she could take what she pleased in Tiffany's—within reason, of course—and charge it to her. The shoes are real "Bergs" shoes, with soles a half inch thick and covered with great nails. The shoemaker is a most influential member of the village council and is always addressed as "Meister." His ship reminds one of Hans Sachs' shop in "Die Meistersinger."

When Mme. Samaroff went to order her shoes he drew forth with great majesty a huge volume which he laid on the floor. In this book are the footprints, as it were, of generations of villagers. When Mme. Samaroff put her foot on the blank page to be measured he grunted "Kinderfuss!" for, in comparison with the great, flat peasant feet the American woman's foot did seem like a child's.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will, during the coming season, give its usual quota of ten concerts in two series of five each in Carnegie Hall. The first series will be on the following Thursday evenings: Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 19. The second series will be given on Saturday afternoons, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22 and March 21. Dr. Karl Muck will, of course, be the conductor.

Among the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy, Theresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in New York with an orchestra.

SOLOISTS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND PROSPECTUS FOR THE SEASON

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR THIS SEASON AT THE CONCERTS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Conductor Muck Sails for America Next Tuesday---Great Demand for His Services on the Other Side---New Members of Orchestra and Changes in Its Makeup.

The auction sale of seats for the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, will begin at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 30, at 10 o'clock. Then the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. The $18 seats for concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules will govern the sales.

Dr. Muck will sail from Bremen next Tuesday. Not long ago it was stated in New York that Mr. Nikisch would be Dr. Muck's successor for the season of 1908-09, but no plans whatever have been made for that season. Dr. Muck may be induced to stay, but whether he will or not time alone can tell. Since he left here last spring an interesting musical situation has developed. The retirement of Mr. Mahler from the directorship of the Vienna opera left a most important position to be filled. Dr. Muck was regarded as the best man for the place, and unquestionably would have got it had it not been for his Boston engagement and the fact that the Emperor would probably not have allowed him to leave Berlin to go to the rival Opera House of Vienna. The position was given to Mr. Felix Weingartner who, to accept it, gave up the royal concerts in Berlin. His successor has not yet been named. Were Dr. Muck to be in Berlin this winter, he would be the logical man for the place. Altogether, his services are in such demand on the other side that it is all the more a matter of congratulation that we are to have him here even for a year.

The new men of the orchestra will be as follows: Mr. Carl Wendling of Stuttgart will take the place of Mr. Willy Hess, who has leave of absence for a year. Mr. Wendling has been the concert master at the Court Theatre of Stuttgart and for several years the concert master at the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth, where Dr. Muck became acquainted with him. Mr. Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen will take the position of second concert master which was vacated by Mr. T. Adamowski's resignation. Mr. Moldauer, one of the best of the violins, and Mr. Frietsche, the bass clarinet, died after the end of last season. Mr. Theodorowicz, having left the Kneisel Quartet, will take Mr. Moldauer's place. Mr. Sokoloff, a violinist, who left the orchestra to study with Mr. Loeffler, will be succeeded by Mr. Ribarsch of Vienna. Mr. Zach left the viola section to conduct the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The name of the new viola player has not yet been announced. Mr. Arthur Kautzenbach of Berlin will take the place in the 'cello section made vacant by the resignation of Mr. J. Adamowski. Mr. A. Goldstein, whose father was for many years a member of the orchestra, and Mr. Rennert of Boston will join the second violins. Mr. Traupe will leave the second violins to play with the first. The two new double bass players will be Messrs. Agnesy and Huber of Vienna. Mr. Litke, a former member of the orchestra, will return from New York, to be the second bassoonist. There will be two new horns, so that there will be eight in all. The new first horn is Mr. K. Schmid of Vienna. Mr. Lorenz of Boston will be the tuba player. There will be two changes in the battery. In all there will be 16 new members, and the list will include 98 names instead of 96. It is gratifying to know that the Persion Fund will be of service to those who have earned retirement and rest.

The plans of the management call for at least 12 soloists this season, and the management has endeavored to secure artists of the highest grade. There will be two, possibly three, singers. Mme. Melba will sing after the holidays. Mme. Schumann-Heink has been engaged. Among the pianists will be Mmes. Teresa Carreno, Katharine Goodson, Olga Samaroff and Messrs. Bauer and Paderewski. There will be no doubt about Mr. Pederewski's appearance. He will sail for this country in about three weeks to be here until the first of May. It is doubtful whether his new symphony will be ready for performance by the orchestra. Among the violinists will be Messrs. Kreisler, Wendling and Thornberg.

Any announcement concerning the new pieces to be performed and the programmes must be deferred until the arrival of Dr. Muck.

There is every prospect of a most successful season. Boston cannot do much better by its orchestra than it did last year when competition at the auction sales was so keen. From the number of unsolicited subscriptions that have already been received from New York, it looks as though there would be no seats for separate concerts for sale in that city. The same conditions prevail in Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington. Philadelphia, deeply interested in its own orchestra, is giving the Boston orchestra admirable support.

The general scheme of the season calls for a few more than 100 concerts, about the same number as last year. Of these 48 (including the public rehearsals) will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester. With the exception of the six concerts to be given on the western trip, the others required to make up the total will be given in various cities of the East.

The orchestra will go West on Jan. 26, and it will visit Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, and on Friday afternoon, the 31st, and Saturday evening, Feb. 1, it will play in Cincinnati. The Cincinnati orchestra has gone out of existence owing to the inability of the management to make terms with the Musical Union, and in place of concerts by its own orchestra the association which has charge of such affairs will give concerts by visiting orchestras.

The series of Boston concerts will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11. The series will end on Saturday evening, May 2. The orchestra will be away on the following Fridays and Saturdays: Nov. 8 and 9; Dec. 6 and 7; Jan. 10 and 11; Jan. 31 and Feb. 1; Feb. 21 and 22, and March 20 and 21. The 17th of April being Good Friday, the public rehearsal scheduled for that day will be given on Thursday, the 16th.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will during the coming season give the usual quota of ten concerts in two series of five each in Carnegie Hall. The first series will be on the following Thursday evenings: November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 19. The second series will be given on Saturday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21. Dr. Karl Muck will of course be the conductor and among the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy, Theresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in New York with an orchestra.

Es. 884

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of five concerts in the Baptist Temple of this city during the coming musical season. As in the past the concerts will be given on Friday afternoons. The dates are as follows: November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. The soloists announced for Brooklyn are Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be, Fritz Kreisler and Teresa Carreno. Full details regarding the sale will be published in due time.

E , 1884

-SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22

THE BOSTON AMERICAN

Symphony Season Plans

Auction sale of seats begins a week from to-morrow. Public rehearsals begin October 11, with the first concert the following evening. There will be sixteen new faces in the orchestra this year, bringing the orchestra up to a total of ninety-eight players instead of ninety-six as formerly. Carl Wendling is to be concert master; Julius Thornberg at the first desk, Julius Theodorowicz and A. Ribarsch as first violins, A. Arthur Kautzenbach as cellist, B. Rennert and H. Goldstein as second violins. Dr. Muck returns from Germany on October 1. No plans have been made as yet for the conductorship next season, but everybody, including the management, hopes that Dr. Muck will consent to remain. Madame Melba and Madame Schumann-Heink, Paderewski, Teresa Careno, Harold Bauer, Rudolf Ganz, Olga Samaroff, Fritz Greihler, Katherine Goodson, are among the artists sure to be heard this season with the orchestra.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Date .....

Carnegie and New York.

In a speech which he delivered as a part of the ceremonies of the laying of the corner stone of the Mitchell Library in Glasgow, the other day, Andrew Carnegie took it upon himself to deliver a brilliant eulogy on the superiority of the municipal government of New York over that of British cities. It was a "braw" effort, and we have no doubt that the citizens of Glasgow assembled to hear the great ironmaster were properly impressed with the facts that New York was not a "sink of iniquity"—that was a subtle touch which must have appealed to the highly moral Scots—that it had seventy-eight branch libraries of the speaker's own giving, and that its subways, Riverside Drive, water supply system and ownership of docks beat anything Great Britain could show. And in closing he ventured the prediction that "forty-five years hence New York will be the richest city of the world in the ownership of revenue-producing properties, which will have cost her nothing."

This is fine; and our bosom would have swelled with pride over all these magnificent sentiments and marshaling of facts, if it were not for the remembrance, which served as the fly in the ointment, over the action of Andrew Carnegie's lawyers recently in making an effort to have the taxes reduced on the Carnegie properties in this city. It is two years since he began legal proceedings to have the valuation of $2,300,000 on his Fifth avenue home reduced and the proceedings are still tangled up in the meshes that inevitably intwine such things. To accomplish such a future of riches for the city as Carnegie predicted in his Glasgow speech necessarily requires the payment of taxes by property owners. But when those taxes are too high, according to this eulogist's ideas—why that is another matter.

In connection with this it is worth while telling a story that was current in musical circles last winter, which throws a decided light on the viewpoint of Carnegie on business when associated with art. For years the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been distributing to those who attended the orchestra's concerts in Carnegie Hall books of "programme notes" that were so authoritative that they were treasured by all who received them. To pay for the making of these pamphlets advertisements were printed in them. But with the first concert of last season came a printed slip in the books of "programme notes"—to those who had the "tip"—that, owing to a business arrangement of the hall, the pamphlets could not be distributed there, but could be had in a drug store on the opposite corner. Of course, it took some time for the concert-goers to learn of this arrangement, and consequently their knowledge of the works played was lessened materially. The explanation of this embargo lay in the fact that the business manager of Carnegie Hall had made a cast-iron contract—for a stiff price—with a firm of programme publishers that no other programmes but theirs should be distributed in the hall. This put a ban on the advertisements in the Boston Orchestra's free books. And it is related, on the highest authority, that when Andrew Carnegie heard of this "stroke of good business" he wrote a personal letter to the manager of the hall congratulating him on his business acumen. Education of the music-loving public could go hang when it came to a matter of dollars.

...wspaper Clipping Bureau of the ...

From ..... Tribune

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this winter its usual series of five matinee concerts in the new National Theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington this will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Mme. Carreno's appearance will be a genuine treat to the concert-going public, with whom she is such a favorite. She has not been heard in Washington for some years.

Estabi

Address
Date SEP 22 1907

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird in der kommenden Saison in New York die üblichen 10 Konzerte in zwei Serien von je 5 geben, und zwar in Carnegie Hall. Die erste Serie umfaßt die folgenden Donnerstag-Abende: 7. November, 5. Dezember, 9. Januar, 20. Februar und 19. März, die zweite Serie umfaßt folgende Samstag-Nachmittage: 9. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 22. Februar und 21. März. Dr. Karl Muck ist der Dirigent; es wurden folgende Solisten gewonnen: Frau Carreño, und die Herren Paderewski, Van Rooy, Fritz Kreisler und Karl Wendling. Paderewski wird bei dieser Gelegenheit zum einzigenmal während seiner kommenden Tournee in New York im Rahmen eines Symphonie-Konzerts erscheinen. Der Sitz-Verkauf wird am Montag, 14. Oktober, an der Kasse in Carnegie Hall eröffnet werden; die Abonnements-Erneuerungen seitens der letztjährigen Abonnenten müssen gegenwärtig geltend gemacht werden. Herr Wendling, der als Konzert-Meister des berühmten Orchesters fungiren wird, soll am 24. d. M. hier eintreffen; er ist vom Stuttgarter Hoftheater, woselbst er als Konzert-Meister wirkt, für ein Jahr beurlaubt. Dr. Muck wird am 1. Oktober aus Europa in New York eintreffen.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual ten concerts in two series in Carnegie Hall this season. The first series will be given on the evenings of November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 19, and the second series on the afternoons of November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct and the soloists will include Anton Van Rooy, Teresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in New York with an orchestra. The subscription sale will open in the box office of Carnegie Hall on October 14.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1907

Dr. Muck will leave Bremen tomorrow on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm, due in New York on the morning of Tuesday, Oct. 1. He will come at once to Boston.

As a few slight typographical errors crept into the roster of the Symphony Orchestra that was printed in this column on Saturday, we reprint it today and free of them. The list still lacks the name of one of the new horn players and the initials of Messrs. Czerwonky, Scheurer and Stumpf, because Dr. Muck has not yet sent these particulars to Boston. Otherwise it goes:

First Violins—Carl Wendling, concertmeister, Mr. Czerwonsky, O. Roth, D. Kuntz, J. Theodorowicz, W. Krafft, J. Hoffmann, G. Strube, F. Mann, H. Eichheim, E. Fiedler, K. Rissland, A. Bak, A. Ribarsch, W. Traupe, J. C. Mullaly.

Second Violins—C. Barleben, J. Akeroyd, P. Fiumara, W. W. Swornsbourne, H. Tischer-Zeitz, H. Goldstein, R. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, J. E. Eichler, A. Kuntz, B. Fiedler, B. Rennert, F. S. Currier.

Violas—Mr. Scheurer, E. Férir, H. Heindl, G. F. Sauer, A. Kolster, F. Zahn, H. Hoyer, M. Kluge, O. H. Krauss, A. Gietzen.

Violoncellos—H. Warnke, J. Keller, A. A. Kautzenbach, E. Loeffler, R. Nagel, H. Heberlein, C. Barth, R. Smalley, A. Hadley, L. Nast.

Basses—K. Keller, M. Kunze, K. Agnesy, T. Seydel, E. Huber, G. Gerhardt, R. Schurig, S. Elkind.

Flutes—A. Maquarre, Paul Fox, A. Brooke, D. Maquarre.

Oboes—G. Longy, A. Sautet, C. Lenom.

English Horn—F. Müller.

Clarinets—G. Grisez, P. Mimart, A. Vannini.

Bass Clarinet—Mr. Stumpf.

Bassoons—P. Sadoni, E. Regestein, H. Litke.

Contra-Bassoon—J. Helleberg.

Horns—A. Hackebarth, M. Hess, K. Schmid, H. Lorbeer, J. Phair, F. Hein, C. Schumann.

Trumpets—L. Kloepfel, G. Heim, J. F. Mann, C. Merrill.

Trombones—C. Hampe, A. Mäusebach, L. S. Kenfield.

Harp—H. Schtecker.

Tuba—O. W. Lorenz.

Tympani—A. Rettberg, F. Kandler.

Drum—C. R. Ludwig.

Cymbals, Triangle, Etc.—T. Senia, H. Burkhardt, J. F. Dworak.

Librarian—J. Sauerquel

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 22 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES.

Brilliant Success Seems Assured for the Season Soon to Begin—Sixteen Changes in the Personnel of the Band—Famous Soloists to be Heard.

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR AT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The annual auction sale of seats for the symphony concerts will begin Monday, Sept 30, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday morning the sale of $10 rehearsal seats will begin. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold Thursday, Oct 3, and the $10 seats the following day.

The plans for the coming season are all but completed, only a few details regarding one or two soloists remaining to be finished. Since last spring the orchestra has been enlarged by the addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns, and 14 other changes are noted in the personnel.

Five of these changes are due to death and resignations and one to the year's leave of absence granted to Prof Willy Hess. The other changes were made for the betterment of the orchestra, and consisted largely in the retirement from active duty of members who have been in it for many years. These retirements have been made possible by the existence of the pension fund, which has been contributed to so generously by the Boston public.

Nearly all the new members of the orchestra are coming from abroad, and as they are Dr Muck's personal choice there need be no misgivings as to their ability. It has not been an easy task for Dr Muck to find the men he wanted, for competition is growing keener each year, European orchestras resenting more than ever the steady exportation to this country of their best men.

As announced last spring, Mr Hess will be succeeded for the season as concert master by Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth. Of Mr Wendling all that can be said at present is that Dr Muck regards him as one of the very few great concert masters in the world. His colleague at the first desk will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen.

Mr Moldauer's successor will be Julius Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra in 1903 to be second violin of the Kneisel quartet. His return to Boston will be warmly welcomed, as he is an exceedingly capable artist. Another new first violin (in place of Mr Sokoloff) is Mr Ribarsch, who comes here from Vienna. And Mr Traupe has been promoted from the second to the first violins.

The successor of Josef Adamowski in the 'cello section will be A. Arthur Kautzenbach of Berlin. In the second violins will be two new men, A. Goldstein, whose father was for many years a member of the orchestra, and Mr Rennert of this city. Two new double basses will be Messrs Agnesy and Ruber, both of Vienna. Dr Muck has engaged Mr Zack's successor but has not yet sent his name.

In the wind sections the changes are as follows: The two additional horns, the new first horn (in place of Mr Hackebarth, who becomes third horn) being Karl Schmid of Vienna. Mr Heim, the new first trumpet, who came to the orchestra last spring, is of course retained as alternate first trumpet with Mr Kloepfel, succeeding Mr Brenton. The new tuba player will be Mr Lorenz of this city. Mr Debuchy having retired, Mr Helleberg becomes fourth bassoon, and his place as second is to be taken by Mr Litke, who was formerly a member of the orchestra. Two changes are noted also in the percussion section.

The season of 1906-1907, measured by whatever standard, was the most successful in the history of the orchestra, and there is no reason why the coming season should not show an improvement on even its immediate predecessor. The orchestra possesses in Dr Muck a conductor who not merely has shown exalted qualities in his art, but by his attractive personality has won the affection and admiration of the patrons of the orchestra wherever it has played under his command.

Perhaps this is a good place to put a final quietus on the various reports which spring up from time to time regarding his successor. It may be authoritatively stated that no plans whatever have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra in 1908-1909. Everybody who has the interests of the orchestra at heart hopes sincerely that arrangements may be made during the coming winter whereby Dr Muck will continue in the position he is filling so admirably. Whether this can be done, time alone can tell. His services were never more in demand in Germany than they are today, and even if his release from his contract in Berlin could be secured, such flattering inducements would be held out to him to remain there that his coming would be doubtful.

The general scheme of the season calls for a few more than 100 concerts. Of these 48, beginning Oct 11 and ending May 2, will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Provdence and Worcester. The others required to make up the total number will be given in various cities of the east, excepting the six concerts of the regular midwinter western trip.

The plans of the orchestra for the coming season call for at least 12 soloists of the very highest grade. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of another if he can be secured. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be soloist at one of the early concerts and in January Mme Melba will sing.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, and this year there is no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give 80 concerts in various parts of the country. His symphony, according to last accounts, is still unfinished, which will be a disappointment, as it was to have had its first performance by Boston's orchestra.

Second only to Paderewski in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno after an absence of several years. From all accounts her playing still has the distinguishing marks that made her the greatest of women pianists. Another favorite that is returning is Harold Bauer, and a pianist new to symphony concerts, but one who has made a most favorable impression in Boston is Rudolph Ganz. Mme Olga Samaroff is scheduled to appear, as is Katharine Goodson.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. Carl Wendling, the new concert master, will of course appear among the soloists, as will his colleague at the first desk.

Announcements regarding the novelties and programs will probably have to be deferred until the return of Dr Muck, as he has sent no word about them. Having discovered last season how Boston hungers and thirsts for new music, he will probably bring with him a trunk full of new scores, and now that he knows Boston and its tastes, it is probable that [illegible] more interesting [illegible]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 22 1907

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the [illegible] September 14, and is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday. Wendling comes to Boston on leave of absence from the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails from New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, September 25, and is due to arrive in New York October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from [illegible]

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, P
Address
Date SEP 22 1907

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists of importance are announced—Paderewski, his only appearance with orchestra; Mme. Melba and Theresa Carreno, the famous pianist. Renewals from last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss Harris. The sale of season tickets to new [illegible] on Monday, Octo-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 22 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts this winter in the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. Three soloists are announced—Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be; Melba, her only appearance in Baltimore, and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Full details regarding the subscription sale will be announced in due time.

[9]

Address
Date SEP 22 1907

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester wird in der kommenden Saison in New York die üblichen 10 Konzerte in zwei Series von je 5 geben, und zwar in Carnegie Hall. Die erste Serie umfaßt die folgenden Donnerstag-Abende: 7. November, 5. Dezember, 9. Januar, 20. Februar und 19. März, die zweite Serie umfaßt folgende Samstag-Nachmittage: 9. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 22. Februar und 21. März. Dr. Karl Muck ist der Dirigent; es wurden folgende Solisten gewonnen: Frau Carreño, und die Herren Paderewski, Van Rooy, Fritz Kreisler und Karl Wendling. Paderewski wird bei dieser Gelegenheit zum einzigenmal während seiner kommenden Tournée in New York im Rahmen eines Symphonie-Konzerts erscheinen. Der Sitz-Verkauf wird am Montag, 14. Oktober, an der Kasse in Carnegie Hall eröffnet werden, die Abonnements-Erneuerungen seitens der letztjährigen Abonnenten müssen gegenwärtig geltend gemacht werden. Herr Wendling, der als Konzert-Meister des berühmten Orchesters fungiren wird, soll am 24. d. M. hier eintreffen; er ist vom Stuttgarter Hoftheater, woselbst er als Konzert-Meister wirkt, für ein Jahr beurlaubt. Dr. Muck wird am 1. Oktober aus Europa in New York eintreffen.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual ten concerts in two series in Carnegie Hall this season. The first series will be given on the evenings of November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 19, and the second series on the afternoons of November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct and the soloists will include Anton Van Rooy, Teresa Carreno, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in New York with an orchestra. The subscription sale will open in the box office of Carnegie Hall on October 14.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1907

Dr. Muck will leave Bremen tomorrow on the steamer Kronprinz Wilhelm, due in New York on the morning of Tuesday, Oct. 1. He will come at once to Boston.

As a few slight typographical errors crept into the roster of the Symphony Orchestra that was printed in this column on Saturday, we reprint it today and free of them. The list still lacks the name of one of the new horn players and the initials of Messrs. Czerwonky, Scheurer and Stumpf, because Dr. Muck has not yet sent these particulars to Boston. Otherwise it goes:

First Violins—Carl Wendling, concertmeister, Mr. Czerwonsky, O. Roth, D. Kuntz, J. Theodorowicz, W. Krafft, J. Hoffmann, G. Strube, F. Mann, H. Eichheim, E. Fiedler, K. Rissland, A. Bak, A. Ribarsch, W. Traupe, J. C. Mullaly.

Second Violins—C. Barleben, J. Akeroyd, P. Fiumara, W. W. Swornsbourne, H. Tischer-Zeitz, H. Goldstein, R. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, J. E. Eichler, A. Kuntz, B. Fiedler, B. Rennert, F. S. Currier.

Violas—Mr. Scheurer, E. Férir, H. Heindl, G. F. Sauer, A. Kolster, F. Zahn, H. Hoyer, M. Kluge, O. H. Krauss, A. Gietzen.

Violoncellos—H. Warnke, J. Keller, A. A. Kautzenbach, E. Loeffler, R. Nagel, H. Heberlein, C. Barth, R. Smalley, A. Hadley, L. Nast.

Basses—K. Keller, M. Kunze, K. Agnesy, T. Seydel, E. Huber, G. Gerhardt, R. Schurig, S. Elkind.

Flutes—A. Maquarre, Paul Fox, A. Brooke, D. Maquarre.

Oboes—G. Longy, A. Sautet, C. Lenom.

English Horn—F. Müller.

Clarinets—G. Grisez, P. Mimart, A. Vannini.

Bass Clarinet—Mr. Stumpf.

Bassoons—P. Sadoni, E. Regestein, H. Litke.

Contra-Bassoon—J. Helleberg.

Horns—A. Hackebarth, M. Hess, K. Schmid, H. Lorbeer, J. Phair, F. Hein, C. Schumann.

Trumpets—L. Kloepfel, G. Heim, J. F. Mann, C. Merrill.

Trombones—C. Hampe, A. Mäusebach, L. S. Kenfield.

Harp—H. Schluecker.

Tuba—O. W. Lorenz.

Tympani—A. Rettberg, F. Kandler.

Drum—C. R. Ludwig.

Cymbals, Triangle, Etc.—T. Senia, H. Burkhardt, J. F. Dworak.

Librarian—J. Sauerquell

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROMISES.

Brilliant Success Seems Assured for the Season Soon to Begin—Sixteen Changes in the Personnel of the Band—Famous Soloists to be Heard.

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR AT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The annual auction sale of seats for the symphony concerts will begin Monday, Sept 30, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday morning the sale of $10 rehearsal seats will begin. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold Thursday, Oct 3, and the $10 seats the following day.

The plans for the coming season are all but completed, only a few details regarding one or two soloists remaining to be finished. Since last spring the orchestra has been enlarged by the addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns, and 14 other changes are noted in the personnel.

Five of these changes are due to death and resignations and one to the year's leave of absence granted to Prof Willy Hess. The other changes were made for the betterment of the orchestra, and consisted largely in the retirement from active duty of members who have been in it for many years. These retirements have been made possible by the existence of the pension fund, which has been contributed to so generously by the Boston public.

Nearly all the new members of the orchestra are coming from abroad, and as they are Dr Muck's personal choice there need be no misgivings as to their ability. It has not been an easy task for Dr Muck to find the men he wanted, for competition is growing keener each year, European orchestras resenting more than ever the steady exportation to this country of their best men.

As announced last spring, Mr Hess will be succeeded for the season as concert master by Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth. Of Mr Wendling all that can be said at present is that Dr Muck regards him as one of the very few great concert masters in the world. His colleague at the first desk will be Julius Thornberg, a distinguished violinist of Copenhagen.

Mr Moldauer's successor will be Julius Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra in 1903 to be second violin of the Kneisel quartet. His return to Boston will be warmly welcomed, as he is an exceedingly capable artist. Another new first violin (in place of Mr Sokoloff) is Mr Ribarsch, who comes here from Vienna. And Mr Traupe has been promoted from the second to the first violins.

The successor of Josef Adamowski in the 'cello section will be A. Arthur Kautzenbach of Berlin. In the second violins will be two new men, A. Goldstein, whose father was for many years a member of the orchestra, and Mr Rennert of this city. Two new double basses will be Messrs Agnesy and Ruber, both of Vienna. Dr Muck has engaged Mr Zack's successor but has not yet sent his name.

In the wind sections the changes are as follows: The two additional horns, the new first horn (in place of Mr Hackebarth, who becomes third horn) being Karl Schmid of Vienna. Mr Heim, the new first trumpet, who came to the orchestra last spring, is of course retained as alternate first trumpet with Mr Kloepfel, succeeding Mr Brenton. The new tuba player will be Mr Lorenz of this city. Mr Debuchy having retired, Mr Helleberg becomes fourth bassoon, and his place as second is to be taken by Mr Litke, who was formerly a member of the orchestra. Two changes are noted also in the percussion section.

The season of 1906-1907, measured by whatever standard, was the most successful in the history of the orchestra, and there is no reason why the coming season should not show an improvement on even its immediate predecessor. The orchestra possesses in Dr Muck a conductor who not merely has shown exalted qualities in his art, but by his attractive personality has won the affection and admiration of the patrons of the orchestra wherever it has played under his command.

Perhaps this is a good place to put a final quietus on the various reports which spring up from time to time regarding his successor. It may be authoritatively stated that no plans whatever have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra in 1908-1909. Everybody who has the interests of the orchestra at heart hopes sincerely that arrangements may be made during the coming winter whereby Dr Muck will continue in the position he is filling so admirably. Whether this can be done, time alone can tell. His services were never more in demand in Germany than they are today, and even if his release from his contract in Berlin could be secured, such flattering inducements would be held out to him to remain there that his coming would be doubtful.

The general scheme of the season calls for a few more than 100 concerts. Of these 48, beginning Oct 11 and ending May 2, will be given in Boston, 10 in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Provdence and Worcester. The others required to make up the total number will be given in various cities of the east, excepting the six concerts of the regular midwinter western trip.

The plans of the orchestra for the coming season call for at least 12 soloists of the very highest grade. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of another if he can be secured. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be soloist at one of the early concerts and in January Mme Melba will sing.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, and this year there is no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give 80 concerts in various parts of the country. His symphony, according to last accounts, is still unfinished, which will be a disappointment, as it was to have had its first performance by Boston's orchestra.

Second only to Paderewski in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno after an absence of several years. From all accounts her playing still has the distinguishing marks that made her the greatest of women pianists. Another favorite that is returning is Harold Bauer, and a pianist new to symphony concerts, but one who has made a most favorable impression in Boston is Rudolph Ganz. Mme Olga Samaroff is scheduled to appear, as is Katharine Goodson.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. Carl Wendling, the new concert master, will of course appear among the soloists, as will his colleague at the first desk.

Announcements regarding the novelties and programs will probably have to be deferred until the return of Dr Muck, as he has sent no word about them. Having discovered last season how Boston hungers and thirsts for new music, he will probably bring with him a trunk full of new scores, and now that he knows Boston and its tastes, it is probable that the symphony patrons may look forward to even a more interesting season than last.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Friederich der Grosse, September 14, and is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday. Mr. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court theater of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, September 24, and is due to arrive in New York October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

PUBLICLEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SEP 22 1907

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists of importance are announced—Paderewski, his only appearance with orchestra; Mme. Melba and Theresa Carreno, the famous pianist. Renewals from last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss Harris. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on Monday, October 14.

[9]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts this winter in the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. Three soloists are announced—Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be; Melba, her only appearance in Baltimore, and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Full details regarding the subscription sale will be announced in due time.

TIGHT BINDING

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....
ress .....
e .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual series of five matinee concerts in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being received by the local representative of the orchestra, Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. Full details regarding the season will be announced in due time.

Felix Garziglia, the French pianist, is now located in his attractive studio, at 613 Thirteenth street. He will be particularly busy during the coming winter, as he is of the faculty of Chevy Chase College and at the head of the entire music department of Madison Hall Seminary. To-day he will preside at the organ at the opening of the new West Washington Methodist Church, in Georgetown, of which Mr. Ballinger is pastor. The opening exercises will continue during the following week, and M. Garziglia will have charge of the organ each day with the exception of Wednesday, when a visiting organist will conduct the meeting. He will also close the opening exercises at the service on next Sunday, September 29.

After a rest of several months, the Rebew Orchestra will begin regular rehearsals again to-morow night. It is the intention of the orchestra to give a public rehearsal once every month, assisted by different vocalists and musicians of the city. These affairs have always been enjoyable to all concerned, and it is a pleasure to learn that they will be continued during the coming season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in t
From ..... REC
PHILADELPHIA
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with the orchestra it will be; Melba and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss H. Harris, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 14.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on the 24th. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert-master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, on September 24, and is due to arrive in New York on October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

PLANS OF MUSICAL SEASON

ymphony Concerts Begin Oct. 12, With Public Rehearsal Day Earlier

The plans for the coming season of Symphony concerts are all but completed, only a few details regarding one or two soloists remaining to be finished.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday, Oct. 11, and the first concert on the following evening.

The annual auction sales of seats will open Monday, Sept 30, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the sale of the $10 seats will begin. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 3, beginning at the same hour, and the $10 seats on Friday.

Some of the Soloists

The plans of the orchestra for the coming season call for at least 12 soloists of the very highest possible grade. Two singers have been scheduled so far, with the possibility of another if he can be secured. Schumann-Heink, who has not been heard with the orchestra for several years, will be soloist at one of the early concerts, and in January Mme. Melba will sing.

The list of pianists is headed by Paderewski, and this year there is said to be no chance of his failing to appear, for he arrives in America the end of next month to stay until May, in which time he will give 80 concerts in various parts of the country.

His symphony, according to last accounts, is still unfinished, which will be a disappointment, as it was to have its first performance by Boston's orchestra.

Noted Woman Pianist

Second only to Paderewski in interest will be the return of Teresa Carreno, after an absence of several years. From all accounts her playing still has the distinguishing marks that made her the greatest of woman pianists.

Another favorite that is returning is Harold Bauer, and a new pianist to Symphony concerts, but one who has made a most favorable impression in Boston, is Rudolph Ganz. Mme. Olga Samaroff is scheduled to appear, as is Katherine Goodson, these artists representing the younger generation of woman pianists.

At the head of the list of violinists stands the name of Fritz Kreisler, who needs no introduction in Boston. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master, will of course appear among the soloists, as will his colleague at the first desk.

Announcements regarding the programmes will probably have to be deferred until the coming of Dr. Muck. Having discovered last season how Boston hungers and thirsts for new music, he will probably bring with him a trunkful of new scores, and now that he knows Boston and its tastes, it is thought certain that the Symphony patrons may look forward to even a more interesting season than last.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
SEPTEMBER 22

RUDOLPH GANZ

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK

MADAME MELBA

KATHERINE GOODSON

HAROLD BAUER

TERESA CARRENO

OLGA SAMAROFF

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five pairs of concerts here, Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 7-9, Dec., 5-7; Jan., 9-11; Feb., 20-22; March 19-21.

Several changes in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will attract attention, notably the two first violinists, who will fill the places of Willy Hess and Timothee Adamowski. These are Karl Wendling and Julius Thornburg.

Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra will give 28 concerts in New York, 20 of them on consecutive Sunday afternoons, the others Saturday evenings, the programs of the latter being more severe than those for the Sunday afternoon concerts.

Mr. Damrosch keeps his orchestra engaged for 40 weeks in the year, giving concerts not only in New York, but also in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Newark and two western tours will be made, one early in February, the other after Easter.

Modest Alschuler and the Russian Symphony Orchestra will give six evening concerts (Thursday evenings), Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16 and 30, Feb. 13, and March 5. Conductor Alschuler promises many novelties for the coming season and some surprises in soloists, who will be brought to this country exclusively for these concerts.

From .....
Address Washington, D C.
Date .....

GENERAL NOTES.

Ernest Schelling, the pianist, will play a new Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra with the Konzert Gebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, under Mengelberg's direction on Oct. 10. He will play the work during the week following at one of the Museum Concerts in Frankfort, and then start for America, where he has been invited by Dr. Muck to play his new work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Schelling's tour will begin in the Middle West, and he will not reach New York until the holidays.

From .....
Address .....
Date SEP 22 190

Paderewski's Plans.

Out of a total of about 80 concerts which he will give in America between October 28 and May 1, Paderewski will play only 12 times with orchestras. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra he will give two performances in Boston and one each in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. He will give two performances with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, two with the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg and one with the same orchestra in Cleveland. All his other performances will be recitals. New York and Chicago are the only cities in which he will give more than one. He plans to give three recitals in New York and two in Chicago.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date SEP

The plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go west for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programs.

From .....
Address .....
Date SEP 22

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total to well over 100. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two.

Est 1884
STAR
Date SEP 22 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its annual series of five matinee concerts in the New National theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist; and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. It is now practically certain that Paderewski will not bring over his symphony which was announced for a first production in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has the best of reason for this decision, for the symphony is not yet completed, it being according to rumor, a monumental work and a score complex enough to require years instead of months for its completion.

Est 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with the orchestra it will be; Melba and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss H. Harris, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 14.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on the 24th. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert-master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, on September 24, and is due to arrive in New York on October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

Est 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual series of five matinee concerts in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being received by the local representative of the orchestra, Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. Full details regarding the season will be announced in due time.

Felix Garziglia, the French pianist, is now located in his attractive studio, at 613 Thirteenth street. He will be particularly busy during the coming winter, as he is of the faculty of Chevy Chase College and at the head of the entire music department of Madison Hall Seminary. To-day he will preside at the organ at the opening of the new West Washington Methodist Church, in Georgetown, of which Mr. Ballinger is pastor. The opening exercises will continue during the following week, and M. Garziglia will have charge of the organ each day with the exception of Wednesday, when a visiting organist will conduct the meeting. He will also close the opening exercises at the service on next Sunday, September 29.

After a rest of several months, the Rebew Orchestra will begin regular rehearsals again to-morow night. It is the intention of the orchestra to give a public rehearsal once every month, assisted by different vocalists and musicians of the city. These affairs have always been enjoyable to all concerned, and it is a pleasure to learn that they will be continued during the coming season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in t
From .....
PHILADELPHIA
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with the orchestra it will be; Melba and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss H. Harris, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 14.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on the 24th. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert-master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, on September 24, and is due to arrive in New York on October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each in Providence and Worcester.

Est 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual series of five matinee concerts in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being received by the local representative of the orchestra, Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. Full details regarding the season will be announced in due time.

Felix Garziglia, the French pianist, is now located in his attractive studio, at 613 Thirteenth street. He will be particularly busy during the coming winter, as he is of the faculty of Chevy Chase College and at the head of the entire music department of Madison Hall Seminary. To-day he will preside at the organ at the opening of the new West Washington Methodist Church, in Georgetown, of which Mr. Ballinger is pastor. The opening exercises will continue during the following week, and M. Garziglia will have charge of the organ each day with the exception of Wednesday, when a visiting organist will conduct the meeting. He will also close the opening exercises at the service on next Sunday, September 29.

After a rest of several months, the Rebew Orchestra will begin regular rehearsals again to-morow night. It is the intention of the orchestra to give a public rehearsal once every month, assisted by different vocalists and musicians of the city. These affairs have always been enjoyable to all concerned, and it is a pleasure to learn that they will be continued during the coming season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in t
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with the orchestra it will be; Melba and Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now being received by Miss H. Harris, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 14.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on the 24th. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert-master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, on September 24, and is due to arrive in New York on October 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total well over one hundred. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go west for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two, on a Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Muck, the conductor, sails for America the latter part of this month. He sends word that he is bringing with him a very interesting lot of novelties which will appear on his programs.

From .....
Address .....
Date SEP 22

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are now complete. It will give the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the usual ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington and three each in Providence and Worcester. Enough single concerts will be given to bring the total to well over 100. In the last week of January the orchestra, as last year, will go West for six concerts. Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus will each have one and Cincinnati will have two.

Est 1884
STAR
Date SEP 22 190

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its annual series of five matinee concerts in the New National theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17. Three soloists are announced: Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist; and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. It is now practically certain that Paderewski will not bring over his symphony which was announced for a first production in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has the best of reason for this decision, for the symphony is not yet completed, it being according to rumor, a monumental work and a score complex enough to require years instead of months for its completion

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From N. Y. EVENING SUN
Address
Date SEP 23 1907

Soloists of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York on ten dates already announced here will be Anton Van Rooy, Teresa Carreño, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in Manhattan island with an orchestra.

New subscribers wait at Carnegie Hall until Oct. 14, when the renewals now going on will leave them some last chance to join a solid and famous assemblage.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Sept 24 07
Address
Date

Arriving here to-day by the Friedrich der Grosse from Bremen port was Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. His former chief there, Carl Pohlig, passed New York a week earlier for Philadelphia. If any good comes out of Stuttgart with these men, then America's Stuttgart invasion should shortly be a tale of two cities, with this metropolis for go-between.

Conductor Karl Muck, sailing to-day, will reach America to find his Boston admirers busy with his name. Muck, they declare, could have had Mahler's place at the Vienna Opera, which now goes to Weingartner, as the German Emperor would not lend to a rival royal house the man he sends to democratic Boston. Indeed, the talk now is Muck, and not Nikisch, for 1908-9. Dr. Muck was to sail from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm to-day and should arrive in New York on Oct. 1.

Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year. As Mr. Philip Hale points out to Hub concert-goers, there will be Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen, with Wendling at the first desk of violins; Theodorowicz and one Ribarsch of Vienna, violins; a viola, not yet found; Arthur Katzenbach, 'cello, of Berlin; two natives, A. Goldstein, whose father played before him, and one Rennert, as second violins while Traupe is promoted to first; Agnesy and Huber, double-basses, of Vienna; Litke of New York, second bassoon; K. Schmid, horn player, of Vienna; Lorenz of Boston, tuba. As for drums: "There will be two changes in the battery."

Sixteen new members are expected, and the home orchestra—it takes seventy men on the tours—will now number within two of a full hundred men at the forty-eight concerts in Symphony Hall.

"It is gratifying," says Mr. Hale, "to know that the pension fund will be of service to those who have earned retirement and rest."

The Boston soloists are Melba, Schumann-Heink, Carreño, Samaroff and the English Katherine Goodson, on the distaff side, and on the other, Paderewski, Kreisler, Bauer, Ganz and the new orchestra men, Wendling and Thornberg.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PHILADELPHIA PA
Address
Date

Out of a total of 80 concerts which he will give in America between October and May, Paderewski will play only 12 times with orchestra, appearing in this city at one of the Boston Symphony concerts. All his other appearances will be in recitals.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 1884
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Standard Union
Address
Date SEP 24 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse and is due to arrive in New York to-day. Mr. Wendling comes to Boston on a years leave of absence from the Courth Theatre of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm and is due to arrive in New York on Oct. 1. Altogether the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

From N. Y. EVENING
Address
Date SEP 25

Here's news: "Among the passengers who arrived to-day on the Friederich der Grosse from Bremen were a number of Conried's Metropolitan Opera Company in charge of Concertmaster Carl Wendling."

Mr. W. E. Walter of the Boston Symphony was at the pier to disentangle Herr Wendling and show him that Boston is yet on the

BOSTON GLOBE—THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER

NEW CONCERT-MASTER ARRIVES.

Carl Wendling Comes from Royal Theatre in Stuttgart to Join Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL WENDLING.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Symphony orchestra and successor to Prof Willy Hess, arrived in Boston last evening in company with C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who had gone on to New York to meet him. Mr Wendling sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friedrich der Grosse and landed in Hoboken yesterday morning. With him from Germany came Robert Siebeck, a pupil.

Mr Wendling is a tall, well-made and good-looking man who speaks most excellent English. He is young, only 32, but has had a most distinguished career and much is expected of him, all the more since he is the personal choice of Dr Karl Muck. He is an Alsatian, having been born in Strassburg in 1875.

After a course of study in the Strassburg conservatory he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for 3½ years. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal theatre, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on leave of absence.

Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent garden and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera.

Mr Wendling is married, but his family has not accompanied him to this country.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1907.
BOSTON JOURNAL—THURSDAY,

CONCERT-MASTER OF SYMPHONY IS HERE

Distinguished Violinist and Personal Choice of Dr. Karl Muck as Successor to Prof. Hess Comes to Take First Place in Orchestra.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra and successor to Professor Willy Hess, arrived in Boston last evening in company with C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who had gone on to New York to meet him. Mr. Wendling sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and landed in Hoboken yesterday morning.

Mr. Wendling is a tall, well-made and good looking man, who speaks most excellent English. He is young, only 32, but has had a most distinguished career and much is expected of him, all the more since he is the personal choice of Dr. Karl Muck. He is an Alsatian, having been born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg conservatory he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three and a half years. Returning to Strassburg he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert-master in the Royal Theater there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on leave of absence.

Since 1903 he has been concert-master of the Wagner festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert-master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert-master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera.

Mr. Wendling is married, but his family has not accompanied him to this country. He will live for the winter at Hemenway Chambers.

CARL WENDLING,
CONCERT-MASTER
OF SYMPHONY

From BOSTON,
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date

Paderewski will make his only appearance with an orchestra in New York this season with that of the Boston Symphony Society. Among the other soloists are Anton Van Rooy, Theresa Careño, Fritz Kreisler, and Carl Wendling. The subscription sale will open at Carnegie Hall, October 14.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1907

Here in Boston

It is still impossible for the New York newspapers to believe that any distinguished musician who arrives there from Europe is going to another city. This morning, for example, the Sun announces that Carl Wendling, "concert-master of the Metropolitan Opera Company," landed yesterday from an incoming German ship. Mr. Wendling happens to be the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; while, as a rule, no one can tell who happens to hold that post at the Metropolitan Opera House, without first asking its secretary.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY
SEPTEMBER 28, 1907.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auction sale of Seats Will Open on Monday.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts, which bids fair to be a record-breaker, will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The usual rules will prevail. Bids will be accepted for seats in regular order only and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on next Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday afternoon.

Dr. Muck sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm last Tuesday morning, and he is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday. It was the hope of the management that today definite announcement could be made regarding the early programs and the novelties which Dr. Muck expects to present this year, but nothing has been heard from the conductor. By the middle of next week all the new members of the orchestra who are coming from abroad will have reached Boston. The first rehearsal of the orchestra has been called for Monday morning, Oct. 7, and, as generally known, the first public rehearsal will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 12.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FRIDAY
SEPTEMBER 27, 1907.

SYMPHONY SEASON.

The new members of the Symphony Orchestra who are coming from abroad are beginning to arrive. On the Noordan, which arrived at New York on Monday was Mr. Stumpf, the new bass clarionet, who takes the place of Mr. Frietsche, who died last spring. Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master, arrived in New York yesterday on the Friederich der Grosse, and will probably reach Boston today. He was met by C. A. Ellis, who went over to New York for that purpose. The various agents in this city who have always had large commissions for Symphony tickets, report that the orders they now have in hand make a rather better showing than they did even last year, which was the banner year for the sales. The auction sales are next week on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1907.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts will open at Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The usual rules will prevail. Bids will be accepted for seats in regular order only and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competion will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on next Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday afternoon.

Dr. Muck sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on last Tuesday morning, and he is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday, Oct. 1. The first rehearsal of the orchestra has been called for Monday morning, Oct. 7, and as generally known the first public rehearsal will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 12.

From Address NEW YORK CI
ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will shortly enter upon its twenty-eighth season. In New York this orchestra will give ten concerts, beginning in November. There will be two new men in the ranks of the first violins. Outside of New York this orchestra will give the usual twenty-four afternoon and twenty-four evening concerts at Boston, and six at Cambridge, five each at Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, and three each at Providence and Worcester.

Court Violinist Here to Play; All His Fingers Insured!

HERR WENDLING; FINGERS WORTH FORTUNE.

Delicate Digits of Violinist Which Are Insured for Bigger Sums Than Many Men Place on Their Lives. Should Injury Come to Them, the Artist, While Perhaps Prevented from Further Playing, Would Be Solaced by Receiving Thousands of Dollars.

Karl Wendling of Stuttgart, who succeeds Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Syhphony orchestra, carries more insurance on his fingers than most men do on their lives.

"Yes, indeed, my fingers are my livelihood, and I must make sure of them," he said today at his apartments in the Hemenway Chambers. "All artists, more or less, insure the fingers, the feet, the voice . . . . the artist must protect himself.

"I am surprised, however, that Herr Kubelik insures his feet and his eyes as well as his hands, for he cannot, manifestly, play the violin with his toes."

Herr Wendling was enthusiastic, vigorous and refreshingly cheerful under the sun of the brilliant autumn day, and he talked of things here and there with deep interest. He was soon to begin his five hours of practice, a daily occupation with him. Every day he takes up his violin and paces back and forth across the floor, while the delicately manipulated bow caresses, implores and commands,

Herr Wendling seldom uses a score during his rehearsals. He knows his music and holds it in his heart. His practice hours are devoted to seeking how best to impart the glory and the pathos of that music to his fellow men.

"I am glad to be here in Boston," the herr concertmaster said with a smile. "Especially delightful is it to come here and play with my old and dear friend, Herr Muck. It is indeed a privilege to serve with him."

Herr Wendling spoke, too, of his pupil Robert Siebeck whom he says is promising as a musician and for whom he hopes to secure a place in the Symphony. Herr Siebeck accompanied his master to this country.

On the subject of finger and toe and voice insurance Herr Wendling talked interestingly. Kubelik's hands are insured for $50,000 each, and his eyes are protected by joint insurance of $[illegible]. If he lost a toe or a foot Kubelik will make [illegible] lost a toe on each foot or both feet he would get $50,000.

Jervace Pederewski carries a policy of $50,000 insuring each of his fingers for $4000. So far he has had three minor accidents to his fingers and collected more than $10,000 in insurance, or $8500 more than he had paid in premiums.

Lina Cavalieri and Mme. Nordica have their voices insured for $50,000. The Parisian danseuse values her feet at $150,000, and Anna Held has $100,000 on her voice. Lillian Russell last year paid an advance of $200 on a policy for $40,000. In May she fell and injured herself so that she missed 15 weeks of engagements. For this she collected $3000.

There is one famous painter, Carolus Duran, who ha guarded against the affliction of "Dick Heldar," and if the light fails Duran can collect $30,000.

Herr Wendling considers this kind of insurance an absolute necessity to an artist. He modestly declined to say how much value he set on his own clever hands, but it is known to be a large amount.

Herr Wendling will live at Hemenway Chambers for the winter, and it is possible that Frau Wendling, who is at present in Stuttgart, may join him later.

Herr Wenling's career has been that of a musician of great natural ability and worth, and his position abroad is assured. He has been the concert master of the Court Orchestra of Stuttgart, both in the opera house and in the Symphony concerts of that city. He is the leader of a string quartet and has also served as concert master at the Wagner festivals held at Bayreuth, where Dr. Muck as conductor became acquainted with him.

Mr. Wendling has much more than a local reputation, in fact he is ranked among the leading men that occupy similar positions in Europe. He has obtained leave of absence for one year from his duties in Stuttgart.

The concert masters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been in succession as follows: Mr. Bernard Listemann, who after a long sojourn in Chicago has returned to Boston; Mr. Franz Kneisel, who is now busy as leader of his celebrated quartet and as a teacher—he will conduct the orchestral concerts at the Worcester Festival next week, and he refused some months ago the position of conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra; Mr. E. Fernandez Arbos, who now teaches in London and is esteemed as a conductor in cities of Spain and England; Mr. Willy Hess.

Mr. Wendling will take his seat with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of [illegible] and make [illegible]

World-Renowned Artists for Symphony Concerts

PADEREWSKI

OLGA SAMAROFF
PIANIST

MADAME MELBA

TERESA CARRENO

Brilliant Array of Names in the Programme for the Coming Season.

Never in the history of the Symphony orchestra have so many great names been included in the list of soloists as those which are announced for the coming season. The policy of the orchestra in respect to soloists has changed to this extent: that instead of spending the money allotted for soloists on a large number of artists, a majority of whom scarcely rise above mediocrity, this money has been concentrated on a few of the greatest virtuosi that are to be in the country this season.

The schedule calls for 12 soloists, leaving 12 concerts of purely orchestral music. By this the management hopes to satisfy both sections of Symphony patrons, those who want no soloists and those who do. The former class has in the last few years grown with remarkable rapidity, not merely in Boston, but wherever the orchestra has played, and since Dr. Muck has become conductor the feeling has increased greatly that if the orchestra is to have soloists let it have the greatest World-Renowned Artists.

The following artists are chosen: Mme. Melba, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, Mme. Carreno, Mme. Samaroff, Mme. Goodson, Harold Bauer and Rudolph Ganz. There will be another to be announced later, possibly one of the great men singers from one of the operas in New York. In addition to these the new concert master, Carl Wendling, will be heard, and also the new second concert master, Mr. Czerwonky.

Mme. Melba was a soloist a year ago with the orchestra, and her success in Boston is always of the most brilliant description, for there is no other voice in the world like hers. While Paderewski will be heard in recital in Boston, his appearance with the orchestra will give his admirers the only opportunity to hear him under such conditions. He plans to play here Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, number 4. The return of Mme. Carreno will be welcomed by all lovers of the piano. Mme. Samaroff has become one of Boston's prime favorites. Mme. Goodson will be remembered as having made an impressive debut with the orchestra last season, and as for Mme. Schumann-Heink, she is in as peculiar a class of her own as Mme. Melba.

Prime Favorites of Musical World Will Delight Boston People.

Well-Known In Hub.

Harold Bauer has long been a favorite with the Boston public as he fully deserves, and Rudolph Ganz, a member of the younger generation of pianists, has built a firm reputation for himself. The return of Fritz Kreisler means the return of the man who today is probably the greatest violinist in the world. Of Mr. Wendling and Mr. Czerwonky, both of whom are as yet unknown in Boston, it is sufficient to say that they were chosen by Mr. Muck, who regards them both as artists of the very first class.

The auction sale of seats for the concerts will begin next Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday, at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be put on sale on Thursday morning, Oct. 3, and on Friday, at the same hour, the $10 seats for the concerts will be sold. The usual rules will govern these sales.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts of the winter—to repeat our announcement of last Saturday—will take place at Symphony Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, beginning each morning at ten o'clock. The seats at $18 for the afternoon concerts will be sold on Monday; the seats at $10 for the afternoon concerts on Tuesday; the seats at $18 for the evening concerts on Thursday; and the seats at $10 for the evening concerts on Friday. The bids go for the seats in regular order as they stand in the hall, and not for the choice, and no more than four will be sold upon any one bid. The tickets will be delivered in the hall and the purchasers must pay for them on the spot.

For news of the preparations for the winter: Dr. Muck is at sea on his way to New York. He is expected there next Tuesday; he will come at once to Boston; and in all probability make some announcement as to his forthcoming programmes. The new members of the orchestra are arriving one by one, and the first rehearsal of the whole band has been called for Monday, Oct. 7. The concerts begin on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 11 and 12. Meanwhile fifty of the men go next week to Worcester to make the orchestra for the musical festival

Manager Mudgett of Symphony Hall announces that the first of the grand concert events of the season under his direction will be the reappearance of Mme. Emma Calve in a miscellaneous concert programme at Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Oct. 19. Mme. Calve arrived back in this country a few days ago.

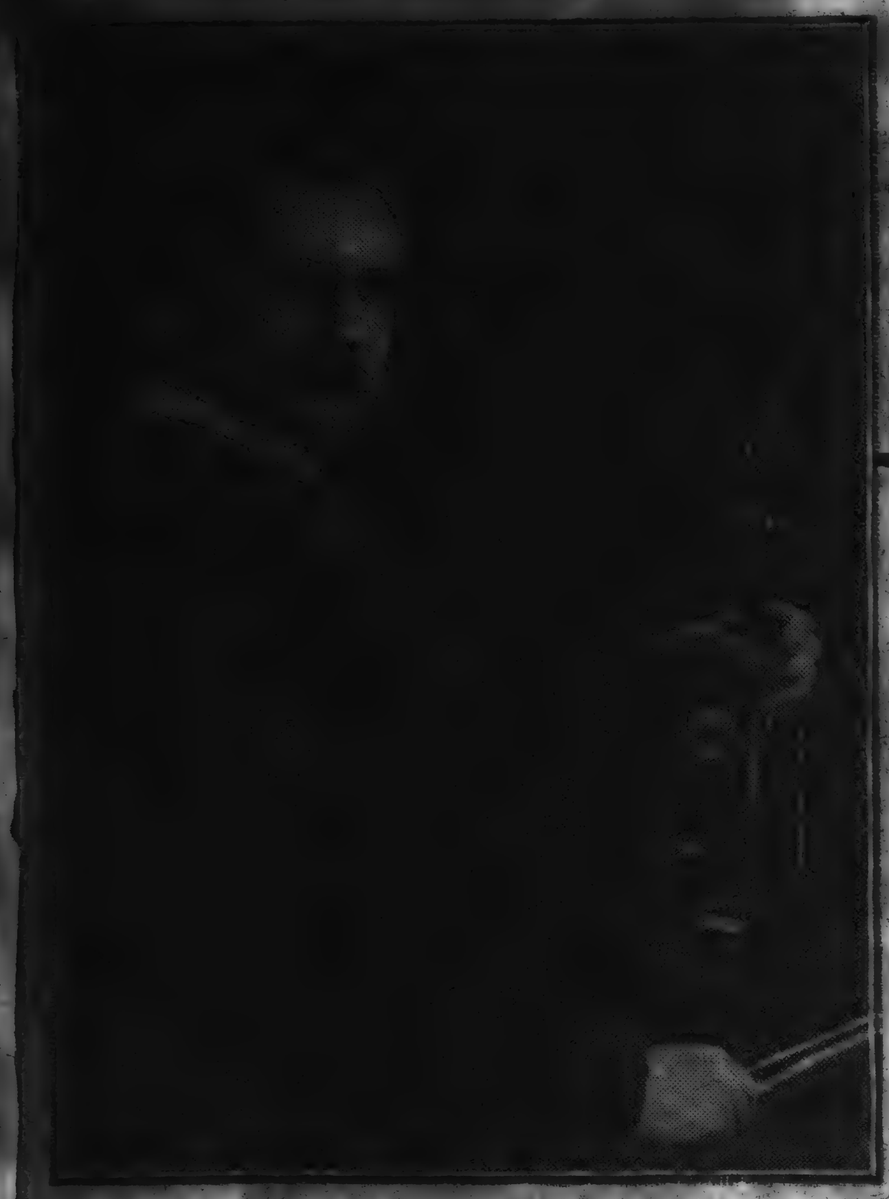
The auction sale of seats for the symphony concerts will open at Symphony hall Monday at 10 a.m., when the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The usual rules will prevail. On Tuesday at 10 a.m. the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at auction. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on next Thursday, beginning at 10 a.m., and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday afternoon.

Dr. Muck sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on last Tuesday morning, and he is due to arrive in New York on next Tuesday.

[12]

CONCERT MASTER WENDLING ARRIVES

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, New Symphony Orchestra Concert Master, Who Reached Boston Last Night.



Symphony Orchestra Leader, Borrowed from Stuttgart, Is Here to Succeed Willy Hess.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who is to succeed Willy Hess as concert master of the Symphony orchestra, reached Boston last night and was greeted by his fellow-musicians in the Symphony. Herr Wendling came direct from Germany, he having landed from the Friedrich der Grosse at Hoboken yesterday morning. He was greeted at the pier by C. A. Ellis, business manager of the orchestra. With Herr Wendling was Joseph Siebeck, a pupil, who will remain with his master in Boston.

Herr Wendling speaks excellent English. He is only 32 years old, but despite that fact has already attained a great reputation. Although he has signed with the Symphony orchestra for an indefinite period he is, as a matter of fact, only borrowed, for officially he still remains the concert master of the Royal Theatre at Stuttgart, and is in America only on leave of absence.

Frau Wendling is in Stuttgart, and it is doubtful whether or not she will join her husband while he is here. Herr Wendling will live for the winter at the Hemenway Chambers.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ... TIMES COMMERCIAL BULLETIN
Address ... BOSTON
Date ... SEP 28 1907

DATES for the two series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall have been fixed as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 19; Saturday afternoons Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 21.

Last year's subscribers have until Wednesday, Oct. 9, in which to renew. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 14.

From ... EAGLE
Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ... SEP 28 1907

It is to be hoped that before the Boston Symphony Orchestra has to make its next annual announcement Brooklyn will have her new music hall, so that there will be adequate room to accommodate all those who wish to attend these concerts. This year the concerts will again be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. At the first concert, in November, there will be no soloist, and at the last, in March, the programme will also be purely orchestral. Paderewski is scheduled to play at the December concert, and he huas notified C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he plans to play in Brooklyn Rubenstein's concerto in D minor, number 4. The soloist at the January concert is Fritz Kreisler. Application for renewals are now being received at the Institute of Musical Art.

From ... TIMES,
Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ... SEP 28 1907

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

There is significance in the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue the policy adopted last season of giving some of its concerts without soloists. So far as concerns Brooklyn, purely orchestral programmes will be given at the first and last concerts of the series and it appears that this is part of a plan to frame the programmes to meet the advancing musical appreciation of the time. An attempt was made in Brooklyn last season to encourage the sentiment in favor of always having soloists at such concerts, but it was found that there was a considerable interest in the exclusive orchestral concert. In commenting upon this last spring the Brooklyn Times said: "The absence of soloists during the series of concerts recently closed has demonstrated two points. There has been no appreciable falling off in attendance, because of their absence and, even though it was his first season with the orchestra, Dr. Muck has beautifully and convincingly shown how appealingly full of interest symphony concerts can be without soloists. The settling of these two important points leaves little basis for the old contention that such concerts cannot succeed without soloists as a sop to popular taste. It is time that concerts by the Boston Orchestra were permitted to stand forth in the full freedom of individual distinction and that the public make concession to their isolated superiority, rather than that the concerts should be adapted to the average inferiority of public taste." Apparently the experience of the Boston players and the plans for their future are in accord with this contention.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programmes, but to admit the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concert-goers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony programme and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the Orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given, the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given, there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the Middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the Orchestra and no soloist.

From ... NEWS
Address ... BALTIMORE, MD.
Date ... SEP 28 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Paderewski, Carreno And Melba Among Soloists.

Subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts have until Thursday, October 17, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming year. The concerts this winter will be given in the Lyric, as usual, on Wednesday evenings, November 6; December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. The time-established rule allowing the subscribers of one season to retain their seats during another season is still in force. On Monday, October 21, the books will be opened to new subscribers. At the concert in November there will be no soloist. Paderewski will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Melba in February. The programme for the March concert will be purely orchestral.

From ... CITIZEN
Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ... SEP 28 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, will be the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on Sept. 24 and is due to arrive in New York on Oct. 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

From ... NEW YORK SUN
Address ...
Date ... SEP 29 1907

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programmes but to admit the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concertgoers who sympathize decidedly with the idea of the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony programme, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support.

On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone.

The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITUNG
Address ...
Date ... SEP 29 1907

Voranzeigen und Notizen.

Die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte zeigt an, daß die vorjährigen Abonnenten der New Yorker Subskriptions-Konzerte ihre Sitze für die diesjährigen Veranstaltungen bis zum 9. Oktober erneuern können. Der Verkauf von Sitzen für die diesjährige Serie beginnt an der Kasse von Carnegie Hall am 14. Oktober. Die betreffende Leitung weist darauf hin, daß das Verlangen des Publikums nach bedeutenden Solisten in den Konzerten des Orchesters in Abnahme begriffen ist, was als ein großer Fortschritt in künstlerischem Sinn aufzufassen ist, da eine solche virtuose Mitwirkung das Ebenmaß der künstlerischen Darbietung zu stören geeignet ist. In New York und den übrigen großen Städten des Landes, woselbst mehrere Konzerte gegeben werden, ist die Mitwirkung von Stars in der kommenden Saison eine bemerkenswertere als in den kleineren Orten, wo nur ein Konzert stattfindet. Es sei erwähnt, zu sehen daß in [illegible] die Serie des [illegible] Konzerte ohne

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date ... SEP 29 1907

Subscribers to both series of concerts given last year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and get the same seats they had last year by application at the box office on and after tomorrow. The concerts will be given on the evenings of November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 19 and the afternoons of November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open in Carnegie Hall on October 14.

[13]

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1907.

CONCERT MASTER WENDLING ARRIVES

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, New Symphony Orchestra Concert Master, Who Reached Boston Last Night.

Symphony Orchestra Leader, Borrowed from Stuttgart, Is Here to Succeed Willy Hess.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who is to succeed Willy Hess as concert master of the Symphony orchestra, reached Boston last night and was greeted by his fellow-musicians in the Symphony.

Herr Wendling came direct from Germany, he having landed from the Friedrich der Grosse at Hoboken yesterday morning. He was greeted at the pier by C. A. Ellis, business manager of the orchestra. With Herr Wendling was Robert Siebeck, a pupil, who will remain with his master in Boston.

Herr Wendling speaks excellent English. He is only 32 years old, but despite that fact has already attained a great reputation. Although he has signed with the Symphony orchestra for an indefinite period he is, as a matter of fact, only borrowed, for officially he still remains the concert master of the Royal Theatre at Stuttgart, and is in America only on leave of absence.

Frau Wendling is in Stuttgart, and it is doubtful whether or not she will join her husband while he is here. Herr Wendling will live for the winter at the Hemenway Chambers.

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... TRANSCRIPT

Address .....

Date .....

DATES for the two series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall have been fixed as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 19; Saturday afternoons Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 21.

Last year's subscribers have until Wednesday, Oct. 9, in which to renew. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 14.

From ..... EAGLE

Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date ..... SEP 28 1907

It is to be hoped that before the Boston Symphony Orchestra has to make its next annual announcement Brooklyn will have her new music hall, so that there will be adequate room to accommodate all those who wish to attend these concerts. This year the concerts will again be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. At the first concert, in November, there will be no soloist, and at the last, in March, the programme will also be purely orchestral. Paderewski is scheduled to play at the December concert, and he huas notified C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he plans to play in Brooklyn Rubenstein's concerto in D minor, number 4. The soloist at the January concert is Fritz Freisler. Application for renewals are now being received at the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Established 1884

From ..... TIMES,

Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date ..... SEP 28 1907

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

There is significance in the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue the policy adopted last season of giving some of its concerts without soloists. So far as concerns Brooklyn, purely orchestral programmes will be given at the first and last concerts of the series and it appears that this is part of a plan to frame the programmes to meet the advancing musical appreciation of the time. An attempt was made in Brooklyn last season to encourage the sentiment in favor of always having soloists at such concerts, but it was found that there was a considerable interest in the exclusive orchestral concert. In commenting upon this last spring the Brooklyn Times said: "The absence of soloists during the series of concerts recently closed has demonstrated two points. There has been no appreciable falling off in attendance, because of their absence and, even though it was his first season with the orchestra, Dr. Muck has beautifully and convincingly shown how appealingly full of interest symphony concerts can be without soloists. The settling of these two important points leaves little basis for the old contention that such concerts cannot succeed without soloists as a sop to popular taste. It is time that concerts by the Boston Orchestra were permitted to stand forth in the full freedom of individual distinction and that the public make concession to their isolated superiority, rather than that the concerts should be adapted to the average inferiority of public taste." Apparently the experience of the Boston players and the plans for their future are in accord with this contention.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programes, but to admit the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concert-goers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony programme and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the Orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given, the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given, there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the Middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the Orchestra and no soloist.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Paderewski, Carreno And Melba Among Soloists.

Subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts have until Thursday, October 17, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming year. The concerts this winter will be given in the Lyric, as usual, on Wednesday evenings, November 6; December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. The time-established rule allowing the subscribers of one season to retain their seats during another season is still in force. On Monday, October 21, the books will be opened to new subscribers. At the concert in November there will be no soloist. Paderewski will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Melba in February. The programme for the March concert will be purely orchestral.

Established 1884

From ..... CITIZEN

Address .....

Date ..... SEP 28 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, will be the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wendling comes to Boston on a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart, where he is concert master. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kronprinz Wilhelm on Sept. 24 and is due to arrive in New York on Oct. 1. Altogether, the Boston Symphony is bringing nine artists from abroad this year.

From .....

Address .....

Date ..... SEP 29 1907

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programmes but to admit the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concertgoers who sympathize decidedly with the idea of the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony programme, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support.

On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone.

The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

Established 1884

Address .....

Date .....

Subscribers to both series of concerts given last year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and get the same seats they had last year by application at the box office on and after tomorrow. The concerts will be given on the evenings of November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 19 and the afternoons of November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open in Carnegie Hall on October 14.

Voranzeigen und Notizen.

Die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte zeigt an, daß die vorjährigen Abonnenten der New Yorker Subskriptions-Konzerte ihre Sitze für die diesjährigen Veranstaltungen bis zum 9. Oktober erneuern können. Der Verkauf von Sitzen für die diesjährige Serie beginnt an der Kassa von Carnegie Hall am 14. Oktober. Die betreffende Leitung weist darauf hin, daß das Verlangen des Publikums nach bedeutenden Solisten in den Konzerten des Orchesters in Abnahme begriffen ist, was als ein großer Fortschritt in künstlerischem Sinn aufzufassen ist, da eine solche virtuose Mitwirkung das Ebenmaß der künstlerischen Darbietung zu stören geeignet ist. In New York und den übrigen großen Städten des Landes, woselbst mehrere Konzerte gegeben werden, ist die Mitwirkung von Stars in der kommenden Saison eine bedeutendere als in den kleineren Orten, wo nur ein Konzert stattfindet. Es sei erfreulich, zu sehen daß z. B. die Städte des mittleren Westens mit Vorliebe reine Orchester-Konzerte ohne Virtuosen-Mitwirkung verlangen.

From ...SUN...
Address ...BALTIMORE, MD...
Date ...SEP 20 1907...

IN THE MUSICAL WORLD

Baltimoreans Will Enjoy Efforts Of Celebrated Artistes.

MELBA WILL SING AGAIN

Hans Pohlig, Conductor Of Philadelphia Orchestra, Was Once A Pupil Of The Great Liszt.

The announcements of the dates and the soloists who are to be brought to this city during the coming winter by the two symphony orchestras which are scheduled to give concerts here have been received with interest and gratification by all music-loving Baltimoreans. In both instances—that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra—the soloists in point of artistic merit and interest surpass those who sang at the concerts given by these organizations last winter.

The Boston Symphony announces as its Baltimore soloists Mme. Nellie Melba, the "peerless" prima donna, whom Baltimoreans had the privilege of hearing once last winter; Ignace Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist, who had originally planned to come to America last winter, but who was prevented by an accident which compelled him to spend the season in comparative seclusion in his Swiss home, and Mme. Theresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist.

Dr. Muck's Last Time Here.

Dr. Karl Muck, who unfortunately is expected to close his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the conclusion of the coming season, has won for himself an enviable reputation among Baltimore's musical people. With his first appearance here last winter he scored a triumph, which was repeated with his every subsequent appearance. An able conductor and interpreter and a musician of pre-eminent ability in every phase of the art, Dr. Muck has "made good" in the fullest sense of the term.

Dates Of The Concerts.

The Baltimore dates of the concerts of both orchestras are announced as follows:

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18.

Philadelphia Orchestra—Monday evenings, November 18, December 16, January 13, February 3, February 24.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the prices for single tickets will be increased for the December and February concerts this winter, as they were last season when Melba was the soloist.

Estab 1884

From ...THE MORNING ...
Address ...NEW YORK CITY...
Date ...SEP 29 1907...

The Soloist and the Concert.

The belief that soloists, with their obtrusive personalities and alien interest, are not any longer demanded by serious audiences, is steadily growing among the managers of symphonic orchestras.

To listen with eagerness and attention to a prolonged and elevated Bruckner or Brahms symphony, and then immediately to be transported, or rather violently plunged, into the realm of millinery actuality, by the flouncing upon the stage of some tempestuously obvious prima donna is a shock too painful for many delicate natures. One of the joys of the concert room is that it affords an escape, sometimes, from that tyranny of exploited personality which is the artistic vice and the defect of the day.

But even in the concert rooms of the gravest and most advanced of musical societies we have to endure the volcanic explosions of Mme. Gadski's hats, and the tiresome and well-advertised mannerisms of Mr. de Pachmann's contortionist stage demeanor.

The modern auditor has learned to realize, with German symphonic conductors, that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will take a stand on this matter this season and be a pioneer on this question of esthetic taste and judgment just as it has been so often in the past. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising.

Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at the two concerts when the orchestra was unassisted.

The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programmes. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist.

It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the Middle West that the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they should have the orchestra and no soloist.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...SEP 29 1907...

—Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, who is to succeed Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached Boston. He speaks excellent English, and although only 32 years old has already attained a great reputation. Although he has signed with the Symphony Orchestra for an indefinite period he is, as a matter of fact, only borrowed, for officially he still remains the concert master of the Royal Theater at Stuttgart, and is in America only on leave of absence.

From ...ENQUIRER...
Address ...CINCINNATI, OHIO...
Date ...SEP 29 1907...

Activities in the orchestral season will commence with the first days of October. Mrs. C. R. Holmes, President of the Association, will return to the city by the first of the month, and the meeting of the Board of Directors will be called within a few days of Mrs. Holmes's return. As usual, there will be a subscription and auction sale, and a sale of single seats. The regular business of preparing for the season will proceed on the same lines as in former years, although the fact that 10 different programs will be offered by the five orchestras engaged will probably necessitate changes in a few details.

The plans of engaging the Chicago, Russian Symphony, Boston, Damrosch and Pittsburg Orchestras have already been announced, and from the many favorable comments which this plan has elicited there is reason to believe that the season will prove, not only an artistic, but also a financial success. The Board of Directors is to be congratulated in securing as soloist for their first orchestral concert the services of Josef Hoffman, who is a pianist very much to the individual taste of the local public. Hoffman is one of the few.

From ...HERALD...
Address ...
Date ...

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, local manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, reports that renewals of last year's subscribers are coming in more rapidly than even they did a year ago. The limit set for these renewals is Saturday, October 12, and those old subscribers who have not placed their application for their seats at that time are likely to have a small chance to get good places, for the list of new applicants for season tickets is very large. The books will be opened to the general public for new subscriptions at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, on Tuesday, October 15. All applications should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. The concerts will be given as last year on Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The first concert, in November, and the last concert, in March, will be purely orchestral. At the December concert Paderewski will be the soloist, at the January concert Teresa Carreno, and at the February concert Fritz Kreisler.

From ...STAR...
Address ...
Date ...

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programmes, but to admit the performance of important works, which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists in twelve out of the twenty-four programmes.

From ...STAR...
Address ...
Date ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its annual series of five matinee concerts in the New National Theater at 4:30 o'clock on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17. Three soloists are announced—Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Washington it will be; Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, and Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist.

From ...ENQUIRER...
Address ...PHILADELPHIA, PA...
Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Philadelphia subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony Concerts may now renew the subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year by sending applications to Miss Harris, Heppe's music store, 1115 Chestnut street, whose privilege expires on Wednesday, October 9, and the public sale of season tickets for the coming winter will open on Monday morning, October 14, at Miss Harris' ticket office. The dates of the concerts in the Academy of Music are Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. The soloists will be Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra it will be in Philadelphia; Melba, whose only appearance in Philadelphia it will be, and Teresa Carreno.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...
Address ...
Date ...OCT 1- 1907...

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The first concert, in November, and the last concert, in March, will be purely orchestral. At the December concert Paderewski will be the soloist, at the January concert Teresa Carreno, and at the February concert Fritz Freisler.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...OCT 2- 1907...

Orchestral concerts may be expected in Newark this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Frank L Sealy's series of symphony concerts for young people. This is a most unusual state of affairs and give much encouragement to the general music lovers here.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit of the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concert-goers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra last season tried the experiment of reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. For the present season the schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be no soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programs. In New York and the other large cities where series of concerts are given, the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities of the Middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

From ...CALL...
Address ...NEWARK, N.J...
Date ...SEP 29 1907...

From ...AMERICAN...
Address ...
Date ...

Estab 18

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts have until Thursday, October 17, in which to renew their subscriptions for the coming year. The concerts this winter will be given in the Lyric, as usual, on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. The time-established rule allowing the subscribers of one season to retain their seats during another season is still in force. All applications should be sent to W. A. Albaugh, 109 North Charles street. On Monday, October 21, the books will be opened to new subscribers. At the concert in November there will be no soloist. Paderewski will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Melba in February. The program for the March concert will be purely orchestral. The prices of single tickets will be increased for the December and February concerts, as they were last year when Melba was the soloist.

From ...PRESS...
Address ...PHILADELPHIA, PA...
Date ...SEP 29 1907...

Soloists With Orchestras

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit one performance or important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency today among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. A rapidly growing body of concert-goers agree with the modern conductor that a soloist often breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken the lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played, and the experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on only twelve out of the twenty-four programs. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist.

Estab 188

From ...HERALD...
Address ...
Date ...

Mr. Loeffler's new composition, written for an orchestra [illegible] piano rather than for piano with orchestra, which was finished too late for rehearsal last spring, is to be played at the Symphony concerts this season, probably in the course of the autumn. Mr. Gebhard will take the piano part.

From ...Standard Union...
Address ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ...OCT 1 1907...

It is to be hoped that before the Boston Symphony Orchestra has to make its next annual announcement Brooklyn will have her new music hall, so that there will be adequate room to accommodate all those who wish to attend these concerts. This year the concerts will again be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 20.—At the first concert, in November, there will be no soloist, and at the last, in March, the programme will also be purely orchestral. Paderewski is scheduled to play at the December concert, and he has notified C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he plans to play in Brooklyn Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The soloist at the January concert is Fritz Kreisler. Applications for renewals are now being received at the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Estab 84

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

Carl Wendling, der neue Concertmeister des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, ist dieser Tage von Stuttgart hier eingetroffen, auch Carl Pohlig ist bereits angekommen, und Karl Muck, der Bostoner Dirigent, ist schon unterwegs. Das Boston Symphonie Orchester bringt im Ganzen neun neue europäische Künstler in diesem Jahr herüber, darunter Julius Thornberg, Kopenhagen; Wendling, Stuttgart; Theodorowicz [illegible] Barbarisch von Wien, Arthur Katzenbach (Cello) von Berlin, Agnesy und Huber aus Wien, K. Schmid, ebenfalls aus Wien. Von neuen einheimischen Künstlern gehören der Gesellschaft an: Lilke von New York, A. Goldstein, Rennert, Traupe, Lorenz u. A. m., sechzehn neue Mitglieder im Ganzen. Das Gesammtorchester besteht aus 98 Mitgliedern. Als Solisten sind gewonnen: Melba, Schumann-Heink, Carrenno, Samaroff, E. Goodson, Paderewski, Kreisler, Bauer, Ganz, [illegible]

From ...NEW YORK CITY...
Address ...
Date ...OCT 1 1907...

KRONPRINZ WILHELM HERE

With Musicians and Aeronants—Latter to Race at St. Louis.

The steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm arrived here yesterday from Bremen and landed her passengers at the pier at Hoboken late in the evening. She was six hours late in leaving Cherbourg because the train carrying passengers from Paris was delayed by the accident to the train with the Adriatic's passengers. There was another delay the third day out. A stoker jumped overboard, and although a boat was lowered and the vessel circled around for two hours nothing was seen of him.

Dr. Karl Muck, who last year conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife were passengers on the steamer. Dr. Muck will leave for Boston this morning and at once begin his work. He said: "I am afraid that this will be the last time that I shall be allowed to come here. The Kaiser very graciously gave permission for me to come this year. I regret this very much, as I am very fond of the Boston Symphony and think that it has a great future. I bring fifteen new scores of symphonies. We shall open in Boston on October 11 and in New York on November 9."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1907

OCTOBER 1, 1907.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE BRINGS GOOD PRICES

Judging by the avidity with which seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra were snapped up at the opening auction yesterday in Symphony Hall, the second sale of the chairs today will bring some lofty figures. A block of four seats brought $372 yesterday. Already, the ticket brokers say, last year's record-breaking premiums have been eclipsed. In all parts of the house there has been an average increase of at least 10 per cent., and in some of the choicer sections it has soared 20 per cent. above the high water mark of last season.

In order to discourage speculators, no patron is permitted to buy more than four tickets. The "upset" price of each seat is $10. The auctioneer will mount his platform at 10 o'clock this morning. In the hour between 10 and 11 o'clock yesterday the first five rows were all disposed of, which is an indication of the zest with which the Symphony lovers of Boston are entering into the competition for good seating accommodations, even at the rehearsals. One broker said yesterday that seats which he bought last year for $68 cost $80 this year.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to land in New York this morning, and will probably come directly to Boston, arriving here this evening. As last year, he will live at the Empire Hotel, in Commonwealth avenue.

BOSTON HERALD---TUESDA

OCTOBER 1, 1907.

SINGLE SYMPHONY SEAT BRINGS $98

Eighty-Dollar Premium Paid for Friday Afternoon—Others Sold High.

A single seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra was sold yesterday at auction for $98, while a block of four seats in row K bordering on the centre aisle brought $93 apiece, or a total of $372 for the four.

All the $18 seats for the Friday rehearsals were sold, the auction beginning at 10 A. M. and lasting till long after sunset.

The highest bid of $80, to which must be added the regular $18 price of the seat, was made soon after lunch in the early afternoon. The lowest bid was $5 for a single seat in the front row on the orchestra floor.

During the whole day the bidding was sharp, even sharper than last year, according to Manager Ellis. The interest in the bidding lasted till the last sale was made, and at closing time there were more people wanting to purchase seats than in any previous year.

In all 1652 seats were disposed of, the larger part of the orchestra floor and the balconies bringing premiums ranging from $20 to $50. The seats in the centre of the house brought fancy prices, while those in the first few rows and those in the rear under the balcony brought the lowest prices.

At 10 this morning the sale of $10 seats for Friday rehearsals will begin. There are 412 of these.

On Thursday the $18 and $10 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold.

Though there was a good sprinkling of the members of the most exclusive families present yesterday, the greater part of the business was transacted by the brokerage firms. Herrick, Wadsworth, Harne, Pratt, Burke & Connolly were all represented and between them bought many of the best seats.

From NEW YORK EVE POST
Address OCT 1 1907
Date

Subscriptions for the Boston Symphony concerts for the coming season may be renewed at Carnegie Hall up to October 9. After that new subscriptions may be made.

Established London, 1881; New York, 188
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
ldress
ate

SOLOISTS WITH ORCHESTRAS

Tendency Toward Leaving Them Out of Orchestral Programs.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit the performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency to-day among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly-growing body of concert-goers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists chestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season's schedule has been arranged whereb

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK

HIS PLANS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The First Six Programmes and a List of the New Pieces and "Revivals" to Come—A Word About Them and the Writers—A Little Conversation with the Conductor in New York—The Probability That He Will Not Remain in Boston After This Season

Late last evening, Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York from Berlin and Bremen on the steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm. The voyage had been rough and two or three trifling mishaps had prolonged it. The conductor, however, is an excellent sailor, and he had duly taken his part as pianist in the usual concert on the night before the ship made port. He had indeed been impresario as well, enlisting the coöperation of Mme. Gadski who was also aboard, and playing her accompanin en . Dr. Muck was in capital healt. and spirits and he talked pleasantly, with Mrs. Muck's aid to a correspondent of the Transcript who met him at the pier. He is as keen, it seems, as he was last winter to gain a speaking knowledge of English. He has been studying the language again this very summer in Berlin. Already, as he hears or reads it, he understands what the page or the speaker would say. But he is still wary when he must use it himself and when the talk concerns music. His sentences are still only six-words long and oftenest he prefers that Mrs. Muck speak for him.

TALK WITH THE CONDUCTOR

The conductor was pleased, as he said to the Transcript correspondent, to return to Boston to lead the musicians of the Symphony Orchestra and to work before and with a public that understands and appreciates music so readily and so keenly. He has heard and read much new music in the course of the summer, and some of the best of it he will put on his programmes in Boston in the hope that audiences here will enjoy it as heartily and receive it as warmly as did those of Europe. In particular, he spoke warmly of d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," of a symphony by Hans Bischoff of Berlin, which he praised eagerly; of the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen," and of Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Christ-Elflein," which piece he first heard at the festival of the General Musical Association of Germany at Dresden in July. There also he discovered a set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope," by a new composer, Noren, which was one of the notably successful pieces of the festival and which he intends to play in Boston. Continuing, Dr. Muck spoke warmly of the music of American composers and of its future. He had played several of their pieces last winter, and he should play more in the winter to come, notably Henry Hadley's third symphony, and C. M. Loeffler's new composition for the piano.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF HIS RETURN

Touching, finally, on the future, Dr. Muck said that he expected to return next May to the Royal Opera in Berlin. He had not, he added, received permission from the emperor to continue his work here, and for that reason he believed that he should not return to America for another season. To a reporter of the New York Sun Dr. Muck was equally frank on this score: "I am afraid," he said, "that this will be the last time that I shall be allowed to come here, though the kaiser very graciously gave permission for me to come this year. I regret this (the unlikelihood of return) very much, as I am very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and think it has a great future."

THE FIRST SIX PROGRAMMES

The hour was too late to continue the journey to Boston, and Dr. Muck will leave New York at one o'clock today, reach here at six, and go at once to his rooms at the Hotel Empire, which are awaiting him. Meantime, he sends from New York the programme of the first six Symphony Concerts for the new season. They are:

Oct. 11 and 12—

Suite in D-major.....Bach
Symphony in G-minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral).....Beethoven

Oct. 18 and 19—

Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein".....d'Indy (First time.)
Concerto in A-major for Piano.....Liszt
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Soloist: Rudolph Ganz.

Oct. 25 and 26—

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Concerto for Violin.....Brahms
Symphony in A-minor ("The Scotch").....Mendelssohn
Soloist: Carl Wendling.

Nov. 1 and 2—

Symphony No. 9 (Unfinished).....Bruckner
Aria.....
Overture, "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven
Soloist: Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Nov. 15 and 16—

Overture, "Christ-Elflein.....Pfitzner (First time.)
Concerto for Piano in D-minor (No. 4) Rubinstein
Symphony in D-major (No. 2).....Brahms
Soloist: Mr. Paderewski.

Nov. 22 and 23—

Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Concert-Piece for Orchestra with Piano..Loeffler (First time.)
Adagio and Scherzo-Finale.....Reznicek (First time.)
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier

For the new pieces on these programmes of a fourth part of the season, d'Indy's symhonic trilogy is one of his earlier compositions, suggested, as the title acknowledges, by the three plays in which Schiller follows the fortunes of Wallenstein. As long ago as 1874 d'Indy wrote an overture to Schiller's play, "Die Piccolomini." Six years later he rewrote it and joined it to a second piece, "Wallenstein's Camp," and to a third, "The Death of Wallenstein." The three make the symphonic trilogy that Dr. Muck has put on his second programme. Bruckner's ninth symphony, on the fourth programme, has been played once here, but it is still little known. It is the last of his compositions in the larger forms; and he finished only three movements of it. The fourth and final part was to follow the example of Beethoven's ninth symphony, and be choral as well as orchestral; but Bruckner was never able to bring his design for it to expression, and he left only sketches and draughts. At least, with Dr. Muck's understanding and sympathy for Bruckner's music, the three movements that he did finish will sound as he intended them. Pfitzner, whose overture "Christ-Elflein," stands on the fifth programme, is a German composer and teacher of Russian birth who is now settled in Berlin. On the sixth programme are Mr. Loeffler's new concert piece for orchestra with piano, noted the other day in this column; and a considerable part of an orchestral suite, new to Boston, by Reznicek, whose opera, "Donna Diana," made much stir in Germany a few years ago. For the rest, it will be interesting to hear Dr. Muck's reading of one of Mendelssohn's symphonies, none of which he played last season; while his puissant performance of Brahms's first symphony last October will raise expectation high for the hearing of the second.

THE "NOVELTIES" OF THE SEASON

For other new music to be heard in the course of the season Dr. Muck has chosen thus far the following pieces:

H. Bischoff: Symphony.
Henry Hadley: Symphony (No. 3).
Max Reger: Variations.
E. Bossi: Intermezzi Goldoniani.
Schjeldemp: Concert Piece for Orchestra.
Ertel: Symphonic Poem.
Ernest Boehe: Symphonic Poem.
Hugo Kaun: Suite.
Szekles: Serenade.
Humperdinck: Prelude to the Opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen."
Franck: "Redemption" (Symphonic Poem).

Of these new men, Hans Bischoff, if we are not mistaken, is a composer, pianist and conductor in Berlin, whose music is practically unknown on this side of the Atlantic. Henry Hadley is the prolific and able young American whose tone-poem, "Salome," Dr. Muck and the orchestra played last year and which made a keen impression. Reger "Variations" are presumably a new piece for orchestra, and they promise interest after his highly individual "Serenade" that our audiences heard last spring. Enrico Bossi is an exceptional Italian composer who has written much choral, orchestral and chamber music that is beginning to make its way into northern and western Europe. By their title his "Intermezzo Goldoniani" are intended to fill the pauses in Goldoni's gay Italian comedies and to catch the spirit of them. Schjelderup is seemingly one of the younger Scandinavian composers, whose music Dr. Muck knows exceptionally well, but of whom musical records have not yet taken heed. Ertel, apparently is equally unknown. Boehe is the young composer of Munich, who cultivates highly elaborate, pictorial and narrative music and whose tone-poem, "The Shipwreck of Ulysses," Mr. Gericke played two years ago. Hugo Kaun is a young American composer who has settled in Berlin and whose music has gained a hearing there. In America the Chicago Orchestra has also played it. Szekles is obviously a Bohemian composer, hitherto unknown to concert-rooms on this side of the sea. Humperdinck's opera-comique, "Das Heirat wider Willen" was first performed in Berlin two years ago, but neither the overture, which Dr. Muck has chosen, nor any other fragment, yet been heard hereabouts. César Franck's "Redemption" in its orginal form is a "symphonic poem" for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. More probably Dr. Muck intends to play the "new version" of the piece that Franck afterwards rewrote and condensed for orchestra only. It pictures in Franck's familiar mood of mystic exaltation the joy of heaven and earth in the coming of the Saviour. Possibly the telegraph has substituted "Variations" by Reger for "Variations by Noren. If not the latter piece, according to Dr. Muck himself, is to be added to the list. For "revivals," to use the conductor's own word, he has chose, beside Bruckner's symphony, Tschaikovski's "Manfred" symphony and Strauss's "Til Eutenspiegel."

ANOTHER YEAR ?

So much for the programmes and the new music of next winter. There remains the ominous sayings of Dr. Muck himself as to his continuance at the head of the Symphony Orchestra beyond next May. The conductor measures his words before he speaks, and especially when he is speaking for publication. Therefore, it is safe to infer that he believes that he cannot remain in Boston after the current musical year. However willing he may be to continue here, however desirous the management of the orchestra to retain him, however eager his public in Boston, in New York and in other cities to keep him, the emperor's consent to a longer stay is essential. Such permission Dr. Muck has not yet received. However, when he first came to Boston last autumn, he had received no leave to continue here for a second season. In due course it was won; and it may yet be won for a third year. Certainly ther will be no sparing of effort to gain it.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCR
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3.

Incoming steamers are fast bringing the new players who will join the Symphony Orchestra next Monday. Mr. Czerwonky, who replaces Mr. Adamowski at the first desk of the violins; Mr. Scheurer, the successor to Mr. Zach, among the violas; Mr. Kautzenbach, the new 'cellist; Mr. Schmid, the new horn-player, and Mr. Agnesy for the double-basses, all reached New York on Tuesday and are now in Boston.

In the course of his holiday last summer, Dr. Muck paid a visit to Cosima Wagner at Baireuth. He found her in fairly good health in spite of her years and labors, but now compelled to court it, so to say, by life in the open air and long walks.

[15]

and dramatist, and appearing under the title, "Der Richter von Zalamea." It is Dr. Baumfeld's intention to produce this year a number of the classics of the English and Continental stage and to vary them with modern plays of consequence and lighter comedy pieces. The theatre has been refurnished and redecorated and an adequate company of players has been assembled. Last night's performance was of a character to promise a new lease of life to an institution which in the scope and educative quality of its work once fulfilled, and should fulfill again, a highly useful dramtic function.

The piece presented ranks with "La Vida es Sueno" as the most notable among Calderon's many plays. In it the Spanish poet, though himself a priest and an aristocrat, struck something of a note of protest against the caste prejudices of his country, building his play on the thesis that a peasant's sense of honor may be as keen, as deep seated and as inextinguishable as that of a member of the nobility. The broadly democratic spirit of the play still vitalizes it and gives it a singular flavor of modernity. The judge or mayor of Zalamea is Pedro Crespo, a rich peasant, self-respecting and highly respected. Spanish troops enter his village, and the captain of a company is quartered in his house. The captain learns that Crespo has secluded his daughter, who is beautiful and bred above the peasant standard; and out of pique and curiosity plans to discover and possess her. Getting into her hiding place by a strategem, he falls violently in love with her, and later abducts and dishonors her.

The father is also abducted and bound in the forest, where the daughter, escaping, finds and releases him. The captain has been overtaken and wounded by Crespo's son and is carried back wounded to Zalamea. The community has just elected Crespo alcalde, and he sees in the magistracy thrust upon him a means of obtaining reparation or arrogance. First he pleads with the arrogant officer as a man, to make good the wrong done and restore the family's lost honor. But the abductor stands on his superior rights of caste and defies the alcalde to hold and try him, saying that he is exempt from judgment except in a military court. This contention is hotly upheld by Lope De Figueroa, the irascible Spanish commander. But the outraged father refuses to surrender the prisoner, and when King Philip II. appears on the scene, learns the facts, approves the arrest, but demands the return of the culprit to the military authorities for punishment, the village prison doors are opened and the captain is found already strangled. The play is simple in construction and rapid and natural in action, and even in the translated version strongly suggests the poetical qualities of the original. [New York Tribune.

From N E
Address
Date OCT 3- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Dr. Muck Arrives—New Concert Master—This Year's Soloists.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, bringing with him a packing-case of new music which he will try out with the Orchestra when rehearsals begin. There are 15 new scores, some of which will likely be given in Baltimore this winter. Among the new music which Dr. Muck will probably play this year is a symphony written by Henry Hadley, the American composer, who lives in Somerville, near Boston. Last year Dr. Muck played a symphonic poem by this composer, called "Salome." Mr. Hadley is regarded as one of the most promising of American composers. He won the Paderewski prize in 1903 with his symphony "The Seasons."

There have been several interesting changes in the great Orchestra since last season. Willy Hess, the concert master, has been granted a year's leave of absence, and will not appear with the Orchestra at all this season. His place is taken by Carl Wendling, who, for the last four years, has been concert master at the Court Theatre, Stuttgart. The new concert master is an Alsatian by birth, and, though but 32 years old, has had a distinguished career. His musical education was obtained principally from Joachim, under whom he studied several years. For four years he was concert master under Steinbach in the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, and then went to Stuttgart. He has been concert master at all the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth since 1902, and in 1903, 1904 and 1905 he was concert master under Hans Richter at the Wagner festivals at Covent Garden, London.

The Adamowski brothers have both left the Orchestra, and Max Zacht, who shared the first desk of the second violins with Ferir, has gone to St. Louis, to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra there. Two of the members of the Orchestra have died since last season, and others have been retired on pensions, so, altogether, there will be 16 new faces in the body this year. Four of the new men are first violins, two are second violins, there is one new 'cellist, and one new viola player, and two new double basses. The remainder are divided among the wind and percussion instruments. The Orchestra will be composed of 98 men this year—two more than last year.

Paderewski, the celebrated pianist, who will be the soloist at the concert of the Orchestra here on December 4, has sent word that he will play Rubinstein's D minor concerto at that concert. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the concert of January 8, and Melba at the concert of February 19. There will be no soloist at the first concert on November 6 or at the last, on March 18.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON HERALD—THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1907.

DR. MUCK AND WIFE ON ARRIVAL AT BACK BAY STATION LAST NIGHT

Snapshot by The Herald Staff Photographer.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1907.

PREMIUMS $2.50 TO $55

Excellent Prices Paid for Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prices ranged all the way from $2.50 as the minimum to $55 as the maximum premium paid at today's sale of the higher-priced seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The smaller figure was paid for seats Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 in Row D, on the righthand side of Symphony Hall, and for seat No. 17 in Row S, an end centre aisle seat, $55 was paid, the buyer taking only one ticket. The attendance today was excellent, and, as usual, ladies predominated in the gathering and took a more active part in the bidding than sometimes. The bidding became more general than at Monday's sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and was not so frequently confined to a sparring between merely two bidders.

For the most part, excellent prices were obtained perhaps a little above the average paid at last year's sale, yet it was easily possible to secure fine seats in desirable parts of the hall at most reasonable premiums. No one ever expects to see as high prices paid for the series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts as for the corresponding series of Friday afternoon rehearsals, therefore the same seats sold for the afternoon course in nearly every instance brought on Monday far higher prices than those at which people secured the same seats today. There was not, on Monday, for example, any sale made at as low a premium as $2.50 in row D, where $14 premium was paid for the seats going today at $2.50, and on Monday the highest price paid in this row was $51, whereas today it was much below this figure.

The sale opened with seats A 1, 2, 3 and 4 going at $4.50 and from this prices moved upward a little to $9. Row K aroused some interest because on Monday the first seats sold at $25 (today the same seats brought only $9.50 and $9) and Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 (an end seat, centre) sold for $75 premium, while today Nos. 14, 15 and 16 went at $14, and No. 17 at $26, brokers taking them.

The prices in Row L began at $9 and did not get above $19.50, at which price a broker secured four seats in the centre. A woman shouted her bid of half-a-dollar better, but the auctioneer did not hear her cry of $20 in time, as he frankly acknowledged when she challenged the sale at $19.50. But just beyond, in the same row, she secured four equally good seats for which she had to pay only $16.50 and those around her appeared to feel as satisfied as did the buyer at her getting her places cheaper, after all.

In R the premiums began at $9.50 and ran up to $35.50 for the centre aisle end seat. It was in row R on Monday that the highest premium, which was $80, was paid by a prominent broker for seats which someone particularly desired. In row S, in which the high price of $55 was reached today, the minimum premium was $9.

The sale then went on briskly with prices about as they averaged in the rows previously sold. By noon the auctioneer had sold out more than twice the number of rows he was able to reach up to that hour on Monday. And from then on he kept the sale going rapidly. Most of the bids today were on a fifty-cent raise, as compared with a dollar at the sale of rehearsal seats. The lower-cost tickets for the Saturday evening concerts, the face value of which is $10, go on sale at Symphony Hall on Friday morning at ten o'clock.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1907.

MUCK ANNOUNCES SEASON'S PLANS

Intimates That This May Be Last Year in Boston—Kaiser Wants Him to Return.

While intimating regretfully that this may be his last season in Boston, as he has not received permission from the Kaiser to continue his work here, Dr. Carl Muck, who is now settled in his apartments at the Hotel Empire in this city, talked enthusiastically yesterday regarding the forthcoming series of concerts through which he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has many new pieces for the coming season. In particular he spoke warmly of d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein"; of a symphony by Hans Bischoff of Berlin; of the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen," and of Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Christ-Elflein," which piece he first heard at the festival of the General Musical Association of Germany at Dresden last July. There, also, he discovered a set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope," by a new composer, Noren, which was one of the notable successes of the festival and which he intends to play in Boston.

American composers will by no means be neglected in the programs. Dr. Muck played several of their pieces last winter and will play more in the winter to come, notably Henry Hadley's third symphony and C. M. Loeffler's new composition for the piano.

Other new music chosen by Dr. Muck for the coming concerts includes Max Reger's "Variations," E. Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," Schjeldemp's concert piece for orchestra, Ertel's "Symphonic Poem," a suite by Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles and Franck's "Redemption" (symphonic poem).

Dr. Muck reached New York Tuesday evening on the Kronprinz Wilhelm and came to Boston yesterday afternoon. Touching on his future, the conductor said that he expects to return next May to the Royal Opera in Berlin.

"I fear," he added, "that this will be the last time I shall be allowed to come here, which I very much regret, for I am very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and believe it has a great future."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 4, 1907 FRIDAY,

A VARIEGATED GRIST OF SMALL THINGS

Hats and the Symphony Rehearsals: A Cry from a Cave-Dweller—Mr. Hammerstein Throws Out a Hint to Boston—A Novel Venture in Travesty in London—An Undiscovered Tale of Irving—The Ballad of Singers Nine—Fate, Prices and Mr. Caruso

To the Editor of the Transcript:

There are some of us purchasing tickets for the Symphony Rehearsals who "view with alarm" the great size and flaring shapes of the ladies' hats of this autumn. Unless the custom changes and the ladies remove their hats in the afternoon as they do at the theatres, and as they do on Saturday evenings at the Symphony Concerts, many of us are likely to lose all view of the players and soloists, and also to find the music muffled and dull in the little caves made for us by the almost overlapping pieces of headgear around.

Does not the city ordinance quoted in the programme book apply at Symphony Hall on afternoons as it does at the theatres and even here in the evening? The manager should make a public request to fit the case and should announce a change for this season. Will not the ladies themselves see the matter in the right light, and show the same consideration of others that prevails elsewhere and at other times? Will not you, Mr. Editor, take up the subject? Believe me, there is great need of moving in the matter. It has been bad enough in past years, but this year it seems that we men and all short people are likely to listen to our music from beneath a sort of thatched roof.

B. G.

[The autumn fashions and the longstanding customs of the Symphony Rehearsals justify our correspondent's alarms. Year after year and week after week the programme book admonishes all who read it to remove their hats. But it is an old story that when custom and admonition clash the latter usually falls. Annually "the cave dwellers" of the afternoon concerts send us these letters of complaint and protest; annually the management points to the warning of the programme book—and then from October to May the floor of Symphony Hall wears its thick and variegated thatch of flowers, feathers and velvets. It is pleasant to behold from above. It changes gratefully with the seasons, but we have the word of B. G. and many another that those who sit beneath it are insensible to all these charms. They cry to the ladies, they entreat them not to be like Keats's damsel, who was as merciless as she was fair, and we are glad to give room to the prayer.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1907

FINAL SYMPHONY SALE

Lower-Priced Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts Bring Good Premiums, as Have Previous Sales This Week

Today brought to a close the series of sales by auction of seats for the performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming fall and winter, and the four days' sale has resulted in excellent premiums paid by music lovers for coveted seats in Symphony Hall. The final sale held at this hall this forenoon was attended by many people, despite the bad weather. Seats on sale today were the lower cost ones, the face value of which is $10, for the series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts.

Opening sales were made in row K K on the floor with premiums ranging from $10 up to $15, and by the time R R was reached one could get places for as low as $6.50 and and $7, also, in the few seats in row S S, tucked away in the extreme right and left corners of the hall, from which, however, one can hear very well. The premium of $15 was therefore the highest paid today for the floor seats.

In the first balcony, seats in the rear rows sold at prices ranging from $7, as the minimum, to $14.50 as the maximum premium. These are all excellent seats and command an unbroken view of the stage. Seats directly in front of them, the face value of which is $18 instead of $10, brought relatively higher premiums at yesterday's sale, yet are probably no better situated for the hearing of music.

The two rows of side seats in the second balcony on the right of the hall sold at premiums ranging from $10 to $20.50 for the front row and at prices averaging about $10 premium for the second row in this part of the hall. Directly across in the left of the second balcony front seats brought as high as $21, the highest price today, and many sold for around $15 and $17. In the second row, side, the prices ran from $8.50 up and many seats went at that price and at about $10.

The sale did not occupy as much time as previous sales this week and, unlike other days, was confined merely to a morning session. Good prices have been obtained at the four days' sales and they compare very favorably with those of other years. This is the second year that the face value of seats, to which all premiums are added, have been $18 and $10, as against the prices of previous seasons, $12 and $7.50, respectively.

Paper | Sun
City | Columbus
Date | State O

DR. KARL MUCK HERE WITH MANY NOVELTIES

Is Ready for the Season and Opposed to Lessening Number of Concerts in Season's Programme.

Dr. Karl Muck is in Boston again with a host of musical novelties for the symphony orchestra, which he is to conduct for another year.

In a talk with The Boston Herald at the Empire Hotel last night, the conductor said he was opposed to diminishing the number of concerts now given every season by the orchestra, on the ground that "the present arrangement gives the utmost opportunity for hearing all classes of music."

Dr. Muck, when questioned as to the likelihood of his being able to extend his stay, declined to express an opinion, saying: "You know that doesn't depend upon me."

But several visitors who called on the conductor last night announced their belief that, if properly urged, Emperor William would be glad to "lend" Dr. Muck to Boston for another 12 months.

Dr. Muck's promised novelties for the Symphony orchestra concerts will be taken from the works of H. Bischoff, D'Indy, Hadley, Reger, Bossi, Loeffler, Schjelderup, Ertel, Boehe, Reznicek, Hugo Kaun, Szekles, Humperdinck, Cesar Franck and Pfitzner.

The first concert will be as follows: J. S. Bach, suite in D major; Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Beethoven, Symphony No. 6 (Pastorale).

The new members of Dr. Muck's orchestra are: Carl Wendeling, concertmeister; Czerwonky, 2d concertmeister; Ribasch, violin; Rennert, violin; Theodorovicz, violin; Scheurer, viola; Kautzenbach, 'cello; Agnesy and Huber, contra bass; Stumpf, bass clarinet; Litke, bassoon; Carl Schmid, horn; Kandler, tympani; Lorenz, tuba.

Dr. Muck left Boston last May and went directly to Berlin, where he conducted three times at the opera.

Then, with Mrs. Muck, he went to his summer home in Dobelbad, Styria, where he stayed until the middle of September, going occasionally to Berlin, Dresden and Vienna on business for the orchestra.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck sailed from Bremen on Sept. 24, reached New York on Tuesday and arrived in Boston at 6 o'clock last night.

...view of the coming of the Bos... Symphony orchestra on January ...he first visit here for a number of ..., a number have tried to recall ...date of their last concert here. A ...c lover who saves all programs ...given us two programs, one hav... ...o date, but Mr. Wilhelm Gericke ...r the conductor, it must have been ...en 1884 and 1889, his first term ...rector. There were three con... ...given at this time—Thursday ..., April 15; Friday afternoon, ...16, and Friday evening, April ... were under the management ... Orpheus club. The soloists ...me. Fursch-Madi, Mr. D. M. ..., Mr. Adamoski, Annie Louise ..., Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. ...ese. The other program bears ...e of May 5, 1890, also under ...pices of the Orepheus club. ...ductor was Arthur Nikisch, ...oloists were Mme. Steinbach... ...pprano, and Mr. C. M. Loef... ...inist. We give the program ...an item of interest:

.....Overture, "Sakuntala."
...ria, "Thou May'st Learn to ..." from "Die Entfuehrung aus ...il.
...me. Steinbach-Jahns.
...honie Espagnole for violin ...estra.
...Mr. C. M. Loeffler.
.....Suite "Peer Gynt," Op. 46
...Songs With Piano.
.....
.....
.....
...e. Steinbach-Jahns.
...Symphony No. 1 in B Flat

[16]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1907
BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

A NOTE ABOUT SYMPHONIES

A WORD THAT IS COMMONPLACE IN BOSTON

Yet It Stands for a Form That Has Kept Its Vitality Well Into a Second Century —What Persuaded the Earlier Composers to Adopt It and What Preserves It—The Eighteenth Century Conditions That Really Gave It Birth—Some Interesting Reflections by Joseph Bennett and Vernon Blackburn Apropos of Mozart and Beethoven Next Week

A week hence, the Symphony Concerts begin for their twenty-seventh year and with a programme that bears out their name. Two of the classic symphonies—Mozart's in G-minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral"—stand upon it. Thereafter for nearly seven months, with the exception of an occasional week when the orchestra is absent or tone-poems and like modern pieces make the programme, the public of the Symphony Concerts may hear a symphony every Friday and every Saturday. The word—if not the thing behind it— has grown so familiar that it passes almost unheeded. It is as much a formula as "there will be an intermission" and the like on the familiar pages of the programme book. The symphony may be old or may be new. The programme always notes the fact; and the listener's ears, if not his eyes, speedily recognize the distinction. But who as he makes it happens to think that these reiterated symphonies follow a musical form that is now more than a century old and that in spite of time and change still keeps much of its vitality. Mr. Joseph Bennett, in the leisure of retirement from the routine of reviewing has been reflecting on all this in the London Daily Telegraph. Now, perhaps, when our Symphony Concerts, with the word in their very name, are about to begin is the time to reprint some of his reflections.

"When a musical form has lasted far into its second century," Mr. Bennett begins, "we may confidently expect to find signs of wear and tear. It has been through all those years subject to the spirit of change; at the mercy even of a single individual, should one arise of sufficiently commanding genius, and this above all when the period of its original freshness lies far back, and men have forgotten or become careless of its primitive significance and claims. This statement applies to the orchestral symphony as much as to any other model shaped in the past and still usable, though mayhap, much battered by successive tinkerings. Indeed, of all that the history of music offers as proper objects of contemplation, nothing is more fascinating in its interest than the story of the symphony. We become absorbed in watching the early formative processes, operating through the middle decades of the eighteenth century, with all the impressiveness of the inevitable, and finding rest only when Haydn and Mozart, absolute masters of absolute music, had put their final touches to the structure so patiently built by successive hands. The effect upon us is strengthened when we consider that the question mainly at issue was not what the composer should say, but how he should express himself in terms recognizable as those of art. The 'gray fathers' of music were artists before all. They made for themselves rules and regulations as rigid as those which ordered their conduct in the social life of a formal age. Why not? Music, as we now understand the term, was young, and had to be brought under the reign of order if only for the sake of its own status. The desultory may show a full head, but connection must proceed from a thoughtful one. So our old masters perceived, and the form of classic symphony was devised accordingly. In its ultimate shape it is a supreme example of connection, and that even in the contrast of its movements. Contrast was more needful, perhaps, than comparison, and the framers of symphonic form in this also obeyed Nature's law.

"Why did the pioneers of musical form thus entangle themselves in bonds of their own creation? The explorer of an African forest cannot avoid being tied up now and then, but why should any man make fetters for his own limbs? By way of reply, I need only indicate the exceeding value of restraint in all art, more especially in the art of music, the very nature of which offers temptations to extravagance, and even to a sort of vagabondage, that makes its victim liable to indictment as having no visible means of artistic subsistence. But the conclusive answer to the argument of bonds is found in the work done by the men who submitted to them. Haydn and Mozart, as those who had perfected the form, do not surprise us when they keep within its limits; but they had a contemporary and survivor from whose bold and daring genius anything in the nature of revolt and revolution might have been expected. Schindler once remonstrated with Beethoven on account of some 'consecutive fifths.' 'The greatest masters disapprove them,' said Schindler. 'And I,' responded Beethoven, 'I approve them.' The point is that Beethoven was content with the established order found ready to his hand, and worked his miracles of sound in general accordance with the regulations in that case made and provided. So with his successors till recent times. How is that for the symphonic form of classic days?

"I have introduced the name of Beethoven somewhat prematurely, because that master really belonged to, or at any rate anticipated, a more modern development of the art than either Haydn or Mozart lived to see. But let me dwell for a moment upon the conditions under which the symphonic form spent its first years. It should be remembered that music, in all its manifestations of higher rank than the folk-tune, appealed only to the 'better' classes of society—to the people whose social life was regulated by the strictest rules, who were in every sense and in an extreme degree artificial, who made art merely the minister of a transient pleasure, and whom serious thought on any other subject than themselves and their personal concerns passed by on the opposite side of the way. From this soil sprang, as by a process of Nature, an order of music altogether in keeping. Can we wonder that in the decades immediately preceding the French Revolution music was refined and polished to the last degree? Was it not as a matter of course that the art kept itself in touch with the noble ladies and gallant men who in graceful procession passed across the stage of social life? And what art it was; albeit consecrated to a state of things so frivolous as to seem unworthy!

"In Mozart's last years—those of the 'Requiem' and the three great symphonies—a new note sounded, one which, if it had any effect at all, say that of an earth 'trembling' in California, could hardly have been understood as a portent. But even this sign of emotion in musical utterance was absolutely subordinate, and probably passed without serious notice. If so, the fact may be excused. Even a fine gentleman of the period sometimes showed himself to be a man, and escaped ostracism. In the so-called 'Jupiter' symphony of Mozart we have, maybe, the completest utterance, not only of the master, but of the school in which, as a symphonist, he taught. It is not humanity which speaks to us there; it is pure art; music in its most absolute and abstract form. There is a real danger of forgetting, so accustomed are we to see music pass before us, chained to the triumphal car of a poet or a programme, on her way to what fate may order. No doubt many composers are kept outside the Eden of absolute music by the fiery sword of Richard Wagner, who issued an edict to the effect that symphonies, after Beethoven, were impossible. It must be said that he spoke after experiment, and knew the exact strength of the impossibility."

Here Mr. Bennett may end, and another English reviewer of very different standards, tastes and expression may continue the tale. A few years ago in London the late Vernon Blackburn heard a symphony by Mozart and a symphony by Beethoven in the same concert, as we shall do here in Boston. The experience set him reflecting on the symphonies of the two composers, in the long years that have passed since they made them, and next day he wrote in the Pall Mall Gazette: "Hypothesis has long been as favorite a game to the speculative philosopher as is (shall we say?) ping-pong to the domestic sportsman of today (1901). Listening the other night at the Queen's Hall to a performance of symphonies by Beethoven and Mozart, it occurred to us somewhat vividly how very much more important it was to the history of art that Beethoven should have been born rather than Mozart. We say to the history of art, not to its treasury; in a word, without the advent of Mozart modern music, with very little modification would, we can scarcely doubt, be in very much the same position as we find it now. Without the appearance of Beethoven, however, it is not easy to realize what modern music would be. A curious thought, one is immediately inclined to say; and in spite of a certain superficial conclusion which might be obvious to any one who just looked at the facts as they stand, this truth by no means necessarily implies that Beethoven ranks (just on account of this truth) in a higher position than Mozart.

Mozart, then, finished a school. He was the last and the greatest of the musicians (unless we bracket with him John Sebastian Bach, who was, however, born in 1685) who made the eighteenth century so great a musical age. He was not necessary. It is a grand possession of the world that we have in him so exquisite a genius to admire, to love, and in a certain sense to learn from; but Beethoven stands not as the completion of a school of the past, but as in truth the new seer of the music that was to follow. It is not easy to think, for example, what Wagner would have been had there been no Beethoven before him; which implies, of course, that it is still less easy to perceive what any of the great musicians of the nineteenth century and the present would have been for precisely the same reason. The past, upon which Beethoven laid his mighty hand, and upon which he stopped, as it were, before he sought the province ahead of him, would have been enough in itself had there been no such supreme culmination of the eighteenth century school as is to be found in Mozart. It is not easy exactly to disentangle all the threads of influence which separate one school from another; but the fact remains that very often, no less in the history of musical than in that of other arts, we could much better afford, in the long run, to lose one consummate artist who completes an age than to lose an artist, even possibly of not so great a mould (though he would have great hardihood who would assert this in connection with Mozart), who foreruns something that is to come.

It is a very curious question; but in this answer seems to lie the explanation of why those who are most forward—in the slang phrase, up-to-date—in their musical admirations will ever be inclined to belittle the genius of the composer of "Figaro's Wedding," where they would deem it blasphemy to say anything save words of the deepest enthusiasm in connection with the creator of the Seventh Symphony. The fact is, though they are scarcely able to appreciate the matter themselves, that they feel the sense of discipleship involved in Wagnerism, to use the phrase for a mere convenience, and all the modern school of music when they consider the influence of Beethoven; with equal unconsciousness they feel an untrammelled sense in considering the work of Mozart. Therefrom springs up an equally unconscious hero-worship, the object of which assuredly deserves every fragment of praise and reverence, but the hidden and intuitive reason for which, quite apart from natural and well-founded admiration, is centred in a cause of which they are themselves ignorant, and which in this small theory we have attempted to explain."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Concerts begin for the twenty-ninth year next Friday afternoon and next Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. The appointed time—2.30 in the afternoon and eight in the evening—and the general arrangements remain as they have long stood. Dr. Muck returns for a second year as the conductor of the orchestra, and as already set forth at length in this column, there has been a considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra from the concert master through nearly a fifth of its membership. Dr. Muck begins agreeably with the classic and familiar already noted elsewhere in this paper—Beethoven's "pastoral symphony," Mozart's symphony in G minor, numbered 550 in Köchel's catalogue, and a suite by Bach in D major.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1907.

SYMPHONY OPENING.

Next week brings the first of the Symphony concerts, the rehearsal beginning at 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and the concert at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. With an auction sale which showed as gratifying results as that of last year, with the brightest of prospects in all the cities the orchestra will visit, there seems to be no doubt that the coming season will be one of the best in the history of the organization. Dr. Muck has returned well rested and keen for his work.

Many new faces will be seen in the orchestra and it is the belief that the orchestra has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concert-master, Mr. Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr. Czerwonky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad, and later in the season an opportunity will be given the patrons of the orchestra to hear him as a soloist. As last year, Dr. Muck begins his season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the great names on it.

— SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1907
BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next week brings the first of the symphony concerts, the public rehearsal beginning at 2:30 p.m. on Friday and the concert at 8 p.m. on Saturday. Many new faces will be seen in the orchestra and it is the belief that the orchestra has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concert-master, Mr. Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr. Czerwonky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad and later in the season an opportunity will be given the patrons of the concerts to hear him as a soloist. As last year Dr. Muck begins his season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the great names on it. It is:

J. S. Bach—Suite in D major.
W. A. Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
L. van Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6 "Pastoral."

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Professor Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32 and speaks most excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three and one-half years.

Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the Conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

From NEW YORK EV'G POST
Address .....
Date OCT 5 1907

Dr. Muck brought nine new players from abroad for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among them was Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre to serve as the concertmaster of the famous Boston band.

Paderewski will give three concerts in New York the coming season, one of them with the Boston Orchestra; the other two, recitals. He will give altogether about eighty concerts. So far as New York is concerned, his concerts will be, with the operas and the Philharmonic concerts, the most interesting things to look forward to.

[17]

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 5 1907

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Professor Willy Hess, arrived in America on September 25 and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks most excellent English. He was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory, he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the Conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, under Steinbach, for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal Theater there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

The Oratorio Society of New York has commenced its rehearsals for its thirty-fifth season, 1907-1908. The society will sing at its first concert, on December 4, "The New Life" (founded on Dante's "Vita Nuova"), by E. Wolf Ferrari, a work written about six years ago and never performed in America, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny" ("Schicksalslied"). At the second concert and public rehearsal, at Christmastide, "The Messiah" will be given as usual, and at the third concert, on Holy Thursday, April 16, 1908, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion." Persons with good voices and a fair ability to read from notes may now be admitted to membership. Applications will be considered by the conductor, Dr. Frank Damrosch, at any Thursday evening rehearsal at Chamber Music Hall, Carnegie Hall.

The Russian Symphony Society ...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date OCT 5- 1907

Soloists With Orchestras.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit any performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency today among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concert-growers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on 12 out of the 24 programs. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater; but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the Middle West which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

From NEW YORK MAIL
Address .....
Date OCT 5- 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th and went immediately to Boston. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg conservatory, he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Next Wednesday marks the limit of time given to subscribers to last year's concerts in Carnegie hall to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last season. The general public season sale will open a week from Monday.

THE CLEVELAND NEWS

ARTISTS ARE PUBLIC SERVANTS

They Should Be Taught to Know Their Places and to Respect Those Who Provide Their Bread and Butter

(BY ARCHIE BELL)

AN announcement comes from Boston that soloists are to be clipped from the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra, owing to the fact that "a rapidly growing body of concert goers sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program." This is foxy. It might be swallowed whole. I understand they have swallowed it in Boston. The schedule of 24 concerts for the Hub includes only 12, or one-half, in which concert soloists will appear.

I beg to suggest, however, that Cleveland patrons of music do not stand for this treatment. "Symmetry and balance" are excellent qualities for an orchestra program, but we have had several experiences with visiting orchestral organizations, proving that without a soloist our concerts would have been pretty tame affairs—and, flatly, not worth the money.

Concerts minus the star soloists may be all very well where patrons of the symphony are also patrons of the opera. One would rather hear Sembrich, Gadski, Melba or Schumann-Heink in opera than in concert. But these stubborn songbirds and their managers refuse to twitter in Cleveland, to the operatic background, so those who have our concerts in charge should make it a point to agree to no contract which permits a visiting orchestra to appear here without some soloist, under the bluff statement that a singer breaks up symmetry and balance of programs.

This pretension is a bald lie. Soloists cost money—lots of it. Without them a manager looks after the "symmetry and balance" of his pocketbook rather than his program. The people usually pay a certain price to hear an orchestra with a big soloist thrown in for good measure, or in some instances this is reversed and the orchestra comes as good measure. When the orchestra comes alone, it can play no better and be no more valuable than when it is supported by a Melba or a Gadski. Prices will remain the same. Where, then, does the money go that would pay $700 to Gadski, $1,000 to Melba or $1,000 to Paderewski? The answer is easy. It goes to the orchestra which is not a paying institution and which has suddenly acquired a desire to preserve "balance and symmetry" in programs.

Last season I saw the check for $2,030 to Madam Marcella Sembrich for her Cleveland concert. It takes a good many admission tickets to make up an amount like that. We have to pay high prices to hear these people; but when we pay high prices we should not be bunkoed by an esthetic pill concocted in Bosting.

If they take soloists away from orchestral concerts, let them reduce prices. We pay too much as it is, compared to prices in some cities.

Suppose Manager Kline of the Opera House should announce that for the purpose of preserving the "balance" of next week's bill Miss Phoebe Davis would not appear as Anna in "Way Down East" and that the audience would be obliged to imagine that they had heard and seen her.

Suppose Mr. Daniels at Keith's should announce that, for the same purpose, he would leave out his headliner (who, incidentally, costs a lot of money), or that Mr. Glaser should decide to present "Sherlock Holmes" without scenery. These departures would be quite as fair as the Boston suggestion, so far as Cleveland is concerned. Would people tolerate it?

The Hubbites doubtless contend that in Europe the symmetry of programs beats ours. Over there the public goes to hear a symphony and perhaps one or two additional numbers, and goes away satisfied with the brief program. Yea, verily, but it is possible to get a fairly good seat for that concert for 25 to 75 cents. And as Americans feel a necessity for importing orchestra conductors and musicians galore for the organizations in this country, it cannot be argued that the concerts over there are not as good as here. Of course, they are notoriously better, for conductors who are not money mad or afflicted with ego-mania do not come to America to accept the soft berths meted out to them.

It is pretty bad advertisement of America that we must go to Europe for our music. Even the staid and steady Boston symphony commits a greater breach of tact and patriotism in this matter than it could possibly do by allowing a soloist to appear upon its programs.

Emil Paur of the Pittsburg orchestra established a rule a year ago that soloists appearing upon his programs could not respond to encores. He was reluctant in allowing Gadski to sing again at the request of a Cleveland audience at Grays' armory.

When will these hifalutin "artists" realize that they are merely paid servants of the public, and that without the public's dollars they would be fiddling for a living in a restaurant or teaching young pupils in some attic studio? The bellboy in the hotel and the porter on the Pullman brushes your coat and thanks you for the dime, at the same time endeavoring to make you comfortable and better off for his treatment.

The "artist" who serves the public in a similar capacity at $2 per, instead of 10 cents, attempts to dictate, even insults your intelligence, and as in the present instance, endeavors to sneak out of doing and allowing to be done that for which you pay him. This is notoriously true of dramatic as well as musical stars.

The dear old public is like the truckman's horse. It stands the beating and draws the heavy load, while if it once found its own strength and superiority it could be the master and do things.

I have heard people in an audience gush and smirk because Frau Flubdub or Signor Foolemi was so condescending and liberal as to respond to an encore or two. Why, bless their dear gushing souls, if an audience was wise it would make Paderewski play and Melba sing till they fell in a faint if it wanted to do so. These people are public servants. They need the public worse than the public needs them. The earth was revolving all right before these people were born and will go on just the same after they are dead.

Some day we shall be wise enough to order our entertainers to do as we want them to do, just as we order our butcher or barber to do his work.

Although a circular letter received by me from the Boston symphony orchestra management says that contracts for the "middle west" specify that no soloists shall appear on its concert programs, the local managers of the Fortnightly series are announcing a splendid assortment of soloists from Paderewski to Maud Powell, and as no two will appear on one occasion, it is fair to presume that the Boston scheme will not work in Cleveland.

The interesting announcement was made today that the fifth concert in the series will be given by the Thomas orchestra and the Oberlin Musical union, who will render Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," with Herbert Witherspoon, Edward Johnson and Christine Miller, soloists.

From INQUIRER.
Address
Date OCT 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the Boston Symphon. Orchestra, and successor to Professor Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks most excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years.

From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert-master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert-master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert-master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert-master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

Next Wednesday, October 9, marks the limit of time given to subscribers to last year's concerts in the Academy of Music to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last season. The general public season sale will open a week from tomorrow, Monday, October 14.

From
Address
Date

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and successor to Prof. Willy Hess arrived in America on September 25 and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well made and good looking man of 32, and speaks excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half.

Returning to Strassburg he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence.

Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 6, 1907.

Symphony Concerts Begin This Week.

Bright Promises for the 27th Season of the Orchestra.

M[illegible]en's Violin Recital —Coming Events.

Th's week brings the first of the Symphony concerts, the public rehearsal beginning at 2:30 o'clock, Friday afternoon and the concert at 8 o'clock Saturday evening. With an auction sale which showed as gratifying results as that of last year, with the brightest of prospects in all the cities the orchestra will visit, there seems to be no doubt that the coming season will be one of the best in the history of the organization. Dr Muck has returned well rested and keen for his work. Incidentally he has brought with him a great packing case full of new music, which during the course of the season will be submitted to the judgment of Boston's public. Some of the names of the composers are quite unknown in this country except to those who delve into the doings of German orchestral festivals. Others are new works by better known men. At any rate, the Boston tradition of catholicity of programs will be maintained.

Many new faces will be seen in the orchestra and it is the belief that it has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concert master, Mr Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr Czerwonky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad and later in the season an opportunity will be given the patrons of the concerts to hear him as a soloist. As last year, Dr Muck begins his season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the great names on it. It is as follows: Bach, suite in D major; Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Beethoven, Symphony [illegible] "Pastoral."

From
Address
Date

Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Herr Carl Wendling, der neue Konzertmeister des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters an Stelle des ausgeschiedenen Herrn Willy Heß, wurde 1875 in Straßburg im Elsaß geboren. Nach der Absolvirung seiner musikalischen Studien daselbst begab er sich nach Berlin, wo er unter Joachim 3½ Jahre arbeitete, um hierauf 4 Jahre hindurch im Straßburger Konservatorium als Professor thätig zu sein. Von da ging er nach Meiningen, woselbst er 4 Jahre lang als Konzertmeister des berühmten Meininger Orchesters unter Steinbach fungirte. Seine nächste Station war Stuttgart, wo er die Stelle eines Konzertmeisters an der königlichen Oper inne hat; er gehört diesem Institut noch an und weilt in Boston auf einjährigem Urlaub. Seit 1903 lieh er seine werthvolle Kraft den Bayreuther Festspielen, von 1903 bis 1905 wirkte er auch im Londoner Covent Garden Theater unter Hans Richter als Konzertmeister. Die Abonnenten der Bostoner, welche ihre vorjährigen Sitze nicht bis zum 9. Oktober erneuert haben, gehen dieses Rechts verlustig. Die allgemeine Subskription beginnt am 14. Oktober.

From
Address

PHILADELPHIA BRIEFS

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th, and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks excellent English. He was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory he went to Berlin, where he worked under Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg he taught for a year in the Conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner Festival performance in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performance of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

om
dress
te OCT 6- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks most excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal Theater there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence.

From
Address
Date

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America September 25 and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of thirty-two, and speaks most excellent English. He has worked under Joachim, has been concertmaster at the Royal Theater at Minnigen and at the Wagner performances at Bayreuth and at Covent Garden special performances of "the Ring."

Last year's subscribers to the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have until next Saturday, October 12, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they held last year. The general public season sale will open at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, Tuesday morning, October 15. All communications regarding the renewal of subscriptions should be addressed to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1123 16th street northwest.

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, OCTOBER 6, 1907

MUSIC NOTES.

The programme of the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Muck conductor, will be as follows: Bach's suite in D major, Mozart's symphony in G minor, Beethoven's "Pastoral"

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

of Stuttgart, the new
of the Boston Symphony successor to Professor ved in America late last ow in Boston. Wendling made and good-looking and speaks English excel-
He was born in Strassburg in and, after a course of study in the sburg Conservatory, went to Berlin, re he studied under Joachim for e years and a half. Returning to ssburg, Wendling taught for a year the Conservatory, and in 1899 went to ningen, where he was concertmaster
the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, der Steinbach, for four years. From ningen he went to Stuttgart as con-rtmaster in the Royal Theatre there, ich position he now holds, as he is in country on a year's leave of ab-
ce. Since 1903 he has been concert-ster of the Wagner Festival per-rmances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans ichter summoned Wendling to London be concertmaster of the special per-rmances of the "Ring," at Covent Garn, and in 1904 and 1905 he was con-rtmaster at Covent Garden, under ichter, at all the performances of Gern opera. Wendling is married, but family did not accompany him to country.

Wednesday, October 9, marks limit of time given to subscribers to t year's concerts in the Academy of usic to renew subscriptions and to cure the seats held last season. The neral public season sale will open a ek from to-morrow.

* * *

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit one performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency today among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried the experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programs. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the middle west which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From BALTIMORE, MD.
Address ...
Date OCT 6- 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, who is to succeed Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached Boston. He speaks excellent English, and although only 32 years old has already attained a great reputation. Although he has signed with the Symphony Orchestra for an indefinite period he is, as a matter of fact, only borrowed, for officially he still remains the concert master of the Royal Theater at Stuttgart, and is in America only on leave of absence.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 6.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week brings the first of the Symphony concerts, the public rehearsal beginning at 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and the concert at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. With an auction sale which showed as gratifying results as that of last year, with the brightest of prospects in all the cities the orchestra will visit, there seems to be no doubt that the coming season will be one of the best in the history of the organization. Dr. Muck has returned well rested and keen for his work. Incidentally he has brought with him a great packing case full of new music which during the course of the season will be submitted to the judgment of Boston's public.

Many new faces will be seen, and it is the belief that the orchestra has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concert master, Mr. Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr. Theodowsky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad, and later in the season opportunity will be given the patrons of the concerts to hear him as a soloist. As last year Dr. Muck begins the season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the composers on the programme. It is as follows:

Bach—Suite in D major.
Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6,

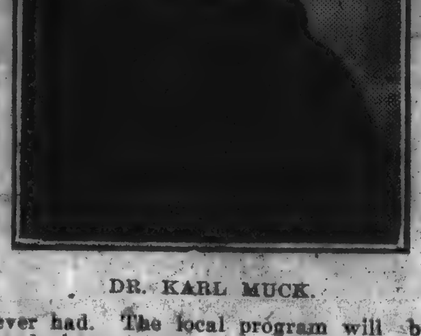
From ...
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 7- 1907

The Boston Symphony Quartette has had most flattering success on a short trip in the West. The trip was necessarily short as the members of the quartette had to return to Boston for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 7- 1907

Dr. Karl Muck, who arrived in this country last Tuesday, is in Boston, and to-morrow he will meet the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he will be the conductor, for the first time. Rehearsals will begin at once.

The sale of seats for the orchestra's concerts in Boston has been the greatest ever had. The local program will be made known next week, when the sale will open at No. 1115 Chestnut street.



DR. KARL MUCK.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date OCT 7- 1907

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a highly favorable impression on the persons who have met him since he jumped through this port to Boston. He is a tall, good looking man of 32 and speaks excellent English. Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performance of the "Ring" in Covent Garden. Next Wednesday marks the limit of time granted to subscribers to last year's concerts in Carnegie Hall to renew their subscriptions and get the seats they had last season. The general public season sale will open a week from to-day.

From ...
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT - 7 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor of Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th of last month, and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks most excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory, he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, under Steinbach, for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert-master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert-master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert-master of the special performances of the "Ring", at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert-master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1907

Here in Boston

It seems that satirical humor flavors Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, one of the new pieces by the younger German composers that Dr. Muck is to play at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the season. Several of the variations, according to German newspapers, "touch up" [illegible]

[19]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
TUESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1907

SHIFTS ARE MADE IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck Has Some New Men and Instituted Other Changes Among the Players at First Rehearsal.

The first regular rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday morning was the occasion for numerous shifts in the personnel by Dr. Muck. These shifts have given rise to rumors of discontent among the players.

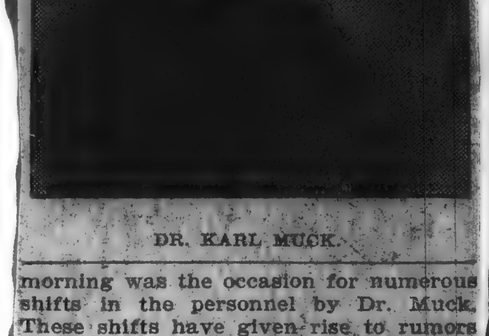
As far as can be learned, there is no jealousy shown Dr. Muck's recent importations. It was fully understood that during the absence of Mr. Hess for one year his place would be taken by Herr Wendling, and that the position lately resigned by Adamowski would be filled by Cerwonky.

There were also some changes made in the rear rows.

With regard to the actual changes there will be 12 new men. The two violinists already mentioned, Mr. Theodowich, two new second violins, one more in violas and 'cellos each and two new men for the basses are the string changes.

For the wind M. Lenow is engaged permanently as second oboe player, Mr. Brooks takes the piccolo part. The horn section is increased to eight, two players on each part.

Minor changes have been made in the rest of the orchestra.



DR. KARL MUCK.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 6- 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT MASTER.

Carl Vendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor of Prof. Villy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and the feeling is that his coming will be in the nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatien and native of Strassburg.

For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring", in 1903, 1904 and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the festival performances in Bayreuth. Mr. Vendling in addition to his French and German speaks excellent English.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 8- 1907

Dr. Karl Muck arrived recently in this country on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He brings the scores of no fewer than 15 symphonies, all of which are new to American audiences.

From ...
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date OCT 6- 1907

SYMPHONY PRICES.

What They Indicate as to Country's Prosperity.

(From the Lowell Courier-Citizen.)

Boston's Symphony concerts generally manage to furnish a pretty fair indication, by means of their advance sales of seats, as to the public's general prosperity. By that we do not mean that much is to be judged from the higher prices commanded by the better seats in the hall, because those go always to people of large wealth whose attachment to certain specific locations on the floor is so great that they will pay almost any sum to retain them as a matter of family pride—and they can, of course, afford any sum likely to be paid for such without the slightest question.

Hence it is not the record-breaking prices that tend to show the condition of public prosperity, but the general trend of the bidding by those of more modest means, their numbers at the sale, etc., these persons constituting the great rank and file of the public that is neither rich nor poor—just well-to-do. If these turn out in good numbers, bid well for seats and generally remain until they are satisfied, it is pretty safe to say that they feel they can well afford it, and that business therefore is in pretty good shape generally. If they generally bid so as further to advance the general level of prices for these seats, it is a pretty safe indication that business is on the increase, and that the average person has rather more money for pleasuring than before.

As a matter of fact, at the sale which opened on Monday the quotations seem neither to have advanced nor fallen off very appreciably—so that one might reason from it that things strike the average patron as being at least steady, so far as affects the amount he or she is able to devote to hearing good music. Of course one must bear in mind one thing—namely, that often people will retain luxuries beyond their means rather than give them up when means dwindle. It is notorious that men cut off their tobacco bills last of all when they are in reduced circumstances. But also a Symphony ticket isn't of such moment as that, as a rule; and one who feels that he cannot go above a certain price for a seat generally will not or will stay away if he feels he cannot afford the pleasure at all for that year.

Thus, we believe the maintenance of steady Symphony prices among those who love music but have small incomes is a fairly accurate indication that these small investors have no fear of undue slackening in general business, and certainly an indication that no slackening has already manifested itself.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...
Date OCT - 7 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, local manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, reports that the limit set for renewals of old subscriptions is Saturday, October 12. The books will be opened to the general public for new subscriptions at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, on Tuesday, October 15. All applications should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. The concerts will be given as last year on Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17, at 4:30. The first concert in November and the last concert in March will be purely orchestral. At the December concert Paderewski will be the soloist; at the January concert, Teresa Carreno, and at the February concert, Fritz Kreisler

From DISPATCH
Address COLUMBUS, O.
Date OCT 6-

The date for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is January 30. Already a large number of subscriptions have been received. The seats will be reserved in the order of the receipt of the subscriptions. The prices will range from $3 to $1. The full orchestra will be in Columbus, and [illegible] the same program that is [illegible] New York, Chicago and [illegible]

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th of September, and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made, and good-looking man of thirty-two, and speaks most excellent English.

Last year's subscribers to the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have until next Saturday, October 12, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they held last season.

From ...

Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ... OCT 6- 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Professor Willy Hese, arrived in America late last month and is now in Boston. Wendling is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32 and speaks English excellently. He was born in Strassburg in 1875, and, after a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory, went to Berlin, where he studied under Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, Wendling taught for a year in the Conservatory, and in 1899 went to Meiningen, where he was concertmaster of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, under Steinbach, for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concertmaster in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concertmaster of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned Wendling to London to be concertmaster of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concertmaster at Covent Garden, under Richter, at all the performances of German opera. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

Next Wednesday, October 9, marks the limit of time given to subscribers to last year's concerts in the Academy of Music to renew subscriptions and to secure the seats held last season. The general public season sale will open a week from to-morrow.

* * *

From ...

Address ...

Date ... OCT 6- 1907

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit one performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency today among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried the experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programs. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will be no assisting artist. It is very significant of the trend of the times that most of the cities in the middle west which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... BALTIMORE, MD.

Address ...

Date ... OCT 6- 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, who is to succeed Willy Hess as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has reached Boston. He speaks excellent English, and although only 32 years old has already attained a great reputation. Although he has signed with the Symphony Orchestra for an indefinite period he is, as a matter of fact, only borrowed, for officially he still remains the concert master of the Royal Theater at Stuttgart, and is in America only on leave of absence.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 6.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week brings the first of the Symphony concerts, the public rehearsal beginning at 2:30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and the concert at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. With an auction sale which showed as gratifying results as that of last year, with the brightest of prospects in all the cities the orchestra will visit, there seems to be no doubt that the coming season will be one of the best in the history of the organization. Dr. Muck has returned well rested and keen for his work. Incidentally he has brought with him a great packing case full of new music which during the course of the season will be submitted to the judgment of Boston's public.

Many new faces will be seen, and it is the belief that the orchestra has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concert master, Mr. Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr. Czerwonky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad, and later in the season an opportunity will be given the patrons of the concerts to hear him as a soloist. As last year Dr. Muck begins his season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the great names on the programme. It is as follows:

J. S. Bach—Suite in D major.
W. A. Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
L. van Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6, "Pastoral."

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

—The Boston Symphony Quartette has had most flattering success on a short trip in the West. The trip was necessarily short as the members of the quartette had to return to Boston for the rehearsals of the Boson Symphony Orchestra.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Dr. Karl Muck, who arrived in this country last Tuesday, is in Boston, and to-morrow he will meet the Boston Symphony orchestra, of which he will be the conductor, for the first time. Rehearsals will begin at once.

The sale of seats for the orchestra's concerts in Boston has been the greatest ever had. The local program will be made known next week, when the sale will open at No. 1115 Chestnut street.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Date ... OCT 7- 1907

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made a highly favorable impression on the persons who have met him since he jumped through this port to Boston. He is a tall, good looking man of 32 and speaks excellent English. Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performance of the "Ring" in Covent Garden. Next Wednesday marks the limit of time granted to subscribers to last year's concerts in Carnegie Hall to renew their subscriptions and get the seats they had last season. The general public season sale will open a week from to-day.

From ...

Address ... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date ... OCT 7 1907

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor of Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th of last month, and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made and good-looking man of 32, and speaks most excellent English. An Alsatian by birth, he was born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg Conservatory, he went to Berlin, where he worked under the instruction of Joachim for three years and a half. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory, and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, under Steinbach, for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert-master in the Royal Theatre there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on a year's leave of absence. Since 1903 he has been concert-master of the Wagner Festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert-master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert-master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera. Mr. Wendling is married, but his family did not accompany him to this country.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1907

Here in Boston

It seems that satirical humor flavors Noren's "Kaleidoscope" variations, one of the new pieces by the younger German composers that Dr. Muck is to play at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the season. Several of the variations, according to the German newspapers, "touch up" the idiosyncrasies of eminent composers

[19]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
TUESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1907

SHIFTS ARE MADE IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck Has Some New Men and Instituted Other Changes Among the Players at First Rehearsal.

The first regular rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday morning was the occasion for numerous shifts in the personnel by Dr. Muck. These shifts have given rise to rumors of discontent among the players.

As far as can be learned, there is no jealousy shown Dr. Muck's recent importations. It was fully understood that during the absence of Mr. Hess for one year his place would be taken by Herr Wendling, and that the position lately resigned by Adamowski would be filled by Cerwonky.

There were also some changes made in the rear rows.

With regard to the actual changes there will be 13 new men. The two violinists already mentioned, Mr. Theodowich, two new second violins, one more in violas and 'cellos each and two new men for the basses are the string changes.

For the wind M. Lenow is engaged permanently as second oboe player, Mr. Brooks takes the piccolo part. The horn section is increased to eight, two players on each part.

Minor changes have been made in the rest of the orchestra.

When the Symphony Orchestra met for its first regular rehearsal Monday morning it was noticed that the desk of the second bassoon was not occupied.

The reason was found in a letter Dr. Muck had received from the new man he had engaged for the position.

The man was a member of the Musicians' union and had sent the union his resignation on accepting the position with the "scab" Symphony orchestra. But when he was told he would never be again received into the union, after much deliberation he finally decided to give up the orchestra position and stay with the union.

DR. KARL MUCK.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ... OCT 6- 1907

Dr. Karl Muck arrived recently in this country on the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He brings the scores of no fewer than 15 symphonies, all of which are new to American audiences.

From ... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address ...

Date ... OCT 6- 1907

SYMPHONY PRICES.

What They Indicate as to Country's Prosperity.

(From the Lowell Courier-Citizen.)

Boston's Symphony concerts generally manage to furnish a pretty fair indication, by means of their advance sales of seats, as to the public's general prosperity. By that we do not mean that much is to be judged from the higher prices commanded by the better seats in the hall, because those go always to people of large wealth whose attachment to certain specific locations on the floor is so great that they will pay almost any sum to retain them as a matter of family pride—and they can, of course, afford any sum likely to be paid for such without the slightest question.

Hence it is not the record-breaking prices that tend to show the condition of public prosperity, but the general trend of the bidding by those of more modest means, their numbers at the sale, etc., these persons constituting the great rank and file of the public that is neither rich nor poor—just well-to-do. If these turn out in good numbers, bid well for seats and generally remain until they are satisfied, it is pretty safe to say that they feel they can well afford it, and that business therefore is in pretty good shape generally. If they generally bid so as further to advance the general level of prices for these seats, it is a pretty safe indication that business is on the increase, and that the average person has rather more money for pleasuring than before.

As a matter of fact, at the sale which opened on Monday the quotations seem neither to have advanced nor fallen off very appreciably—so that one might reason from it that things strike the average patron as being at least steady, so far as affects the amount he or she is able to devote to hearing good music. Of course one must bear in mind one thing—namely, that often people will retain luxuries beyond their means rather than give them up when means dwindle. It is notorious that men cut off their tobacco bills last of all when they are in reduced circumstances. But also a Symphony ticket isn't of such moment as that, as a rule; and one who feels that he cannot go above a certain price for a seat generally will not, or will stay away if he feels he cannot afford the pleasure at all for that year.

Thus, we believe the maintenance of steady Symphony prices among those who love music but have small incomes is a fairly accurate indication that these small investors have no fear of undue slackening in general business, and certainly an indication that no slackening has already manifested itself.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ... Baltimore, Md.

Date ... OCT 8- 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT MASTER.

Carl Vendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and successor of Prof. Villy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and the feeling is that his coming will be in the nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatien and native of Strassburg.

For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, now of Cologne, when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert master, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring" in 1903, 1904 and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the festival performances in Bayreuth. Mr. Vendling in addition to his French and German speaks excellent English.

From ... BOSTON

Address ...

Date ...

The date for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is January 30. Already a large number of subscriptions have been received. The seats will be reserved in the order of the receipt of the subscriptions. The prices will range from $3 to $1. The full orchestra will be in Columbus, and present the same program that is presented in New York, Chicago and Cincinnati.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, local manager of the Boston Symphony concerts, reports that the limit set for renewals of old subscriptions is Saturday, October 12. The books will be opened to the general public for new subscriptions at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, on Tuesday, October 15. All applications should be sent to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1126 Sixteenth street northwest. The concerts will be given as last year on Tuesday afternoons, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17, at 4:30. The first concert in November and the last concert in March will be purely orchestral. At the December concert Paderewski will be the soloist; at the January concert, Teresa Carreno, and at the February concert, Fritz Kreisler

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

Carl Wendling, of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor to Prof. Willy Hess, arrived in America on the 25th of September, and went immediately to Boston. Mr. Wendling has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him. He is a tall, well-made, and good-looking man of thirty-two, and speaks most excellent English.

Last year's subscribers to the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have until next Saturday, October 12, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they held last year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 6 1907

...SICIANS

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

She will sing at Memorial hall October 25 at the Maennerchor benefit.

Orchestras will always have a certain number of soloists in a series of concerts, not only to give variety to their programs, but to admit one performance of important works which call for a solo artist. There is, however, a general tendency today among the better established orchestras to cut down the number of soloists. There is a great and rapidly growing body of concert goers who sympathize decidedly with the modern conductor, that a soloist more often than not breaks the symmetry and destroys the balance of a symphony program, and such persons are even now in the large majority of those to whom an orchestra must look for steady support. On the other hand, by cutting down the number of soloists an orchestra is enabled to concentrate the money set aside for this purpose on a few of the greatest artists available.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has taken a lead in this matter. Last season it tried what many considered the hazardous experiment of radically reducing the number of its assistant artists, not merely in Boston, but wherever it played. The result was surprising. Not only was there no falling off in attendance when no soloist was announced, but in New York, a typical illustration, the largest receipts of the season were at two concerts where the orchestra was alone. The experiment was so successful that for the present season a schedule has been arranged whereby in Boston there will be soloists on twelve out of the twenty-four programs. In New York and the other cities where series of concerts are given, the proportion of concerts with soloists will be a little greater, but in many of the cities where only one concert is given there will [illegible] It is significant of the trend [illegible] times that most of the cities in the middle west which the Boston Symphony will visit next January have had it specified in the contracts that they want only the orchestra and no soloist.

An unusual number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. The year's leave of absence given to the concert master, Professor Willy Hess, and the resignation of Mr. Timothee Adamowski will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Prof. Hess's place will be Karl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theater of Stuttgart and of the Bayreuth Festival theater. In Mr. Adamowski's place will be Mr. Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen. The vacancy in the first violins caused by the death of Mr. Arnold Moldauer will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel quartet. A new viola will share the first desk of that section of the orchestra with Mr. Emile Ferir, in place of Mr. Max Zach, who has been appointed conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony society. There will be a new bass clarionet in place of Mr. Frietsche, who died last spring, a new bassoon, two new horns, thus giving the orchestra a full complement of eight, and a new tuba. There will be some other minor changes in the string choir.

Carl Vendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra and successor of Professor Willy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon [illegible] and the [illegible] nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatian and a native of Strasburg. For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen orchestra when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring" in 1903, 1904 and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the Festival performances in Bayreuth. Mr. Wendling in addition to his French and German, speaks most excellent English.

---

This orchestra wil be heard in Columbus the 30th of January at Memorial hall.

From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date

New Yorkers who are not "old subscribers" to the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, are told that Mr. Heck at Carnegie Hall will open the Boston sale for newcomers at the box office next Monday morning at 9 o'clock. The subscription for the seats hitherto sold at the medium price of $7.50 has been raised to $9. Otherwise the prices remain the same as in past years.

Boston's sale last week was an auction; as usual, the event of the year. Again matinée rehearsals had the call. The highest single seat was sold for $98, while a block of four seats on the centre aisle brought $93 apiece, or a total of $372 for the four. The last matinée seats were sold, the auction lasting till long after sunset.

Boston's highest premium of $80, to which was added the regular $18 price of the seat, was made soon after lunch in the early afternoon. The lowest premium bid was $5 for a single seat in the front row on the orchestra floor. The "best families" were there, but the newspapers said that ticket brokers did most of the talking.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
From
Address
Date

The Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn.

Under the direction of Dr. Muck, five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, on November 9, December 6, January 10, 21, March 20. At the first and fifth of these there will be no soloists. Paderewski will play at the second, Carreño at the third, Kreisler at the fourth. The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony; Reger's "Variations"; Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani"; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; César Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein."

From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date

Another Western discovery: Ten times will Paderewski play with orchestra. It was said his only appearances would be seven with the Boston Symphony, three with the Pittsburg and two with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago. To this list he has added one appearance with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in Minneapolis on Jan. 17.

The Minneapolis Orchestra is one of the most prosperous in the Middle West, and one which is doing extraordinarily good work in the cause of music.

From NEW YORK EV'G POST
Address
Date OCT 12 1907

[illegible] engagements on the Pacific Coast.

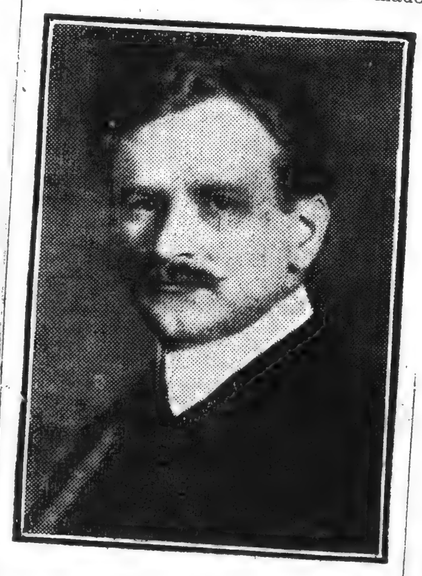
Attention is called to the fact that the subscription price of the seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts, hitherto sold for $7.50, has been raised to $9. Otherwise, the prices remain as before. The dates and soloists have already been mentioned in this column.

20

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES.
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 12 1907

When Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston, last week, he brought with him a stout packing case, so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Reger, which it contained, among other things. In all, Dr. Muck has brought over fourteen new works, which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley, one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler, and several names which are new to this country. The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, Symphony; Henry Hadley, Symphony; Mox Reger, Variations; Bossi, "Intermezzo Goldoniani"; Loeffler, Orchesterstruck; Schjelderup, orchesterstuck; Ertel, Symphonie Poem; Boehe, Symphonie Poem; Renicek, "Suite"; Hugo Kaun, "Suite"; Szekles, "Serenade"; d'Indy-Wallenstein, Symphony; Humperdinck, Overture; "Heirat rider Willen"; Franck, "Redemption"; Pfitzner, Overture, "Christelfiein." In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

The orchestra will return to Brooklyn slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight, instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season, and various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignations of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to the high standard, and the pension fund of the orchestra is now making retirements of older members possible, with a minimum of hardship to them. Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. Prof. Willy Hess, for three years the concert master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned, in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.



CARL WENDLING.
New Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In Prof. Hess' place will be found Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great concert masters of the Continent. Although he is but 32 years old, he has been for four yearse concert master at Meiningen, under Steinbach, and for the same length of time concert master at Stuttgart. He has been concert master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals, and for three seasons was concert master of the German performances at Covent Garden, under Richter. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothee Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim, and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra, and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch, of Vienna, and William Traupe, who has been transfersred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer, of Berlin, and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautsenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid, of Vienna

---

The Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitute not only a leading characteristic function in Brooklyn, but also its chief social function. Many of those who attend the concerts have been subscribers since the early days of Theodore Thomas' conductorship in Brooklyn, and all of the regular subscribers have been members of the Philharmonic Society for a term of years. The Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society is as follows: Carll H. De Silver, President; Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John E. Leech, John S. Frothingham, James L. Morgan, Crowell Hadden, William H. Wallace, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, George H. Southard, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Walter H. Crittenden, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, Horace J. Morse and Charles J. Peabody.

With the Philharmonic Society, which maintains a nominal existence, is associated the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and more particularly its Music Department, the officers and the Executive Committee of which comprise: R. Huntington Woodman, President; Arthur Claassen, First Vice President; Perlee V. Jervis, Second Vice President; John Hyatt Brewer, Secretary; H. Brooks Day, Librarian; R. Huntington Woodman, Samuel A. Baldwin, John Hyatt Brewer, F. A. M. Burrell, Arthur Claassen, H. Brooks Day, James H. Downs, Carl Fique, Walter Henry Hall, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton and Graham Reed.

Associated with the Philharmonic Society and the Institute is the Women's Auxiliary Board, comprising some three hundred and fifty women, who are prominent in the musical and social life of Brooklyn. Of these ladies the following constitute the Executive Committee of the Board: Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. George W. Wingate. With these organizations are associated some two thousand two hundred and sixty-nine members of the Music Department of the Institute, who give the principal support to the Institute's musical undertakings.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 12 1907

PADEREWSKI AND MELBA.

Will Be Soloists At Boston Symphony Concerts.

Only four more days remain for last year's subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to renew their subscriptions and secure their former seats, the limit of time for renewals being next Friday, October 17. The books will then be closed until Monday, October 21, when they will be open to the general public subscription sale. As already has been announced, the Orchestra will give five concerts in the Lyric, on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. Three soloists are announced. At the December concert Paderewski will play, at the January concert Teresa Carreno and at the February concert Mme. Melba.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 12 1907

The public sale for the Boston Symphony's five concerts will open next Monday morning.

It is possible that this will be the last season of the orchestra under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck. His present leave of absence is for but one year, though every effort will be made to retain him. The orchestra is now composed of ninety-eight musicians, two more than last year, and possesses two quartettes of horns.

Paderewski will be the soloist at the December concert. Teresa Carreno in January, and Melba will make her appearance with the orchestra in February, her only one in this city this season. Novelties to be presented include new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture "Heira Wider Willen"; Caesar Franck's "Redemption"; and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein."

HERALD
OCT 12 1907

Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and successor of Prof. Willy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon all who have met him, and the feeling is that his coming will be in the nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatian and a native of Strasburg. For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. Thence he went to Stuttgart as concert master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner's "Ring" in 1903, 1904, and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the festival performances in Baireuth. Mr. Wendling, in addition to his French and German, speaks most excellent English.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address ..... BROOKLYN EDIT
Date ..... OCT 12 190

Plan Boston Orchestra Concerts

First Will Be Held on November 8—Weddings, Engagements and Society News.

Five concerts in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first of which will be held on the evening of November 8, promise to be among the leading musical events of the winter in this borough, despite the fact that again they will be held in the Baptist Temple, until the new Academy of Music is finished. The Brooklyn Institute, under whose auspices, together with the Philharmonic Society and the Woman's Auxiliary Board, the orchestra comes here, announces that the subscription sale of seats for these concerts will take place Wednesday evening, October 23, in the Art Building, in Montague street.

There will be no soloist at the first concert, and none at one other, but in December M. Paderewski will make his only Brooklyn appearance with the orchestra. The other dates are December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20.

The Boston manager has sent word that several novelties in musical compositions will be introduced into this season's programmes.

Dr. Karl Muck will conduct as heretofore, but Mr. Willy Hess' place as concertmeister will be filled by Mr. Carl Wendling, who comes from Stuttgart.

Many of those who attend the concerts have been subscribers since the early days of Theodore Thomas' conductorship in Brooklyn, and all of the regular subscribers have been members of the Philharmonic Society for years. The directors of the Philharmonic Society are:—Carl H. De Silver, president, and Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John E. Leech, John S. Frothingham, James L. Morgan, Crowell Hadden, William H. Wallace, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, George H. Southard, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Walter H. Crittenden, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, Horace J. Morse and Charles J. Peabody.

With the Philharmonic Society is associated the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and more particularly its music department, the officers and the Executive Committee of which are:—R. Huntington Woodman, president; Arthur Claassen, first vice president; Perlee V. Jervis, second vice president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; H. Brooks Day, librarian; R. Huntington Woodman, Samuel A. Baldwin, John Hyatt Brewer, F. A. M. Burrell, Arthur Claassen, H. Brooks Day, James H. Downs, Carl Fique, Walter Henry Hall, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton and Graham Reed.

Associated with the Philharmonic Society and the Institute is the Women's Auxiliary Board, including 350 women prominent in the musical and social life of Brooklyn. Of these the following constitute the Executive Committee:—Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Helnigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

With these organizations are associated 2,269 members of the music department of the institute who make Brooklyn a music centre.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra expresses regret that it cannot extend its New York performances beyond the usual five Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, beginning on Nov. 7. This is in response to a very general request for an extension of the series. The public subscription opens on Monday at Carnegie Hall. Seats hitherto sold for $7.50 will cost $9. Otherwise the prices remain the same. The orchestra this season will consist of ninety-eight players under Dr. Karl Muck, with Carl Wendling as concert master. There will be no soloist at the November and March pair of concerts. In December Van Rooy will sing in the evening and Paderewski will play in the afternoon, Teresa Carreno in the evening and Carl Wendling in the afternoon are announced for January. Kreister will play at the evening concert in February.

Establi ...8

From NEW YORK MAIL
Address .....
Date Oct 12, 1907

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS WILL SOON BEGIN

The opening orchestral concert is just twenty-one days away, and thereafter musical events will occur at the rate of three or four daily.

Monday, new subscribers to the New York symphony series can obtain their tickets at Carnegie Hall and at 1 West Thirty-fourth street. Mr. Walter Damrosch has prepared twenty programs full of most interesting promises.

There will be a Dvorak programme, and one devoted to Liszt, the distinctive feature of which will be his "Faust" symphony. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist upon this occasion. One of the original offerings will be made December 1st, when Mr. Damrosch will show how family life has been described by the different composers. This will give him an opportunity to present again the domestic symphony of Richard Strauss, strictly as programme music, something from which Strauss always wanted to get away, and from which he should get away if we are expected to take this work seriously.

Wagner was much happier in his "Siegfried Idyll," which was written as a tribute to Cosima on the birth of their son, Siegfried. This will also have a place on "The Family" programme. For the performance of "Eugen Onegin" and for the final concert of the Beethoven cycle, the New York Symphony orchestra will have the co-operation of the chorus from the Oratorio Society, and in exchange Frank Damrosch will have the orchestra for his regular series of oratorio concerts. The opening concerts of the New York Symphony will be given Saturday afternoon, November 2nd and following Sunday afternoon, November 3rd.

* * *

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given Thursday evening, November 7, and the following Saturday afternoon. According to the custom established last year, there will be no soloists at the first pair of concerts nor at the fifth. The orchestra will have a membership of ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional men completing the two quartet of horns. Professor Willy Hess is in Europe on a leave of absence, the Adamowski brothers resigned to give more time to chamber music and Max Zach resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. Dr. Muck personally selected all the new members and will have the task of reorganizing the great orchestra. In addition to Carl Wendling, who replaces Hess, will be Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, as the successor of Timothee Adamowski. Moldauer will be replaced by Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra and recently second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The soloists at the concerts include Anton Van Rooy and Paderewski, in December. Teresa Carreno and Carl Wendling will be the soloists here at the January concerts, Kreisler will be the soloist for the evening concert in February. Dr. Muck must have searched Germany throughout for novelties, as when he arrived in Boston he brought with him a packing case of heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Reger, among other things.

The "other things" included new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and H. Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony, a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler, a symphonic poem by Ertel, an orchestral number by Schjelderup, a symphonic poem entitled "Taormina," by Boehe, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Humperdinck's Overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitazner's overture, "Christelflein."

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Carl Wendling, this season's concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatian and native of Strassburg. For four years he was the concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra, when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert-master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert-master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring" in 1903, 1904, and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert-master at the festival performances in Bayreuth.

From CITIZEN
Address .....
Date OCT 12 1907

Estab ...84

The public subscription sale for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Art Building, No. 174 Montague street, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 23, at 8 o'clock. The usual quota of five concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 20.

The coming season should be even more successful than last year's which artistically as well as financially surpassed anything the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. The advent of Dr. Earl Muck as its conductor unquestionably filled a long felt want, and now as Dr. Muck is more familiar with his orchestra and with his geniuses even more artistical work may be expected this year. Absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-1909. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons and nothing will be done until this is settled finally one way or the other.

The orchestra's total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section.

Since last spring Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and Otto Frietsone, its bass clarinet, have died. Professor Willy Hess, for three years the concert-master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

In Professor Hess' place will be found Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, a young violinist, who ranks among the great concert-masters of the Continent. Although he is but thirty-two years old he has been for years concert-master at Meiningen under Steinbach and for the same length of time concert-master at Stuttgart. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals and for three seasons was concert-master of the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothee Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarach, of Vienna, and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Earl Scheurer, of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid, of Vienna.

There will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski. At the third concert in January the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, unquestionably the greatest of women pianists. For February Fritz Freisler has been engaged.

The novelties in the line of compositions to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; D'Indy's Fallenstein symphony, Reger's Variations, Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani, a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler, a symphonic poem by Ertel, another by Boehe, an orchestral piece by Schjelderup, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen," Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address BUFFALO N.Y.
Date OCT 12 1907

Buffalo is to have the pleasure of hearing the two greatest orchestras in America this season, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, gives a concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, Januay 27th, and the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, plays here on Friday evening, January 3d. The soloists at the Boston Symphony concert will probably be Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Court Theatre to serve as concertmaster for Boston during the absence of Professor Willy Hess abroad. Mr. Damrosch will have a singer for his soloist, but the selection has not been made. Both of these orchestra concerts are under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

Estab ...84

From .....
Address .....
Date OCT 12 1907

Establis...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of five Monday evening concerts, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will be opened at the Academy of Music on Monday, November 4, the remaining dates being December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Among several changes in the personnel of the orchestra will be a new concertmeister, Carl Wendling, who comes from Stuttgart, where for four years he held the same position at the Court Theatre under Carl Pohlig. He has also held other important positions in European musical circles. Following last season's plan, there will be no soloist at the first and last concerts. At the December concert Paderewski will play with the orchestra, the soloists in January and February being, respectively, Teresa Carreno and Mme. Melba.

[21]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Syracuse, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 13 1907
Establish

World of Music

The public subscription sale for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 23, at 8 o'clock. The usual quota of five concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21 and March 20. The coming season should be even more successful than last year's, which artistically as well as financially surpassed

DR. CARL MUCK,
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

anything the Orchestra has ever ha in Brooklyn. The advent of Dr. Kar Muck as its conductor unquestionabl filled a long felt want, and now as Di Muck is more familiar with his orches tra and with his geniuses even mor artistical work may be expected thi year. Much to the gratification of al music-lovers, Dr. Muck has been al lowed by the German Emperor an addi tional leave of absence of one year which assures his presence during 1907 1908 at any rate, and perhaps here is a proper place to say that absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the Orchestra for 1908-1909. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons and nothing will be done until this is settled finally one way or the other. The Orchestra will return to Brooklyn slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. In Prof. Hess' place will be found Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, a young violinist who rangs among the great concert-masters of the Continent. Although he is but 32 years old, he has been for four years concert-master at Meiningen under Steinbach, and for the same length of time concert-master at Stuttgart. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals, and for three seasons was concert-master of the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothee Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch, of Vienna, and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer, of Berlin, and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid, of Vienna. Following last year's plan there will no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March; but the quality of the three soloists for the other concerts is unusually high. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. Last year he was promised, but the promise could not be kept because of his failure to come to America. This year there is no question of his coming, as he reaches America the end of this month for a tour of the whole country, which will last until May. At the third concert in January the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, the greatest of women pianists. For the fourth, in February, Fritz Kreisler has been engaged. Kreisler, it is generally admitted, is to-day the greatest of violin virtuosos, and his appearance with the Boston Symphony will be an event of no little importance. The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Shjelde-

Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen;" Cesar Franck's overture "Redemption;" and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

FIVE NOTABLE CONCERTS BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Organization With Dr. Muck as Conductor Will Appear In Baptist Temple.

FAMOUS ARTISTS TO ASSIST.

Public Subscription Sale Opens October 23—Carl Wendling, New Concert Master.

The public subscription sale for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on Wednesday evening, October 23. The usual quota of five concerts will be given in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Friday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20.

The coming season should be even more successful than last year's, which, artistically as well as financially, surpassed anything the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. The advent of Dr. Karl Muck as its conductor unquestionably filled a long felt want and now as Dr. Muck is more familiar with his orchestra and with his geniuses, even more artistic work may be expected this year.

The orchestra will return to Brooklyn slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season and various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarionet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignation of old members.

Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarionet. Professor Willy Hess, for three years the concert master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

In Professor Hess's place will be found Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theater of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great concert masters of the continent. Although he is but 32 years old he has been for four years concert master at Meiningen under Steinbach and for the same length of time concert master at Stuttgart. He has been concert master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals and for three seasons was concert master of the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter.

Teresa Carreno.

His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothee Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch of Vienna and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer of Berlin and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid of Vienna.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March; but the quality of the three soloists for the other concerts is unusually high. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Brooklyn. At [illegible] January the soloist the greatest of women pianists. For the fourth, in February, Fritz Kreisler has been engaged. Kreisler, it is generally admitted, is to-day the greatest of violin virtuosos, and his appearance with the Boston Symphony will be an event of no little importance.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's Variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen;" Caesar Franck's "Redemption;" and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

The Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitute not only a leading characteristic function in Brooklyn, but also its chief social function. Many of those who attend the concerts have been subscribers since the early days of Theodore Thomas' conductorship in Brooklyn, and all of the regular subscribers have been members of the Philharmonic Society for a term of years. The board of directors of the Philharmonic Society is as follows: Carll H. De Silver, president; Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John E. Leech, John S. Frothingham, James L. Morgan, Crowell Hadden, William H. Wallace, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, George H. Southard, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Walter H. Crittenden, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, Horace J. Morse, Charles J. Peabody.

Carl Wendling,
Concert Master.

With the Philharmonic Society is associated the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and more particularly its Music Department. Associated with the Philharmonic Society and the institute is the Women's Auxiliary Board, comprising some three hundred and fifty women who are prominent in the musical and social life of Brooklyn. Of these women the following constitute the executive committee of the board: Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate.

With these organizations are associated some two thousand two hundred and sixty-nine members of the music department of the Institute who make Brooklyn the musical center that it is.

From SUN
Address
Date

When Dr. Carl Muck reached Boston last week he had with him a stout packing case so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Reger, which it contained, among other things. In all Dr. Muck has brought over fourteen new works which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley; one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler, and several names which are new to this country.

The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, Symphony; Henry Hadley, Symphony; Max Reger, Variations; Bossi, "Intermezzo Goldoniani"; Loeffler, Orchesterstück; Schjelderup, Orchesterstück; Ertel, Symphonie Poem; Boehe, Symphonie Poem; Reznicek, Suite; Hugo Kaun, Suite; Szekles, Serenade; d'Indy-Wallenstein, Symphony; Humperdinck, Overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; Franck, "Redemption"; Pfitzner, Overture, "Christelflein." In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

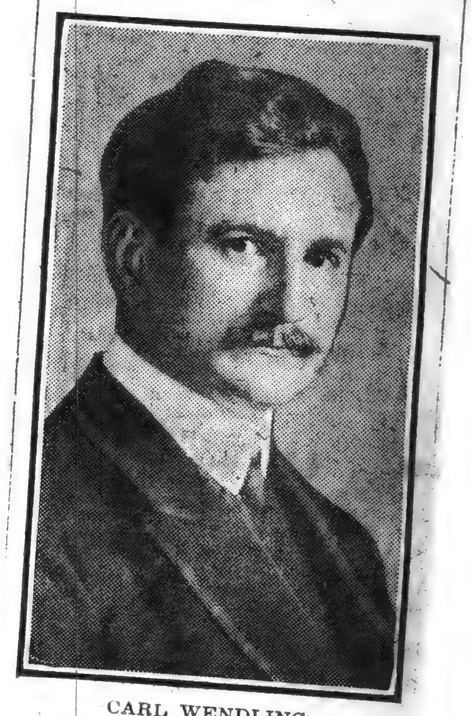
[22]

From
Address
Date
OCT 13 1907

MEN AND MUSIC FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Concert Master Comes From Stuttgart, Where He Was for Years Under Pohlig.

ACADEMY DATES FIXED



CARL WENDLING
New concertmaster of Boston Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra dates at the Academy of Music are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. The band has been increased to ninety-eight, by the addition of two horn players, there being a double quartet in this department.

The new concert master, Carl Wendling, comes from Stuttgart, where he held a similar position for four years, under Conductor Pohlig, the new musical director of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, solo violinist and pupil of Joachim, takes the place of assistant concert master vacated by the resignation of Timothee Adamowski. Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin, succeeds Josef Adamowski.

There will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts. Paderewski in December, Teresa Carreno in January and Melba in February are the only solo engagements.

New music announced by Conductor Morek includes new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's variations; Bossi's intermezzo Goldoniani; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; Cesar Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date OCT 13 1907
Estab 1884

Announcement is made that Buffalo is to have the Boston Symphony and the New York Symphony orchestras this winter, both coming in January to Convention Hall under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

Friday, January 3d, is the date for the New York Symphony's concert, Walter Damrosch conductor. Mr. Damrosch will have a singer for soloist, but the selection has not yet been made.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Convention Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, Dr. Karl Muck conductor. The soloist at this concert will probably be Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Court Theater to serve as the concertmeister for the Boston orchestra during the absence of Prof. Willy Hess abroad.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... PHILADELPHIA PA

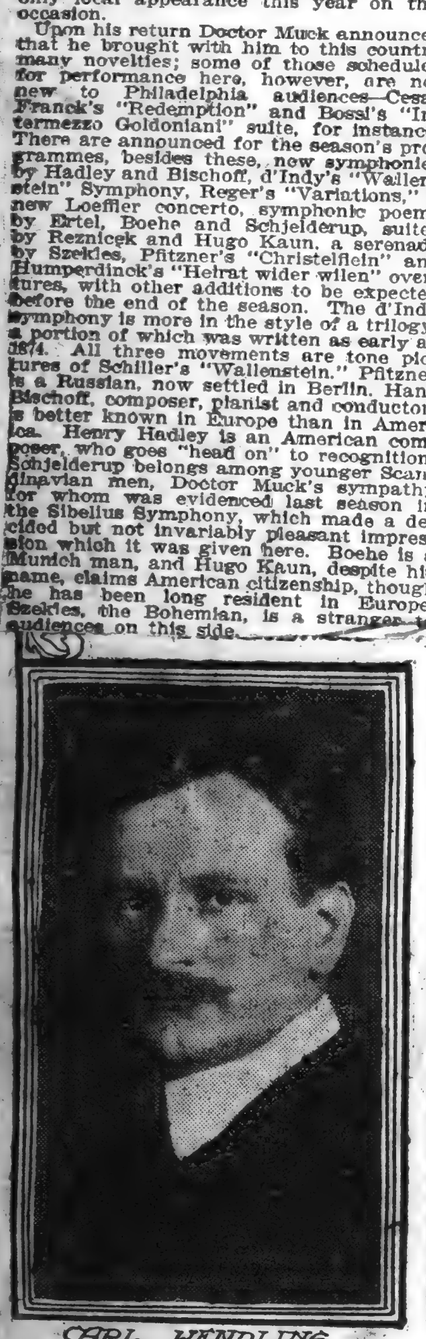
Address ...

Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Public sale for the local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens tomorrow. The usual series of five concerts will be given, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16. Dr. Karl Muck has made a place for himself in the musical interests of Philadelphia, and his increasing familiarity with his orchestra and American conditions give reason to suppose that more may still be expected from the artistic point of view. No plans looking toward a successor to Doctor Muck are being made, it being the hope of the Boston management that a further extension of his present leave of absence may be allowed by the German Emperor. The orchestra returns to Philadelphia with a slight increase in membership, this being now 98 men, the additional musicians completing two quartets of horns. A sixth of the entire membership is new, however, and there will be a general shifting of desks, with five new first and three new second violins, one new viola and 'cello each, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new double bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by death, resignation or the retirement of aged members, the orchestra's pension fund taking care of the latter. There will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts, those in November and March. For the other three the soloist is exceptionally strong—Paderewski in December (his only Philadelphia appearance with orchestra), Theresa Carreno in January, and in February Madam Melba, who will make her only local appearance this year on this occasion.

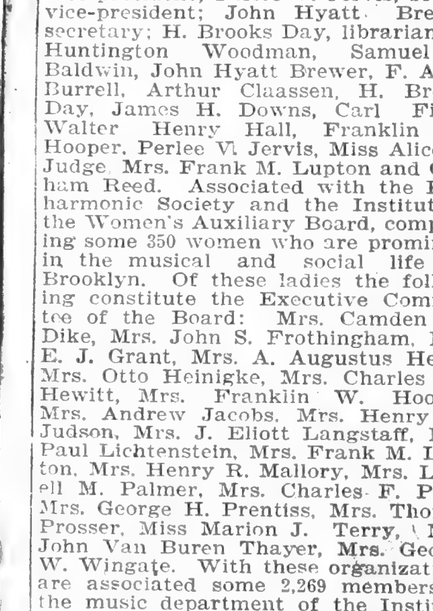
Upon his return Doctor Muck announced that he brought with him to this country many novelties; some of those scheduled for performance here, however, are not new to Philadelphia audiences—Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani" suite, for instance. There are announced for the season's programmes, besides these, new symphonies by Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Symphony, Reger's "Variations," a new Loeffler concerto, symphonic poems by Ertel, Boehe and Schjelderup, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Pfitzner's "Christelfiein" and Humperdinck's "Heirat wider wilen" overtures, with other additions to be expected before the end of the season. The d'Indy symphony is more in the style of a trilogy, a portion of which was written as early as 1874. All three movements are tone pictures of Schiller's "Wallenstein." Pfitzner is a Russian, now settled in Berlin. Hans Bischoff, composer, pianist and conductor, is better known in Europe than in America. Henry Hadley is an American composer, who goes "head on" to recognition. Schjelderup belongs among younger Scandinavian men, Doctor Muck's sympathy for whom was evidenced last season in the Sibelius Symphony, which made a decided but not invariably pleasant impression which it was given here. Boehe is a Munich man, and Hugo Kaun, despite his name, claims American citizenship, though he has been long resident in Europe. Szekles, the Bohemian, is a stranger to audiences on this side.



CARL WENDLING

SOLOISTS AND CONCERTMEISTER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitute not only a leading characteristic function in Brooklyn, but also its chief social function. Many of those who attend the concerts have been subscribers since the early days of Theodore Thomas' conductorship in Brooklyn, and all of the regular subscribers have been members of the Philharmonic Society for a term of years. The Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society is as follows: Carll H. De Silver, president; Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, John E. Leech, John S. Frothingham, James L. Morgan, Crowell Hadden, William H. Wallace, Henry F. Noyes, Thomas R. French, John J. Pierrepont, Franklin W. Hooper, George H. Southard, Robert B. Woodward, Martin Joost, A. Augustus Healy, Lowell M. Palmer, Frederick S. Parker, Walter H. Crittenden, Gates D. Fahnestock, Charles A. Schieren, Horace J. Morse, Charles J. Peabody. With the Philharmonic Society is associated the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and more particularly its Music Department, the officers and the Executive Committee of which comprise: R. Huntington Woodman, president; Arthur Claassen, first vice-president; Perlee V. Jervis, second vice-president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; H. Brooks Day, librarian; R. Huntington Woodman, Samuel A. Baldwin, John Hyatt Brewer, F. A. M. Burrell, Arthur Claassen, H. Brooks Day, James H. Downs, Carl Fique, Walter Henry Hall, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton and Graham Reed. Associated with the Philharmonic Society and the Institute is the Women's Auxiliary Board, comprising some 350 women who are prominent in the musical and social life of Brooklyn. Of these ladies the following constitute the Executive Committee of the Board: Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate. With these organizations are associated some 2,269 members of the music department of the Institute who make Brooklyn the musical centre that it is.



TERESA CARRENO

MELBA

"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... LONDON COMMERCIAL

Address ... NEW YORK

Date ... OCT 14 1901

THE public subscription sale for the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at the box office of Carnegie Hall this morning at 9 o'clock. Attention is called to the fact that the subscription prices of the seats hotherto sold for $7.50, has been raised to $8. Otherwise prices remain the same as in part years. The usual five evening and five afternoon concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall—the evening concerts on Thursdays, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 19; the afternoon concerts on Saturdays, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 21. Dr. Muck has been allowed by the German emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence as conductor for this season, and it is the hope of the management that he may be retained for one or more additional seasons. The orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, with a total membership of ninety-eight, instead of ninety-six. The additional members complete the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had only six horns. Important changes have also been made in the membership of the orchestra. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba, and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignations of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard, and the pension fund of the orchestra is now making retirements of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. Professor Willy Hess, for three years the concert-master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothée Adamowski and his brother Josef Adamowski resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Férir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

In Professor Hess's place will be found Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great concert-masters of the continent. Although he is but thirty-two years old he has been for four years concert-master at Meiningen under Seinbach, and for the same length of time concert-master at Stuttgart. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals and for three seasons was concert-master of the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothée Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In the place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra, and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch of Vienna and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer of Berlin, and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmidt of Vienna.

In accordance with the plan of last year, there will be no soloist at the first and fifth pairs of concerts—in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening, and Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York. At the January concerts the evening soloist will be Teresa Carreño, and the afternoon soloist Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist for the evening concert in February. The soloist for the afternoon concert in February will be announced later.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony; Reger's Variations; Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani"; a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; a symphonic poem, "Taormina," by Boche; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; César Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture "Christelfiein." It is likely that additions will be made to this list before the end of the season.

From ... NEW YORK SUN

Address ...

Date ... OCT 14 1901

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season and various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignations of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard, and the pension fund is now making retirements of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. Prof. Willy Hess, for three years the concert master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothée Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Férie, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society.

The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members. In Prof. Hess's place will be found Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great concert masters of the Continent. Although he is but 32 years old he has been for four years concert master at Meiningen under Steinbach and for the same length of time concert master at Stuttgart. He has been concert master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals and for three seasons was concert master of the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter.

His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothée Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch of Vienna and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer of Berlin and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid of Vienna.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloist at the first and fifth pairs of concerts in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening and Mr. Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Mr. Paderewski's only appearance with the orchestra in New York. At the January concerts the evening soloist will be Teresa Carreno and the afternoon soloist Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist for the evening concert in February and the soloist for the afternoon concert will be announced later.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony, Reger's variations, Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniani," a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel, another "Taormina" by Boehe, an orchestral piece by Schjelderup, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen," César Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelfiein."

From ... TIMES

Address ...

Date ... OCT 13 1901

Established ...

Both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra will hold their concerts this season at the New National, the former beginning Tuesday afternoon, November 5, at 4:30, and the latter following the same month, opening the series Tuesday afternoon, November 19.

Cutting Bureau
WASHINGTON
OCT 13 1907

The public subscription sale for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, on Tuesday morning, October 15, at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five afternoon concerts will be given, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. As in the past two seasons the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock.

Last season, the second since the orchestra returned to Washington, was in every respect the most successful it has ever had in this city. The advent of Dr. Karl Muck as its conductor was questionably an important element in attracting so large a public at each of the concerts. The subscription for the coming season is large, showing that Washington, with all its diverse musical interests, has room for this orchestra. Artistically, even more may be expected. Dr. Muck, much to the gratification of all music lovers, has been allowed by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence during 1907-08 at any rate. And, perhaps, here is a proper place to say that absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-09. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons, and nothing will be done until this is settled finally, one way or the other.

When the orchestra appears here at its November concert, many new faces will be seen, for a sixth of the membership has been changed, and various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba, and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignations of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard, and the pension fund of the orchestra is now making retirements of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. Prof. Willy Hess, for three years the concert-master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

In Prof. Hess' place will be found Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Court Theater of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great concert-masters of the continent. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothee Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky, of Berlin, a pupil of Joachim and a solo violinist of high rank in Germany. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the Kneisel Quartet. The other new first violins are Alexander Ribarsch, of Vienna, and William Traupe, who has been transferred from the second section. Mr. Zach's successor is Karl Scheurer, of Berlin, and Josef Adamowski's successor is Arthur Kautzenbach, also of Berlin. The new first horn is Karl Schmid, of Vienna.

Following last year's plan, there will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March; but the quality of the three soloists for the other concerts is unusually high. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Washington. At the third concert, in January, the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, unquestionably the greatest of woman pianists. For the fourth, in February, Fritz Kreisler has been engaged. Kreisler, it is generally admitted, is to-day the greatest of violin virtuosos.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list; new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony, Roger's Variations, Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani, a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler, a symphonic poem by Ertel, another by Boehe, an orchestral piece by Schjelderup, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" Cesar Frank's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein."

From COLUMBUS, O.
Address
Date OCT 13 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be here on January 30 in Memorial hall. The prices will range from $3 to $1. Mrs. Ella May Smith has already received a number of subscriptions, and it behooves every one who wishes to hear this famous organization to send in their order for tickets early. The full orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will appear.

Estab 1884

New York Tribune
154 Nassau St.
Date OCT 13 1907

The public subscription sale for the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. Attention is called by the management to the fact that the subscription price of the seats hitherto sold for $7 50 has been raised to $9; otherwise the prices remain the same as in past years. The usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts will be given. The evening concerts will be on Thursdays, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 29, while the matinees will be given on the following Saturday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21, the place being, as usual, Carnegie Hall. The orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had only six. But one-sixth of its membership is new this season and various shifts have been made among other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death or resignation of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard, and the pension fund of the orchestra is now making retirements of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

Following last year's plan, there will be no solo performer at the first and fifth pairs of concerts—in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York. At the January concerts the evening soloist will be Teresa Carreño and the afternoon soloist Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist for the evening concert in February, and the soloist for the afternoon concert will be announced later. The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony; Reger's Variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani; a new work for pianoforte and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another "Taormina" by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture to "Heirat wider Willen"; César Franck's "Redemption," and Pritzner's overture "Christelflein."

From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The public subscription sale for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, on Tuesday morning, October 15, at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five afternoon concerts will be given, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. As in the past two seasons the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock.

Dr. Muck, much to the gratification of all music lovers, has been allowed by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence during 1907-1908 at any rate. And perhaps here is a proper place to say that absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-1909. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons, and nothing will be done until this is settled finally, one way or the other.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March; but the quality of the three soloists for the other concerts is unusually high. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski. This will be his only appearance with orchestra, in Washington. Last year he was promised, but the promise could not be kept because of his failure to come to America. This year there is no question of his coming, as he reaches America the end of this month for a tour of the whole country, which will last until May. At the third concert in January, the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, unquestionably the greatest of women pianists. For the fourth, in February, Fritz Kreisler has been engaged. Kreisler, it is generally admitted, is to-day one of the greatest of violin virtuosos, and his appearance with the Boston Symphony will be an event of no little importance.

Estab 1884

NEW YORK TIMES
OCT 13

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will during the coming season give the the usual quota of ten concerts in two series of five each in Carnegie Hall. The first series will be on the following Thursday evenings: Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 19. The second series will be given on Saturday afternoons, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 21. Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor, and among the soloists will be Anton Van Roy, Teresa Carreño, Fritz Kreisler, Carl Wendling, and Paderewski. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in New York with an orchestra. The subscription sale will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 14. Renewals by last year's subscribers are now being made.

From
Address
Date OCT 13 1907

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought over with him from Europe a stout packing case, so heavy, the reports go, that it required the strength of two husky porters to carry it. He remarked, apologetically, that the weight was due to a new score by Max Reger which it contained, among other things. In all, he brought over fourteen new works which he will play in America this season. He will hardly play more than five of these in Washington. Among the novelties are works by one American composer, Henry Hadley, an American by adoption, though Alsatian by birth, Charles Martin Loeffler; and Hugo Kaun, a German, who lived many years in Milwaukee, and then left the country in disgust because he could not obtain a fair recognition for his compositions. In the list there are also several German composers, some of them followers of Richard Strauss; another one, Max Reger, a bitter opponent of Strauss; and a third, Hans Pfitzner, a man with an individual style of his own, uninfluenced by either Reger or Strauss. The French school is represented by Cesar Frank and d'Indy, although the "Wallenstein Symphony" by the latter is too early a work to be indicative of his mature style. Norway will have a hearing in a work by Schjelderup, and Marco Enrico Bossi will be Italy's musical delegate. Hermann Bischoff's "Symphony in E," a work which has been analyzed in the German Musical Magazines, "Die Musik," has also been included in the list. This work was first performed at Essem.

A large number of these new orchestral works will be found at the music division in the Library of Congress. The list is as follows: Hermann Bischoff, symphony; Henry Hadley, symphony (probably his newest symphony No. 3, not yet published); Max Reger, "Variations;" Bossi, "Intermezzo Goldoniani;" Loeffler, "Orchesterstueck;" Ertel, symphonic poem; Boehe, symphonic poem; Reznicek, symphony; Humperdinck, overture, "Heirat wider Willen;" Franck, "Redemption;" Pfitzner, overture, "Christelflein." In addition, it is stated there will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck sent to Boston during the summer.

Which of these works will be selected for the nation's capital? It would seem only reasonable that those composers who were born in America or those who have resided here long enough to catch the American spirit should be able to write compositions more suitable for the American audience than those writers who have never set foot on our shores. Henry Hadley, who won the Paderewski prize for his symphony, "The Seasons," is now being acclaimed in Germany, and residents of our city ought to have at least an opportunity of hearing one of his works. Interest is felt here, also in the work of Hugo Kaun, for one of his chamber music pieces was much enjoyed here last year. We remember Loeffler as a former member and soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Dr. Gloetzner, of this city, has aroused our interest in Max Reger. Surely we ought to hear the works of these four men, and as many others as practicable.

Estab 1884
From
Address
Date OCT 13 1907

Kommende Konzerte und Notizen.

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters theilt mit, daß es leider, ungeachtet zahlreicher Anregungen, nicht möglich war, für New York eine Extra-Serie von Konzerten zu veranstalten, wie es auf Grund der beispiellosen Nachfrage nach Billéts sich als wünschenswerth herausgestellt hätte. Anmeldungen zu Abonnements werden von morgen, Montag, an an der Kasse in Carnegie Hall entgegengenommen. Die New Yorker Konzerte der berühmten Bostoner Vereinigung finden statt: an den Donnerstag Abenden des 7. November, 5. Dezember, 9. Januar, 20. Februar und 19. März und an folgenden Samstag Nachmittagen: 9. November, 7. Dezember, 11. Januar, 22. Februar und 21. März. Dr. Karl Muck, der auch in diesem Jahr an der Spitze des Orchesters steht, kündigt folgende Novitäten an: Symphonien von H. Bischoff, Henry Hadley, einem Amerikaner, und die „Wallenstein"-Symphonie von Vincent d'Indy. „Variationen" von Max Reger; „Intermezzi Goldoniani" von Bossi; Orchesterstück von Löffler und Schjelderup; je ein symphonisches Poëm von Ertel und Boehe; eine Suite von Kaun und eine solche von Resnicek; Serenade von Szekles, die Humperdinck'sche Ouverture zur komischen Oper „Die Heirath wider Willen", „Redemption" von Franck und die Ouverture „Christelflein" von Pfitzner. — Die Brooklyner Konzerte der Bostoner finden im Baptist Temple an folgenden Freitag Abenden statt: 8. November, 6. Dezember, 10. Januar, 21. Februar und 20. März. Der Vorverkauf beginnt am 23. Oktober im Art Building, 174 Montague Str., Brooklyn.

From
Address
Date

Renewal of interest in the forthcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is brought about from the fact that the public sale of seats will begin to-morrow. The concerts are scheduled for Monday evenings as follows: November 4, December 9, January 6, February 17 and March 16 at the Academy of Music.

There are in the orchestra this season 98 men, which is two more than last season, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. About one-sixth of the membership of the orchestra is new, but Dr. Karl Muck, who has been granted by the Kaiser an additional leave of absence of one year, will again be the conductor. All the new members of the orchestra were selected by Dr. Muck personally. Professor Willy Hess, the concert master, who is abroad on a year's leave of absence, has been succeeded by Carl Wendling. For four years Wendling was concert master at the Court Theatre, Stuttgart, under Pohlig, the new conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Other new comers in the Boston orchestra are Richard Czerwonky, solo violinist, successor to Timothee Adamowski, now devoting himself to chamber music, and Julius Theodorowicz, for the last few years second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, successor to the late Arnold Moldauer. New first violinists are Alexander Ribarsch, of Vienna, and William Traupe, transferred from the second section. Max Zach, who resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society, has been succeeded by Karl Scheurer, of Berlin; and Arthur Kantzenbach, also of Berlin, has succeeded Josef Adamowski. Karl Schmid, of Vienna, is the new first horn player.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts. At the December concert Paderewski will play with the orchestra, and this will be his only appearance with an orchestra in Philadelphia during his tour of America. Teresa Carreno will play with the orchestra at the January concert, and in February the soloist will be Melba, who will then make her only appearance of the year in this city.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani, a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture "Heirat Wider Willen;" Cesar Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be extended before the end of the season.

The Best Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess
OCT 13 1907

Concert Dates Announced By Symphony Orchestra

The public subscription sale for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, Tuesday morning, October 15, at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five afternoon concerts will be given, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 17. As in the past two seasons, the concerts will begin at 4:30 o'clock.

The advent of Dr. Karl Muck as its conductor was unquestionably an important element in attracting so large an audience at each concert. Prof. Willy Hess, for three years the concert master, is spending the winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

In Prof. Hess' place will be found Carl Wendlind, a concert master of the Court Theater of Stuttgart, a young violinist who ranks among the great, has been concert master at Bayreuth for the last three Wagner festivals. There will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March, but the quality of the three soloists for the other concerts is unusually high. At the December concert the assisting artist will be Paderewski.

From DISPATCH.
Address COLUMBUS, O.
Date OCT 13 1907

Miss Marjorie Booth has gone to Chicago to continue her vocal studies.

The Boston Symphony orhcestra subscriptions are coming in rapidly. Columbus concert-goers are aware of the value of this magnificent body of musicians and will give it a royal welcome.

Dr. Karl Muck will [illegible] Parties from Springfield, London, Granville, Newark, Chillicothe, Delaware and many nearby towns are being formed.

Estab 1884

[24]

From ..... From .....

Address ..... Address .....

Date ..... OCT 13 1907 Date .....

Oscar Hammerstein signed by cable yesterday a 2-year contract with the celebrated French ma[illegible] director, Andre Charlier, who will s[illegible] for this country from Cherbourg the 30th inst. on the Augusta Victoria, and who has been specially engaged to conduct the French repertoire at the [illegible] Opera House. M. Charlier will direct from the Opera Ho[illegible]bels where he has been ch[illegible]orchestra for the past five years. It is an interesting fact of the modern French school that his reputation has been established and he has conducted [illegible]s with much success in the principal opera houses of France and Belgium and elsewhere in Europe. M. Charlier is a personal friend of Massenet, who has personally commended him he has received for his masterly interpretation of the works of that composer.

When Dr. Karl Muck reached Boston last week he brought with him a stout packing case, so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked, apologetically, that the weight was due to a new score by Max Roger which it contained, among other things. In all, Dr. Muck has brought over fourteen new works which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley, one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler and several names which are new to this country. The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, symphony; Henry Hadley, symphony; Max Reger, variations; Bossi, "Intermezzo Goldoniani;" Loeffler, orchesterstuck; Schjelderup, orchesterstuck; Ertel, symphonic poem; Boehe, symphonic poem; Reznicek, suite; Hugo Kaun, suite; Szekles, serenade; d'Indy-Wallenstein, symphony; Humperdinck, overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" Franck, "Redemption;" Pfitzner, overture "Christelflein.' In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

An error was made in a previous announcement concerning Paderewski's plans for the coming season. It was said that his only appearances with orchestra in America would be seven with the Boston Symphony, three with the Pittsburg and two with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago. To this list should be added one appearance with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in Minneapolis on January 17. The Minneapolis Orchestra is one of the most prosperous in the Middle West and one which is doing extraordinarily good work in the cause of music.

From ..... NEW YORK EV'G POST

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 17 19

Speculators Outwitted in Boston.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has devised a scheme by which speculators have little chance to do business at the symphony concerts in that city. As is generally known all the seats in Symphony Hall for Friday afternoon rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts are sold at auction at the beginning of the season, with the exception of the 505 seats in the second balcony on Friday afternoons. These have been used for admissions at twenty-five cents each since the beginning of the concerts in 1881. It long ago became evident that the purpose of Mr. H. L. Higginson to provide cheap seats for students, and the like, would be defeated if tickets for them were sold in the ordinary fashion, for as seats go in Symphony Hall for the Boston Symphony concerts, the second balcony could easily be sold out at the rate of $1 or $1.50, as they are among the best seats in the hall. To defeat the speculators, therefore, it was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash for the seats as they enter. There are 505 seats and only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall. Every Friday afternoon during the season, no matter what the weather may be, there is a long queue two or three hours before the doors open. When a popular soloist like Melba or Paderewski is to appear, the waiters begin to arrive as early as eight o'clock in the morning, bring their campstools, their books, and their lunches, and make themselves as comfortable as possible.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one-night stands" entail more than offset the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Only four more days remain for last year's subscribers to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to renew their subscriptions and secure their former seats, the limit of time for renewals being next Friday, October 17. The books will then be closed until Monday, October 21, when they will be open to the general public subscription sale. As already has been announced, the orchestra will give five concerts in the Lyric on Wednesday evenings, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18. Three soloists are announced. At the December concert Paderewski will appear; at the January concert, Teresa Carreno, and at the February concert, Mme. Melba. In respect to Paderewski and Melba, this appearance will give Baltimore its only opportunity to hear the former with orchestra and the only opportunity to hear Melba at all, as she is not to give any concerts this year. Note should be taken also of the announcement that the prices of single tickets will be increased at the December and February concerts, when Paderewski and Melba appear. All communication regarding subscriptions should be sent to W. A. Albaugh, 109 North Charles street.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
OCT 14 1907
Date .....

Public subscription sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will open in the box office of Carnegie Hall to-day at 9 a. m. The subscription price of the seats hitherto sold for $7.50 has been raised to $9. Otherwise, the prices remain the same as in past years. The usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts will be given. The evening concerts will be given on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20, and the matinees on November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 21, all in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight. In Willy Hess's place as concert master will be Carl Wendling, who held a similar post in Bayreuth at the last three Wagner festivals and for three seasons was concert master of the German performances in Covent Garden under Richter. The successor of Timothée Adamowski is Richard Czerwonky of Berlin. In place of Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, for several years second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York. Orchestral novelties will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, D'Indy's Wallenstein symphony, Reger's Variations, Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani, a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler, a symphonic poem by Ertel, another "Taormina" by Boehe, an orchestral piece by Schjelderup, suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun, a serenade by Szekles, Humperdinck's "Heirat wider Willen," Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein."

...ress .....

...Date ..... OCT 13 1907

FOR MUSICAL BUFFALO.

The rapid strides Buffalo has made along musical lines, during the past two seasons, has been the subject of congratulation and deserving comment.

Local teachers, instrumental and vocal artists, with the musical organizations, have each contributed their share toward bringing about this result and establishing the present harmonious relations.

So high has become the standard that managers and artists clamor for a Buffalo booking and are disappointed if unsuccessful in the effort.

As a result, Buffalonians are to hear during the coming season the Boston, New York and Pittsburg orchestras, which are the best in the country; Paderewski, Pachman, the latter the world's greatest Chopin interpreter; Kubelik, the wizard of the violin, and the great Calve.

Truly there is reason for congratulation. Few cities will have such a brilliant array of vocal and instrumental talent for the season of 1907-'08.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

America's two greatest orchestras, the Boston Symphony and the New York Symphony, are to be heard in Buffalo in January at Convention Hall. The date for the New York Symphony Orchestra concert will be Friday evening, Jan. 3, Walter Damrosch conducting. A singer will be the soloist, but the artist has not yet been fully determined upon.

Monday evening, Jan. 27, is the date selected for the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. The soloist will in all probability be Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Court Theater to serve as concertmeister with the Boston Orchestra during the absence of Prof. Willy Hess abroad. Mrs. Mai Davis is the local manager for both orchestras.

INQUIRER,

...om .....

...ldress .....

...ate .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The public sale for the Philadelphia concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, 1115 Chestnut street, tomorrow at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five concerts will be given, the dates being Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 16, the place being, as usual, the Academy of Music.

The orchestra will return to Philadelphia slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight, instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season and various shifts have been made among the other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new double bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignation of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard, and the pension fund of the orchestra is now making retirement of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

There will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts, in November and March. At the December concert Paderewski will play with the orchestra and this will be his only appearance with the orchestra in Philadelphia during his tour of America. Teresa Carreno will play with the orchestra at the January concert, and in February the soloist will be Mme. Melba.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907

MUSICAL NOTES

Manager Mudgett announces that Rudolph Ganz will make his final appearance in recital program in this city before returning to Europe at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 4.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of six concerts in Sanders Theater at Harvard University during the coming winter. The dates for them are: Thursday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, March 12 and April 23. The period for renewals of last year's subscribers will expire on Wednesday, Oct. 16, and the public sale for new subscribers will open at Seaver's book store in Harvard square. Among the soloists who will appear during the season are Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Carl Wendling and Louis Bachner.

The first soloist of the year at the Symphony concerts will be Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss pianist, who made so favorable an impression when he played with the orchestra in this city two years ago. Since then he has given several recitals in Boston and has won a very appreciative audience. He will play next week Liszt's concerto in A major, less well known than the one in E flat, but by many considered the greater work of the two.

The season of pianoforte recitals will open at Chickering Hall, Monday afternoon, Oct. 28, when Mme. Olga Samaroff will make her first appearance of the season. The sale of seats will open at the box office in Symphony Hall next Friday.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

The first soloist of the year at the Symphony concerts will be Rudoif Ganz, the Swiss pianist, who made so favorable an impression when he played with the orchestra in this city two years ago. Since then he has given several recitals in Boston, and has won a very appreciative audience. He will play Liszt's oCncerto in A major, less well known than the one in E flat, but by many it is considered the greater work of the two.

This second programme, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, also brings the first novelty of the season, and one which will be listened to with great interest. It is a symphonic work in thre parts entitled "Wallenstein," which its composer, Vincent d'Indy, calls a trilogy after Schiller. The second part of the work, which has the sub-title of I. Piccolonini, was performed by Pasdeloup in Paris as long ago as 1874. The final number on the programme will be Wagner's Kaisermarsch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of six concerts in Sanders Theatre, at Harvard University, during the coming winter. The dates for them are Thursday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, March 12 and April 23. Among the soloists are who will appear during the season are Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, contralto; Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist; Carl Wendling, violinist, and Louis Bachner, pianist.

The Press Clipping Bureau of the World
Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

...ress .....

...BUFFALO, N.

OCT 13 1907

Two January concerts that will attract widespread interest are announced by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, who brings the New York Symphony Orchestra to Convention Hall on Friday evening, January 3d, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, January 27th. Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, will have a singer for his soloist, but the selection is not yet made. For the Boston Symphony's concert, Dr. Karl Muck, conducting, the soloist will probably be Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Royal Theater to serve as concertmeister in Boston during the absence abroad of Professor Willy Hess.

From .....

Address .....

...BUFFALO, N.

OCT 13 1907

Date .....

Two superb concerts are announced for January under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, who presents the New York Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, January 3d, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, January 27th, both at Convention Hall.

For the New York Symphony Orchestra concert, Walter Damrosch conducting, the soloist will be a singer who has not yet been selected. The soloist at the Boston Symphony concert will probably be Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, who has secured a year's leave of absence from the Royal Theater to serve as concertmeister for Boston during the absence abroad of Willy Hess. This will be Buffalo's first opportunity of hearing Boston's splendid new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

OCTOBER 13, 1907

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

When Dr. Karl Muck reached Boston last week he brought with him a stout packing case so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Roger, which it contained among other things. In all Dr. Muck has brought over 14 new works which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley; one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler, and several names which are new to this country. The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, symphony; Henry Hadley, symphony; Max Roger, variations; Bossi, "Intermezzo Goldoniani"; Loeffler, Orchesterstuck; Schjelderup, Orchesterstuck; Ertel, Symphonie Poem; Boehe, Symphonie Poem; Reznicek, "Suite"; Hugo Kaun, "Suite"; Szekles, "Serenade"; d'Indy-Wallenstein, symphony; Humperdinck, overture "Heirat Wider Willen"; Franck, "Redemption"; Pfitzner, overture "Christelflein." In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

It is an interesting fact that despite the slump in stocks, and especially in copper, which hit Boston unusually hard, prices this year ruled higher than ever.

SECOND CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week's Symphony programme, the second of the series in Symphony Hall, brings the first novelty of the year, d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony. The composer calls it a symphonic trilogy after Schiller. This is one of the distinguished French composer's early works. As early as 1874 the overture "I Piccolomini" was played at one of the Pasdeloup concerts in Paris. Later this overture was incorporated into the larger work as the second movement. It is interesting to know that the idea of this work came to d'Indy during his sojourn in Weimar, where he formed for some time one of the Liszt circle.

To Rudolph Ganz falls the honor of being the first soloist of the season. His appearance with the orchestra in March, 1906, created a most favorable impression, which has been increased since that time by his several recitals in Boston. He will play Liszt's Concerto in A major, not so well known as the one in E flat, but by many regarded as the greater work. The third and last number on the programme will be Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of six concerts in Sanders Theatre at Harvard University during the coming winter. The dates for them are Thursday evenings, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, [illegible], March 12 and April 23. The period for renewals of last year's subscribers will expire on Wednesday, Oct. 16, and the public sale for new subscribers will open at Seaver's book store in Harvard square. Among the soloists who will appear during the season are Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, contralto; Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist; Carl Wendling, violinist, and Louis Bachner, pianist.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907

MUSIC LOVERS LONG IN LINE

Stand Many Hours to Get Symphony Seats.

Millinery Display is Feature of First Rehearsal.

New Members of Orchestra Able Musicians.

The broad steps of Symphony hall, Huntington av side, were for several hours yesterday banked with fall millinery of many shades, surmounting dainty tailor mades, and all in honor of the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 27th season.

The profusion of living decorations extended south along the sidewalk as far as the children's hospital, and was for the most part resplendent in autumnal brilliancy, excepting where the somber black of masculine dress refused absolutely to blend itself into the general color scheme.

No season's opening is complete without the throng of waiters. It is they who think that time is money, but also that the gain is theirs when, after the exercise of much patience, they are admitted—at least 505 are admitted—to the upper balcony for just 25 cents.

At 9:30 yesterday morning the economical enthusiasts began forming a line and as the minutes grew to hours had increased it to wide proportions. It was a great day to be outdoors. The sun was friendly and made everybody feel better by its warm smiles.

There were jolly girls, fresh from the conservatory—music conservatory, of course, though they bloomed like roses—serious-minded teachers, studious musicians, demure maiden ladies, placid mothers and grave-looking men of all ages.

Jostling? Not a bit of it. There was much conversation, but all allegretto. It might have provided a theme for a good composer. At any rate it was pleasant to hear. Music cases—rolls are tabooed—violin boxes, textbooks, shopping bags, some candy boxes and a good supply of newspapers were also in line and helped to add interest to the attractive picture.

Just at 1:30 the big center door was swung open and slowly and decorously the crowd filed into the hall. It was like a primary school at the close of the morning recess; no noise, no shoving and no rush. It seemed that each was willing to take the place that the right of possession gave and there was not a single effort to break the regularity and evenness of the procession There were men on hand to prevent just that thing, but they really didn't have much to do.

At 1:42 the man at the door had counted the 505th admission and the 506th in line, with at least 100 more in the rear, was turned away.

Subscribers and holders of tickets for that particular rehearsal did not begin to arrive much before 2 o'clock. However, all who had planned to be there had reached their seats before the doors were closed, and the concert was begun at 2:30.

There were a few vacant seats. It wasn't because they hadn't been sold. O, no, the people who have subscribed for them haven't come back to town yet, but they will probably be there next time.

The "regulars" were there. Some had their old seats and some didn't. They looked about, each to see one another and to reassure themselves that another season was to be auspiciously opened, not exactly because they were there, but because the "atmosphere" was quite the same.

It seems that the appeal that the women in the audience refrain from wearing large hats has had some effect. The number of "obstructionists" yesterday was comparatively small. Of course there was no end of hats, but fortunately these were no larger than the prevailing style demands. One man who has been attending rehearsals for many years, commented upon that fact, and felt that it should be duly recognized by the press.

Dr Karl Muck, the conductor, received much applause when he came forward to take up his baton. No one has ever said that the handclapping at a Friday afternoon rehearsal was "thunderous." Yesterday it was just the same as ever, and there was no record of anyone splitting a glove.

There have been changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The permanent addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns has been brought about, and 14 new men to fill the places of others have been engaged, making actually 16 changes.

The new members are nearly all from abroad, and are Dr Muck's personal choice. This gives one the right to assume that they are men of highest ability. In fact, it was proved yesterday afternoon.

Carl Wendling, formerly concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth, has succeeded Mr Hess as concert master. He is regarded as one of the very few great concert masters of the world.

BOSTON DAILY TRIBUNE
SATURDAY MORNING
OCTOBER 12, 1907

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE AGAIN GREETS DR. MUCK

NEW FACES SEEN IN ORCHESTRA AT FIRST "REHEARSAL" OF THE SEASON.

Karl Muck, Symphony Leader.

By Wilder D. Quint

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the 27th season of Boston's great and superb orchestra opened with the first of the so-called "rehearsals." The word is time-honored misnomer, for in every respect these Friday afternoon offerings are as much concerts as those of Saturday evening. Imagine the excitement among the fair beings who make up the great bulk of "rehearsal" audiences, if Dr. Muck should suddenly command his men to cease playing for instruction in some fine point of interpretation, or should play some one movement of a symphony over three or four times!

But if the afternoon concerts differ in no essential from those of the night, not so the listeners. The "rehearsal crowd," is notoriously chilly, and so it happened that when Dr. Muck appeared from out the familiar doorway and walked to his undecorated music-stand, the applause that greeted him was decorous; nothing more. Tonight it will probably be tumultuous, at least if the cordial way in which leave was taken of the conductor at the final concert of last season counts for anything in the way of prophecy.

Change in the Personnel.

But even apart from Dr. Muck, the first thing that comes home to the habitual symphony-goer is the change in the personnel of the orchestra. Not since the days of the early 80s, when Gericke so ruthlessly weeded out the men selected by Henschel, has there been such an alteration in a single summer.

There are strangers scattered about in all departments of the band. The front desk of the first violins is entirely new, Hess and the long-familiar Adamowski being replaced by Wendling and Czerwonky. From this same section death has taken Moldauer and to it has returned Theodorowizc after several years with the Kneisel quartet. Zach is missed from the violas and Joseph Adamowski from the 'cellos. There are two new horn players and various other pilgrims from abroad, all of whom may reasonably be supposed to be of fine and acceptable calibre. Men and times change, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be trusted to go on its way without shadow of turning.

Nor has Dr. Muck changed. He last year won the reputation of being a great conductor, and a poor maker of programs. Both elements stood out in yesterday's concert. Its composition was of the one style sort that offered little variety and finally became cloyingly monotonous. A Bach suite, a Mozart symphony and a Beethoven symphony; those were the ingredients. Contrast, which makes even a mediocre concert sometimes interesting, was almost entirely absent. Nor could it be said that the program was "educational" in showing the development of music, for the Mozart symphony which came in the middle is greater in every respect—in inspiration, in beauty, in emotion and in workmanship—than the jolly Beethoven pastoral that followed it.

Much Beautiful Playing.

But there was much beautiful playing during the afternoon, and some admirably strong and poetic interpretatiton. The familiar Bach suite in D major, a swollen affair at best, when played by a big modern orchestra, went well enough (though it has been played with more precision and finish at these concerts) and it gave us a small opportunity to hear Mr. Wendling, the new concert-master. His style is broad and his tone rich, but appears to be less pure and lovely than that of either Hess or Kneisel. However, of his calibre we can judge better later on.

Dr. Muck read, and the men played the Mozart G minor symphony with a passionate fervor that made it immensely effective. It was modernized, yet not vulgarized; colored with no little freedom, yet never abused. There was less of the elegance of the salon than usual, and the greatness of the composer suffered nothing thereby. The playing was for the most part superfine in quality, although the horns in their passage at the end of the andante were a trifle uncertain and ragged.

The rollicking Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, a tour de force of joy which once, however, comes perilously near to depicting a snooze by the brookside, was given in virile and breezy style that doubtless delighted the nature-lovers present. "Pleasant thoughts that awaken on arriving in the country," is Beethoven's own tag for the opening movement. Change the "in" to "from" and you have a very excellent sentiment for the entire concert. There were evidences that many listeners had just reached town, and certainly Dr. Muck's choice of subjects aroused pleasant thoughts, if nothing else.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ....

Address ....

Date ....

Estab

Last week was a busy one in Symphony Hall, Boston, as the seats for the Boston Symphony concerts were sold at auction. On the seats for these concerts an arbitrary upset price is set for the season, $18 and $10, according to location. The seats are auctioned in the order they are situated in the hall, the bid being a premium to be added to the upset price. For the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons the 505 seats in the second balcony are not sold at auction, these being reserved for door sale at 25 cents each. Every seat is sold for the season except about 50, which the management holds out to sell to casual visitors.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
OCTOBER 13, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Concerts Begin Again.

First Program Interesting, But Devoid of Novelties.

Calve's Recital Saturday —Current Comment.

Dr Muck opened the 27th season of Symphony concerts Friday afternoon with a severe and conservative program in which J. S. Bach was represented by his D major suite for orchestra, followed by Mozart's G minor symphony with the "Pastoral" sympnony by Beethoven for the final number. Classical, dignified and befitting the formal beginning of Boston's new musical year the familiar selections were received with the usual manifestations of deep and sincere satisfaction expressed by pattering plaudits from the audience that filled Symphony hall and departed not until the long program was finished. Dr Muck's welcome was cordial, and at the close of the concert the usual rush was kept up for a while and the conductor given further proofs of appreciation by the slowly out-going throng.

This year there are a dozen or more new men in the orchestra. Mr Carl Wendling is the new concert master, and the other artists are scattered through the different instrumental groups. All of them are experienced players and we would have suspected from the performances at the first rehearsal and concert that they were not old associates of their fellow-members. Of course Dr Muck led his forces over familiar ground; but the results fairly disarmed criticism, for the ensemble work was up to the usual high standard of the orchestra—and that is not surpassed by any other orchestra, foreign or domestic.

The five numbers of the Bach suite each received its proper definition, the strongly accentuated measures being given smoothly and with a beautiful clarity of tone. This was specially shown in the string contingents, to which a large part of the dance themes are allotted.

In the glorious G minor symphony Mozart's thematic material seems at times almost too delicate for exposition by a full orchestra, but that is not saying that the pianissimo passages were not given with exquisite grace and daintiness by the lighter strings and woodwinds. They were, and the heavier strings in the second movement developed the concealed melody in admirable fashion. The modulated finale too was worked up skilfully. The various reiteration of themes in the last movement were generally smooth in attack. In Beethoven's familiar "Pastoral" symphony Dr Muck attempted no new "reading." The so-called "atmosphere" was carefully preserved, the quaint episode in the third movement was well played by the oboes, bassoons and other woodwinds and the thunderstorm was sufficiently vehement in character to make a not too noisy interruption to the dance music. The interpretation of the whole work calls for commendation.

This week's program, the second of the series, brings the first novelty of the year, d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony. The composer calls it a symphonic trilogy after Schiller, and it is one of the distinguished French composer's early works. Rudolph Ganz will be the soloist, playing Liszt's piano concerto in A major, which is not so well known as the one in E-flat, but by many regarded as the greater work. The third and last number will be Wagner's "Kaisermarsch."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1907

A correspondent, renewing the discussion of the hour at which the Symphony Concerts and the theatres of the first class might most conveniently begin for their public, writes us as follows: "In your remarks about the change of time of the performance at one of the theatres, you use the expression "metropolitan cities." I have before me the list of bookings of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season. Certainly we in Boston can claim to be as metropolitan as the cities I mention below, yet the concerts in all these cities begin at 8.15. The list is: Baltimore, Waterbury, Worcester, Newark, Providence, Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Cincinnati, Troy and Hartford. Of course we do not claim to be as metropolitan as Greater New York or Philadelphia (?); but it does seem to me, if the cities I have mentioned are metropolitan enough to have the concerts begin at a seasonable hour, it is rather absurd that the same arrangement should not have been made for Boston."

Mr. Max Zach, long one of the first viola players of the Symphony Orchestra, one of the conductors at the "Pop" concerts, and an accomplished musician generally, who has made nearly his whole career in Boston, left town on Sunday for St. Louis to begin his work as the conductor of the Symphony and Choral Concerts there. He appears first [illegible] his new public on Nov. 12.

BOSTON MONDAY MORNING ADVERTISER,

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Bach—Suite in D minor.
Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
Beethoven—Pastoral Symphony.

There was a sound of symphony by night.
The Bay State's capital had gathered then
Her critics and her music-fiends, and bright
The lamps shone o'er wise women and lank men;
And Dr. Muck beat happily, and when
Music arose with all its mingled sweets,
People forgot the higher price of seats,
And each felt glad that he had come again.

If there was not much novelty in the programme there certainly was enough in the orchestra. The Adamowskis had left an aching void that could scarcely be filled to the immediate satisfaction of Bostonians, but the advent of Mr. Wendling, the new "concert-meister" successfully covered the Hessian retreat. There were not only many new faces in the ranks, but some of the old ones were found in new places. There had been several changes made in the seating of the men, of the advantage of which we shall be able to judge later on. Dr. Muck is evidently desirous of leaving his mark on the orchestra, of adding new life to its membership and eliminating all traces of fossilization.

Nevertheless the ensemble of the opening concert was not so smooth as it has been heretofore. There were many points of individual excellence, the bassoon, the oboe and the first horn all made a good record in the pastoral symphony, but the violin tones were rough and the brasses at times noisy and not perfectly together. Something like this is to be expected of an orchestra that has been partially made over, and we expect these faults to disappear very soon, but they were in evidence in the dainty Mozart symphony and in the Bach Overture.

Bach's Suite made a good opening of the season, better than that "Dedication of the House" overture with which Henschel used to begin the series. Possibly Wagner's "Greeting to the Hall" would make an appropriate number for a first concert. "Dich theure Halle" would appeal to many who had bought high-priced season tickets.

We recall the Bach Suite being applauded to the echo when it was last performed here. The monotony of key hampers the work somewhat, but its clear melodies and noble counterpoint overcome this defect. The final Gigue might have been more rollicking.

The gem of the concert seemed to be the G minor symphony, for this is Mozart's best orchestral work. It may not be as ambitious as his "Jupiter Symphony," but it is infinitely sweeter, more spontaneous and poetic. Dr. Muck did not individualize the work, but read it in a strong and manly fashion, which however did not obscure its pathos and delicacy. The finale was particularly strong, its contrasts being very effectively made.

The Pastoral does not seem to grow upon us. It is an uneven symphony. Its first movement is filled with good intellectual development and does not attempt the landscape-painting which fills the next two movements. The work is interesting historically, since it shows how "programme-music" began, for, although there were definite pictures attempted in instrumental music before Beethoven, this is the first important effort to make it speak a definite language.

Yet some of the touches seem archaic. That poultry trio of nightingale, quail (without toast) and cuckoo, has been obliterated by the bleating of Richard Strauss' sheep ("Don Quixote") and the whinneyings of Wagner's race-horses in "Die Walkuere." The second movement, "The Brook," is prolix. Beethoven must have had Tennyson's brook in his mind—"Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever!" Yet some good musicians (Mr. Gericke for example) consider this part the gem of the symphony.

